ATLANTA, Feb. 27 — After a new investigation of the notorious 1955 killing of Emmett Till, a grand jury in Leflore County, Miss., has declined to issue any new indictments, effectively ending any further prosecution of a crime that fueled the civil rights movement.

Two men, now dead, admitted to the killing in 1956 after they were acquitted by an all-white jury in Sumner, Miss. But the Justice Department reopened the case in 2004 in search of others who had participated in the beating and shooting of Emmett, a black 14-year-old. By then, so much time had passed that the country store where the victim was said to have whistled at a white woman, Carolyn Bryant, was in ruins.

The new inquiry was conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which turned over a report of more than 8,000 pages to the district attorney, Joyce L. Chiles. Ms. Chiles sought a manslaughter charge against Ms. Bryant, 73, the last known living suspect in the case, but the grand jury decided last week not to issue an indictment, a court clerk said. The action was reported Tuesday in The Jackson Clarion-Ledger.

“If Carolyn Bryant is truly not guilty in being involved in the killing of Emmett Till or there is insufficient evidence to indict her, then the grand jury did the right thing,” said Alvin Sykes, the president of the Emmett Till Justice Campaign.

The grand jury’s decision illustrates the difficulty of prosecuting such old cases, even as the Justice Department has begun its first systematic effort to identify them. At a news conference on Tuesday in Washington, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I., said about a dozen such cases had been selected, from a list of about 100, for immediate action.

“New information, sometimes an innocuous small bit of information, can be crucial to breaking these decades-old cases,” Mr. Gonzales said. “A secret harbored for many years can be the piece of evidence we need to make our case.”

Last month a federal grand jury in Jackson, Miss., indicted James F. Seale, 71, on kidnapping charges in connection with the 1964 killing of two black men near Meadville, Miss. Mr. Seale is in custody awaiting trial.

The Till case was reopened after Ms. Chiles and Justice Department officials met with Mr. Sykes; Keith Beauchamp, a filmmaker who made a 2005 documentary about the case; and Simeon Wright, the cousin who was sharing a bed with Emmett when white men came to the house and took him away in a pickup truck.

It is not clear how many people participated in what followed: Emmett was beaten, shot, weighted down and thrown in the Tallahatchie River. Some have speculated, based on a recollection by Mr. Wright’s father, Mose, that he heard a “lighter” voice, that Ms. Bryant was in the truck for all or part of the night.

Ms. Chiles declined to comment on the case, and grand jury proceedings are secret.

Mr. Sykes has repeatedly expressed hope that the investigation will ultimately be made subject to public scrutiny.

“We just want the truth,” he said, “and that’s all we want. As much as the truth can be told and gained.”

The FBI Is Reopening 70 Cold Cases From The Civil Rights Era. (WJTV)

WJTV-TV, February 28, 2007

The FBI says it hopes to solve dozens of cases that were racially based crimes.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales syas the suspects have not gotten away with anything, and the government is still on their trail.

With the passage of time, some worry witnesses and evidence may now be unavailable.

Jerry Mitchell of the Clarion-Ledger says there is another concern with these cases, "one of the problem with these cases is they weren't adequately investigated at the time."

Mitchell also says, "these were cases where guys got away with murder and everybody knew they were getting away with murder, so its kind of injustice at its height." Bearly half of these murders happened in Mississippi.

Two Local Civil Rights Era Deaths Will Get FBI Review (WEDF)

DOJ_NMG_0137945

WDEF-TV, February 28, 2007

The F-B-I today announced they plan to review around a hundred unsolved deaths from the Civil Rights era in the South.

And that includes two cases here in the Tennessee Valley.

One involves a bombing in Ringgold in 19-60.

Mattie Greene died from the explosion under her house.

And the other is the death of a 15-year old boy in 19-58.

Larry Bolden was shot by a white police officer.

FBI Director Robert Mueller says"As you know all too well, many murders during the Civil Rights era were not fully investigated, were covered up or were mis-identified as an accidental death or disappearance."

The F-B-I will re-open about a dozen cases to begin with.. But they aren't saying which ones yet.

FBI To Reopen Memphis Civil-rights Era Cold Case (WMC)

WMC-TV, February 28, 2007

Nearly 50 years ago, 16-year-old Larry Payne was shot to death at what used to be a housing project.

Tonight, his death is one of dozens of unsolved civil rights cases the FBI will re-open.

The death of Larry Payne was overshadowed by the assassination of Doctor Martin Luther King.

"I remember the articles, I remember how we felt, but there was so much going on. It kind of got lost," said NAACP Executive Director Johnnie Turner, who walked in the sanitation worker march that led to Payne's death.

She's glad to know his is one of 76 civil rights cold cases the FBI has pledged to re-open.

"As long as those who perpetuated that crime are allowed to go free, then justice has not been served," she said.

Memphis historian G. Wayne Dowdy says records show Payne died at the hands of a Memphis Police officer after the officer accused him of looting. "Larry Payne was a high school student, an African American high school student in Memphis who participated in the March 28 demonstration led by Dr. King that eventually turned violent."

He says later that day the officer shot Payne outside his Fowler Holmes Housing Project, now a barren property.

"I pray that Larry Payne's family will get the justice and the closure that they so richly deserve," said Turner.

We spoke with the family's attorney. He says he hasn't been in recent contact with them, but he looks forward to hearing how this case unfolds.

"It's partly an attempt to come to grips with the events of the civil rights movement. Particularly the violence that ensued," said Dowdy.

Turner says it sends the message you can run, but you can't hide.

Local FBI officials say the office has not officially begun the new investigation.

Feds Probe Two Civil Rights Era Deaths Here (WCNC)

WCNC-TV, February 28, 2007

They are called "the forgotten". They are 76 people who died in from 1952 to 1968. Were their deaths racially motivated? Tuesday the FBI was pulling those case files and taking a second look at the information in them. Two of the cases are local.

Shelby, North Carolina – 1957: Dr. George Washington Singleton practiced medicine in Cleveland County. The story of his death is told by details in his death certificate and a letter from the Charlotte chapter of the NAACP obtained by WCNC.

"It was a predawn explosion," the letter reads. It happened on Hudson Street, "early Tuesday morning April 30, 1957." Dr. Singleton died instantly. The NAACP letter says "he was burned beyond recognition." The cause of the fire was never determined.

While the now 50-year-old letter says the Charlotte chapter of the NAACP did not think his death was civil rights related, Singleton's wife did. She worked for the Cleveland County NAACP chapter at the time of the explosion. She requested an investigation.

From Washington today, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales talked about these cases.

"Much time has passed on these crimes," he said. "The wounds they left are deep and many of them still have not healed."

Now, decades later, what happened to Dr. Singleton will be looked at one more time.

The other case under review is an inmate death from 1960 in Gaston county. A Department of Justice record says Clarence Cloninger suffered a heart attack in jail and was refused medical attention and died. But few records remain to provide much more detail. Still, the Department of Justice says they are determined to at least look at these old case files.

"We are committed to reexamining these cases and doing all we can to bring justice to the criminals who may have avoided punishment for so long," Gonzales said. "Our message is clear: You have not gotten away with anything. We are still on your trail."

No Indictment In '55 Emmett Till Slaying (AP)

By Jack Elliott Jr. And Allen G. Breed, Associated Press Writers

AP, February 28, 2007

All but closing the books on a crime that helped give rise to the civil rights movement, a grand jury has refused to bring any new charges in the 1955 slaying of Emmett Till, a black teenager who was beaten and shot after whistling at a white woman in the Mississippi Delta.

The district attorney in rural Leflore County had sought a manslaughter charge against the white woman, Carolyn Bryant Donham, who was suspected of pointing out Till to her husband to punish the boy for what was a grave offense in the segregated South.

But the grand jury last Friday issued a "no bill," meaning it found insufficient evidence, according to documents made public Tuesday.

Federal authorities decided last year not to prosecute anyone, saying the statute of limitations for federal charges had run out. Mississippi authorities represented the last, best hope of bringing someone to justice. No one has ever been convicted in the slaying.

"You're looking at Mississippi. I guess it's about the same way it was 50 years ago," said a disappointed Simeon Wright, 64, a black man who heard his cousin whistle. "We had overwhelming evidence, and they came back with the same decision. Some of the people haven't changed from 50 years ago. Same attitude. The evidence speaks for itself."

He added: "I don't know how many years I have left on this Earth. We can leave this world and say, `Hey, we tried. We tried to get some justice in this, and we failed.'"

Till, a 14-year-old boy visiting from Chicago, was kidnapped from his uncle's home in the town of Money and killed after he wolf-whistled at Donham, a shopkeeper at the Bryant Grocery & Meat Market.

Three days later, his mutilated body was found in the muddy Tallahatchie River, weighted down with a cotton gin fan. His left eye was missing, and his right eye was dangling on his cheek. The body was identified only by a ring he was wearing.

His mother, Mamie Till-Mobley, who died in 2003, held an open-casket funeral in Chicago, and a photograph of Till's disfigured face in Jet Magazine had a powerful effect on public opinion, letting the world see what was happening in the South.

Roy Bryant, Donham's husband, and his half brother, J.W. Milam, were acquitted of the crime by an all-white jury in 1955. The two men later confessed in an interview with Look magazine. Both are now dead.

The FBI reopened the case in 2004 but decided in 2006 not to press charges. The case was turned over to local prosecutors, with the FBI suggesting they take a closer look at Donham. Some witnesses said a woman's voice could be heard at the scene of the abduction.

David Beito, a history professor at the University of Alabama who has researched the case extensively, said Tuesday there is probably no one else left to arrest in the case. He said it is hard to underestimate the importance of the Till case, which took place the same year as the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott.

"It gave a jump-start to the civil rights movement," he said. "It did not create the civil rights movement, but it made it more into a mass movement. It really mobilized people."

Donham, who remarried, is now 73 and has declined interviews. A telephone number for her was disconnected Tuesday.

District Attorney Joyce Chiles, a black woman who grew up near where the killing took place, was in court Tuesday and not immediately available for comment.

Wright said: "J.W. Milam and Roy Bryant died with Emmett Till's blood on their hands. And it looks like everyone else who was involved is going to do the same. They had a chance to come clean. They will die with Emmett Till's blood on their hands."

Horace Harned, 86, a former Mississippi legislator and member of the Sovereignty Commission, a state agency that worked clandestinely to preserve segregation, said he was glad to see no charges filed. He said the suggestions that Donham had a role in the crime are "a bunch of foolishness."

"Of course, I don't believe in murder. That's the wrong thing. It always backfires on you. That shouldn't have happened," he said. But he added: "You can't correct all the ills of the past. If we did, the Southerners were treated much worse than anybody back in the Civil War."

No Indictment In Emmett Till Slaying (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie And Richard Fausset, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

A Mississippi grand jury declines to charge a white shopkeeper in the 1955 killing.

ATLANTA — The murder case of Emmett Till — one of the most infamous slayings of the civil rights era — appears to be drawing to a fruitless close 52 years after the black teenager whistled at a white woman, then turned up dead in Mississippi's Tallahatchie River.

It was disclosed Tuesday that a grand jury in Leflore County, Miss., had declined to bring a manslaughter indictment against Carolyn Bryant Donham, the white shopkeeper who witnesses said Till had admired one August afternoon in the rural community of Money, Miss.

Donham, 73, was suspected of pointing out Till to her then-husband, Roy Bryant. He and his half brother, J.W. Milam, were charged in the killing of the 14-year-old but were acquitted by an all-white jury in 1955 after a little more than an hour of deliberations. A year later they admitted in a magazine interview that they had killed Till.

Till's family has watched with hope in recent years as a parade of old and often recalcitrant Southerners have been dragged into court and found guilty of heinous crimes against blacks. But Tuesday, it felt like a door briefly open to the past — and, potentially, to justice — had been shut for good.

"This was our last hope — and it was dashed today," said Simeon Wright, 64, Till's cousin, who was with him at the grocery store and heard him whistle at Donham. "The Emmett Till case started with one person, and that person is still alive. She played a role in identifying Emmett, she participated in his kidnapping, and now she is getting away with murder."

Donham, who is thought to be a resident of Greenwood, Miss., could not be reached for comment. She has long maintained her innocence to the FBI, and chances of new charges, although possible, appear slim.

The Till case horrified and galvanized civil rights activists and reminded the public of the bloody suppression of blacks in the South — even as the old order of segregation and intimidation had begun to crumble.

The slaying took place a year after the Supreme Court handed down the Brown vs. Board of Education ruling and months before Rosa Parks, a 43-year-old seamstress, was arrested for refusing to give up her seat on an Alabama bus.

In August 1955, Till, who was from Chicago, was visiting relatives in the Mississippi Delta when he entered Bryant's grocery store to purchase bubble gum. Inside, he was alone with the shopkeeper's young wife, Carolyn, who later alleged that the boy had spoken lewdly to her. When she stepped out onto the porch, his cousins heard him whistle.

Three days later, Bryant and Milam allegedly forced their way into Till's grand-uncle's house in the middle of the night and snatched Till from his bed. His body was found by fisherman in the Tallahatchie River, with a cotton gin fan wrapped around his neck with barbed wire.

In 1956, in an interview with Look magazine, Bryant and Milam admitted they had repeatedly beaten Till before shooting him and tossing his body in the river.

Milam died in 1980, Bryant in 1990. No one else was indicted.

Till's mother, Mamie Till Mobley, who died in 2003, held an open-casket funeral for her son in Chicago. Thousands came to see his mutilated remains, and a photo of Till's disfigured face was printed in Jet magazine and seen around the world.

His fate became legend, recounted in songs by Bob Dylan and Kanye West and explored in plays by James Baldwin and Toni Morrison. In recent years, a highway in Mississippi and a school in Chicago have been named in Till's honor.

The Justice Department reopened an investigation into Till's death in 2004, after a documentary filmmaker, Keith Beauchamp, shared footage from his film, "The Untold Story of Emmett Louis Till." Beauchamp claimed as many as 14 people, some still living, were involved in Till's slaying.

But in 2006 the department decided not to bring charges, arguing that the five-year statute of limitation on federal civil rights violations had expired. The department turned its 8,000-page report over to prosecutors in Mississippi, recommending that they investigate Donham.

Some witnesses said a woman's voice was heard during Till's abduction.

Joyce Chiles, the district attorney in Leflore County, could not be reached for comment. In the past, she acknowledged that the case would be difficult to prosecute.

Aaron Condon, a professor emeritus of law at the University of Mississippi, said he was not surprised by the grand jury's rejection of the case.

"It's an extremely old case, and the evidence against Carolyn Bryant, from what I've understood, is extremely weak," he said. "The main people who would have been in a position to identify her are dead."

Cowboy Church Probe Dropped (LYNNA)

By Justin Faulconer

The Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance, February 28, 2007

The U.S. Department of Justice has decided to step out of a zoning dispute between a Moneta “cowboy” church and Bedford County officials.

DOJ_NMG_0137948

In letters this month to the Rev. Raymond Bell of the Cowboy Church of Virginia and Bedford's community development director George Nester, the federal department concluded no further action is warranted in deciding if Bedford zoning laws infringe upon a federal act that protects religious land use.

The Cowboy Church holds services in a large barn off Horseshoe Bend Road in Moneta.

Six months ago, the department began investigating if the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act was violated. Bell has been against the county's requirement that a special use permit be obtained to hold religious services, claiming it violates the separation of church and state.

Nester said it's standard procedure that churches obtain a special use permit to hold religious services in newly constructed buildings or new additions to existing buildings.

He said Tuesday he is pleased and relieved that the investigation has been dropped, but some questions still remain. For instance, he doesn't know if the matter was dropped because the church asked it to be or because there is a violation. The letter doesn't state whether a violation took place.

"That's the question mark that was never answered," said Nester.

A spokesperson for the Department of Justice declined to comment Tuesday about the matter. Bell declined to comment also and said he would have more to say later this week.

The Cowboy Church started meeting about a year ago in the Moneta barn, on a farm owned by Garland Simmons. Since then, it has been involved in zoning red tape with the county.

The county originally said using the barn as a church violated building codes and was unsafe for large gatherings. That matter has since been resolved because it was determined the structure is not predominantly used as a church, Nester said.

The church is still holding services under the Cowboy Church name because of its part-time utilization of the barn, Nester said.

"We have no problem with it operating as it is," said Nester.

County officials currently are reviewing and amending the Comprehensive Plan. The next step then would be to review the zoning ordinance. Nester said the county should take a closer look at the language regarding religious land use to ensure there are no infringements on the federal act.

"We need to look at the ordinance from the view the act was written to make sure we are not being over restrictive on religious land use rights," he said. Subscribe to the Newspaper

Man Who Was Shot By Ex-EP Border Agents Is Arrested (EPT)

El Paso Times, February 28, 2007

The drug smuggler who was shot in the buttocks by two El Paso Border Patrol agents who went to prison for it was involved in another drug smuggling attempt, U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said.

Rohrabacher said he would talk today in a news conference in Washington, D.C., about new evidence he said proves that Osvaldo Aldrete Davila was again involved in drug smuggling after the Feb. 17, 2005, shooting.

U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton had repeatedly denied knowledge of a second arrest but Rohrabacher said Sutton's statements were misleading because Aldrete Davila was not arrested either time.

"Johnny Sutton's play on words to imply the second offense didn't occur or was not relevant to the case is dishonest. Only an unscrupulous lawyer would believe this is an acceptable tactic," Rohrabacher said in a written statement.

Rohrabacher said Sutton was briefed by the Drug Enforcement Administration about Aldrete Davila's "direct involvement" in a second offense. Officials with the U.S. Attorney's office said they can't comment on sealed matters.

Aldrete was talked into coming back to the United States and testifying against the agents with the promise that he wouldn't be arrested for the marijuana found in his abandoned van.

Rohrabacher said Sutton's alleged omission was part of his attempt to "paint a benign picture of the drug smuggler" who was given immunity to testify against former agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean. Ramos was sentenced to 11 years in prison and Compean to 12 for violating Aldrete Davila's civil rights and for tampering with evidence. Both are appealing.

S.B. Supervisors Back Ex-border Agents (IVDB)

Inland Valley Daily Bulletin, February 28, 2007

President Bush should consider pardoning two former Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting an alleged drug smuggler, according to a unanimous resolution by San Bernardino County's Board of Supervisors.

"This case appears to be a highly unusual situation where law-enforcement agents were not supported or given due process by their own agency or by the courts," said Supervisor Brad Mitzelfelt, who proposed the resolution.

The agents, Ignacio Ramos (far right) and Jose Alonso Compean (left), were convicted last year of shooting Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, who allegedly brought a van loaded with marijuana across the border from Mexico. The man survived and was granted immunity for his testimony against the agents.

In light of congressional outcry over the agents' convictions and the circumstances of the case, the county's resolution states, President Bush should "act quickly to conduct further investigation of the matter in order to consider a Presidential Pardon at the earliest opportunity possible."

After the meeting, Mitzelfelt conceded the request was unusual.

"Normally, state and federal investigations run their course and usually we don't interject our opinions into those proceedings," he said.

But, he said, "the residents of San Bernardino County have certainly made my office aware of their strong belief that the president should intercede."

Council To Draw New District Maps (FAYOBS)

By Don Worthington, Staff writer

The Fayetteville Observer, February 28, 2007

Residents will get their say March 29 on the boundaries for six Fayetteville City Council districts.

The City Council will hold a public hearing that evening at 7.

The council is drawing new maps in response to the Feb. 6 election. Residents voted in favor of a council with six members representing districts and three members elected at-large. The current council has nine members, all elected from districts.

The change must be approved by the U.S. Department of Justice. The city is trying to have the plan and map approved by April. The city hopes to have federal approval in time for the July filing date for the municipal elections.

City Council members met Tuesday with their redistricting lawyer, Michael Crowell, to discuss options for drawing the six districts.

The Department of Justice will look at the map to make sure it does not affect minority voting. Crowell has said he believes a map that has three districts where minorities constitute the majority of voters will pass federal review.

Councilman Curtis Worthy, said he wants to make sure the districts reflect the racial breakdown of the city — about 48 percent white and 42 percent black.

He said he didn't want a district where whites are an overwhelming majority.

Worthy, Mayor Pro Tem Robert Massey, and councilmen D.J. Haire and Charles Evans suggested several changes that affect neighborhoods with high black populations. The four councilmen are black.

The council asked Crowell to make minor changes to a proposed map to strengthen the minority representation in some districts and clean up the lines in other districts. The council asked Crowell not to split precincts between districts.

Ideally, each district will have about 29,000 residents.

Crowell will present the revised map to the council at a 5:30 p.m. meeting Tuesday.

Bill Targets 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Brian Fricke, a former Marine sergeant who served nine months in Iraq's Anbar province, wasn't thrown out of the military for being gay. He left when his enlistment was up because he was tired of pretending he wasn't.

The "don't ask, don't tell" policy allows lesbians and gay men to serve if they keep quiet about their sex lives. Commanders are barred from asking subordinates about their sexual orientation.

"If people were talking about relationships, you'd have to play the pronoun game. 'He' became 'she.' You really just can't be yourself," says Fricke, 25, a government information technology specialist in Washington. "You'll never be able to tabulate" how many gay people have left the military voluntarily because of its "don't ask, don't tell" policy.

Fricke will be on Capitol Hill today when Democratic Rep. Marty Meehan of Massachusetts reintroduces his Military Readiness Enhancement Act.

The bill would repeal the policy President Clinton approved in 1993 as a compromise between ending a ban and gays serving openly. That would leave gays free to serve without limits.

Since the policy began, nearly 11,000 troops, the equivalent of an Army division, have been discharged.

DOJ_NMG_0137950

The measure had 122 co-sponsors last year but died in the Republican-controlled Congress. Now that Democrats are in charge, Meehan plans to hold hearings as early as April. He says the bill has more than 100 original co-sponsors and seven freshmen.

Three Republicans have signed on, including Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida. She says her husband, Dexter, was cared for by a lesbian nurse when he was injured during combat in Vietnam.

Defense Department statistics released at the request of Congress and the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network, a gay advocacy group, show that nearly 7% of the 726 troops discharged under the policy in 2005 were medical personnel. That's the most in one year and brings to 334 the number of health care workers, including doctors, nurses and mental health specialists, dismissed since 1994.

"People in need of medical specialists couldn't care less about the sexual orientation" of those caring for them, Meehan says. "The policy is outdated and discriminatory."

Marine Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman, says the number of ousted health workers is small given the nearly 11,000 in war zones. "We are enforcing the policy," he says. "We are not experiencing any problems with recruiting and retention."

A Government Accountability Office report in February 2005 found that at least 800 dismissed gay servicemembers had skills deemed "mission critical" by the Pentagon. Among them: 54 Arabic-language specialists.

Congress takes up the issue amid changes in:

·The legal landscape. A federal appeals court in Boston will hear arguments March 7 in the first legal challenge to the policy since the Supreme Court struck down a Texas sodomy law in 2003. The high court said the Constitution's guarantee of liberty bars government from targeting private, consensual sex practices.

·Public opinion. Polls indicate growing acceptance of gay troops. A Harris Poll this month found that 55% supported allowing gays to serve openly, up from 48% in 2000.

A Pew Research Center survey last year found that 60% favored gays serving openly, up from 52% in 1994. Support ran 3-to-1 among those younger than 30. In contrast, Pew found that 39% favored same-sex marriage.

·Military needs. The demand for more troops has led to lower recruiting standards as Congress vows to add 92,000 soldiers and Marines by 2012. "The war makes it easier to think about lifting the ban," says Clyde Wilcox, co-editor of The Politics of Gay Rights.

·Military thinking. John Shalikashvili, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under Clinton, once supported the policy but wrote in The New York Times in January that he believes gays should be allowed to serve openly.

Elaine Donnelly, whose Center for Military Readiness favors a ban on gays, calls Shalikashvili's column "very misinformed" and "part of a PR campaign" to overturn the policy.

Shalikashvili and other policy critics are taking a go-slow approach while fighting continues in Iraq.

John Hutson, once the Navy's top lawyer, calls "don't ask, don't tell" a transitional policy. "It bought us some time," he says, "but now I think that time has come and gone."

Defending His Country, But Not Its 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' Policy (WP)

Once a Marine, always a Marine. That pretty much sums up the life of retired Sgt. Eric Alva, who was sworn into the Marine Corps at 19, stationed in Somalia and Japan and lost his right leg when he stepped on a land mine on March 21, 2003, the first day of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

As the war's first injured soldier, Alva was an instant celebrity. He was on "Oprah." President Bush awarded him the Purple Heart. Donald Rumsfeld visited. And strangers in Alva's native San Antonio still insist on paying for his dinner at Chili's. Last fall Alva, 36, contacted the Human Rights Campaign, the gay rights group, and asked to be involved in its lobbying effort. Today he'll stand alongside Rep. Martin Meehan (D-Mass.) when he introduces a bill to repeal the military's "Don't ask, don't tell" policy on gay, lesbian and bisexual military personnel.

-- Jose Antonio Vargas

Q. Why didn't you come out sooner?

A.Eventually my notoriety -- "the injured soldier" -- will wear off. And I can almost hear it now -- "Oh, yeah, he's that gay Marine." I'm okay with that. The truth is, something's wrong with this ban. I have to say something. I mean, you're asking men and women to lie about their orientation, to keep their personal lives private, so they can defend the rights and freedoms of others in this country, and be told, "Well, oh, yeah, if you ever decide to really meet someone of the same sex and you want the same rights, sorry, buddy, you don't have the right." That's one factor. The other factor is, we're losing probably thousands of men and women that are skilled at certain types of jobs, from air traffic controllers to linguists, because of this broken policy.

You come from a military family?

I come from a family of servicemen. My dad, Fidelis, is a Vietnam vet. My grandfather, also named Fidelis, was a World War II and Korean War veteran. I was named after them. My middle name is Fidelis. Fidelis means "always faithful."

What does sexual orientation -- gay, straight, bisexual -- have to do with being a soldier? A Marine?

First, thanks for recognizing that I am a Marine. Second, to answer your question, I have tons and tons of friends that were in the military at the time who knew I was gay because I confided in them. Everybody had the same reaction: "What's the big deal?" . . . The respect was still there. Your job is what you're doing at its best. Your personal life, your private life, is something you do after work. What's funny is, when I was based in San Diego, Calif., people would go to a gay club and everyone would have a haircut like mine. They had their dog tags on. But come Monday morning, nobody talked about it, nobody dealt with it, everybody was back to work.

So when you were applying to be a Marine in 1990, before "Don't ask, don't tell" was implemented, the application asked for your sexual orientation?

It did.

What did you put down?

I lied, I lied. The lying is what I hated most -- why I had to do it, why I had to keep on doing it, the toll it took on me.

You're wearing a wedding band. What do you tell people when they ask you about your wife?

That happens all the time. It just happened on my way here to Washington, waiting on the plank as I boarded a plane. This very nice woman next to me said she recognized me. She looked at my ring and asked about my wife. I told her I have a partner. His name is Darrell. She paused and said, "Good for you."

Texan Calls For Takeover Of State's Juvenile Schools (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

A long-simmering scandal over sexual abuse of juveniles at schools for youthful offenders broke into the open on Tuesday with an outraged state senator calling for a takeover of the troubled Texas Youth Commission.

At a school in West Texas, a youth commission official acknowledged at a hearing of the State Senate Criminal Justice Committee, the school's superintendent was aware that two supervisors routinely awakened boys for late-night encounters behind closed doors in deserted offices.

The two supervisors — one of whom had been transferred from another state school after pornography was found on his work computer — were allowed to resign in 2005 without charges. One became the principal of a charter school in Midland, Tex., state officials said. The superintendent was promoted to director of juvenile corrections, a post he still holds, the youth commission confirmed.

"It's outrageous," said State Senator John Whitmire, chairman of the Criminal Justice Committee, who accused the commission of a cover-up.

Neil Nichols, the commission's general counsel and new acting executive director, named on Friday after the director, Dwight Harris, retired under pressure, voiced some contrition, saying at one point, "To say I'm disappointed about that is to say the least."

Mr. Whitmore, Democrat of Houston, was not mollified. "Why should this agency not be put in conservatorship and get a whole new management?" he asked.

He excoriated the commission board for not attending the hearing and canceled an appropriations session for the agency that had been scheduled for Wednesday.

Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, called the revelations "absolutely reprehensible" and would not rule out a takeover, said a spokesman, Ted Royer. "The governor believes any time a very serious issue like this emerges, every option should be on the table," Mr. Royer said.

Accusations that staff members at the West Texas State School in Pyote (pronounced PIE-oht) were sexually preying on youths there were made to the youth commission as early as December 2003, according to a timeline presented at the hearing.

The complaints did not reach the Texas Rangers until February 2005 and remained largely secret until accounts began appearing in recent weeks on the Web site of the Texas Observer and the pages of The Dallas Morning News.

The problems were widespread at the agency, which annually places some 3,000 juveniles ages 10 to 17 at the time of their felonies in 13 secure schools, senators and witnesses said.

State Senator Juan Hinojosa, Democrat of McAllen, who investigated conditions at another school in his South Texas district in 2005, said, "We found out a lot of youths are kept seven or eight months longer than required, and we want to know why."

Mr. Hinojosa added: “If a young person refuses to have sex with a supervisor, they deduct a point and are required to stay longer.”

At another state school in Brownwood in Central Texas, he said, “A supervisor was accused of having sex with a 15-year-old juvenile” — a girl, he said later. It was turned over to the Brownwood police, he said, “with no action — it was covered up.”

Mr. Nichols, the acting director, said the commission investigated 1,300 cases of reported wrongdoing last year, including 98 cases of reported sexual abuse. In 78 of the cases, he said, staff members were fired or resigned.

“How about prosecuted?” Mr. Hinojosa asked.

Mr. Nichols did not say. But he said a “large number” of the 78 cases involved female staff members of the commission who had improper sexual contact with students, male and female.

Senators questioned Mr. Nichols about the transfer in 2003 of one supervisor, Ray Brookins, to the West Texas State School from another school for juvenile offenders at San Saba, after pornography had been found on his computer. Mr. Brookins later became assistant superintendent at Pyote and was cited by the Texas Rangers for sexual contact with juveniles there, senators said.

Another supervisor at Pyote, John Paul Hernandez, was also reported by the Texas Rangers to have engaged in sexual contact with students, senators said.

Both supervisors left the youth agency and are under investigation, said the Ward County district attorney, Randall Reynolds.

Mr. Brookins was said at the hearing to be working at a bar in Austin.

Mr. Hernandez became principal at a charter school in Midland, the Richard Milburn Academy, said Norman Hall, the school’s superintendent. The school did not know of Mr. Hernandez’s history when it hired him, Mr. Hall said, and put him on leave several weeks ago.

Mr. Hernandez did not return a call to his mobile phone.

The superintendent at Pyote, Chip Harrison, who knew of the accusations against Mr. Brookins and Mr. Hernandez and kept them on the staff, senators said, is now director of juvenile corrections for the commission, in charge of several schools.

“That’s intolerable; that’s unacceptable,” Mr. Whitmire said.

Mr. Nichols called him “one of our most experienced superintendents,” setting off a gasp from parents.

Mr. Harrison did not return a call.

Randall Chance, a former inspector general at the Pyote school and the author of a self-published book, “Raped by the State,” said abuses were often covered up. “They’re not a problem at the T.Y.C. unless you bring it up” Mr. Chance said, “and then you’re the problem.”

ANTITRUST:

House Gets First Crack At XM-Sirius Proposal (WP)

By Charles Babington, Washington Post Staff Writer

Congress and federal regulators need to get with the times.

That's the message that Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, plans to deliver today at the first public hearing on a proposal to merge the nation's two satellite radio companies, Sirius and XM Satellite Radio Holdings.

Karmazin, who will face skeptical members of the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed antitrust task force, says satellite radio is in stiff competition not only with free, over-the-air radio but also with such newer products as MP3 players, Internet radio and music-downloading cellphones. "What I need to do is lay out the realities of the marketplace as we see it," Karmazin said in a telephone interview yesterday.

He can expect resistance. "What I'm concerned about now is whether we're creating a monopolistic situation," Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), who will chair the task force hearing, said in an interview yesterday. "I don't think it will stimulate competition, and it could very well take away from the competition taking place now in the industry."

The Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission, not Congress, will decide whether to allow Washington-based XM and New York-based Sirius to merge. But today's hearing seems certain to introduce the chief arguments for and against the plan, whose outcome may not be decided for nearly a year.

Sharing a witness table with opponents from the broadcast industry and consumer groups, Karmazin said he will remind Congress that XM and Sirius charge customers about $13 a month and struggle to attract enough subscribers to make money. "It's a little hard for me to understand" the argument that a merged company would raise prices or reduce service, he said.

Karmazin and his XM counterpart, Gary Parsons, have already visited with the five FCC members who will vote on the merger, and have combed the files of rival companies to buttress their claims that an array of audio services see the two satellite firms as competition. Consumers would benefit, not suffer, from having Howard Stern, Oprah Winfrey, the NFL and Major League Baseball on one radio network, rather than having them divided between the two satellite companies as they are now, Parsons said yesterday.

In 1997, the FCC granted licenses to XM and Sirius on the condition that no one owner control both. FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin has said the merger-seekers must clear a high hurdle to persuade the commission to change the rule. Karmazin said yesterday: "Our sneakers are on, to be able to jump high."

With FCC hearings yet to be scheduled, the new Democratic-controlled Congress will get the first public whack at the debate. Conyers, a champion of liberal causes and a 42-year House veteran, called it "a great discussion, because it gets into the whole question of where the consumer comes in when these mergers take place. And too often recently, they've been taking place with too little concern for the people who are paying the freight."

As a sign of how complex the debate could become, Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), chairman of the Commerce and Energy Committee, yesterday addressed the National Association of Broadcasters, a chief critic of the proposed merger. Dingell made no reference to the XM-Sirius matter in his prepared remarks but nonetheless offered a tidbit that might underscore Karmazin's main point. Referring to rapidly changing technology, Dingell told the broadcasters: "Believe it or not, my favorite Gilbert and Sullivan tunes are delivered to me via iPod."

XM and Sirius have lost millions of dollars, signing multimillion-dollar contracts with Stern, Winfrey, sports leagues and others in their attempts to lure subscribers. Yesterday, Sirius reported a narrower loss for fourth quarter, as revenue rose substantially.

Revenue was $193.4 million, compared with $80 million in the fourth quarter of 2005. Sirius lost $245.6 million (17 cents a share), compared with $311.4 million (23 cents) a year earlier.

Sirius Radio Chief Urges Merger (NYT)

By Richard Siklos

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

The chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, Mel Karmazin, is taking the campaign to sell his company's proposed merger with XM Satellite Radio to Washington.

On Monday, Mr. Karmazin appeared on the often-bawdy Howard Stern show on Sirius. Today, he will speak at a hearing of the newly created House Antitrust Task Force in Washington.

"I absolutely welcome the opportunity because I think there is a lot of misinformation out there about the merger," Mr. Karmazin said of the hearing.

In particular the National Association of Broadcasters, which represents the commercial radio stations and has been an opponent of satellite radio, has warned that the merger announced last week would create a monopoly that would limit consumer choice and lead to higher prices.

Mr. Karmazin said yesterday that he would tell the task force that the opposite was true. Consumers will be more inclined to subscribe to a single service, he said, because XM and Sirius delivered exclusive programming — like Mr. Stern on Sirius and the Major League Baseball on XM — that the other service does not.

And he said he was willing to commit to the Federal Communications Commission that the merger would lower consumer prices below the $12.95 a month both charge, although he did not specify how much.

Mr. Karmazin also conceded that making all programming that was currently available exclusively to one service available on both, like sporting events, would require renegotiating those contracts.

Sirius also posted a fourth-quarter loss of $245.6 million, or 17 cents a share, compared with a loss of $311.4 million, or 23 cents a share, a year earlier. Revenue more than doubled to $193.4 million from $80 million in the quarter. For 2006, the company added 2.7 million subscribers to just over 6 million.

Satellite Radio Chief To Clear Political Air (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessnerin Washington

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

Mel Karmazin, the chief executive of Sirius, is expected to receive a sceptical reception today when he appears before a congressional committee to defend the satellite radio company's proposed $11.4bn merger with rival XM.

DOJ_NMG_0137954

John Conyers, the Democratic chairman of the House judiciary committee, like legislators on both sides of the aisle, is suspicious not only about the benefits to the public of yet another mega-media merger. Mr Conyers is also unconvinced - so far - of the merits of the legal argument on which, lawyers agree, the fate of the entire deal rests.

To prove that the merger of the only two satellite radio companies in the US will not lead to a monopoly, Mr Karmazin and a team of antitrust attorneys and lobbyists will have to prove that other devices and media outlets - from terrestrial radio to iPods to mobile phones - will constrain the merged entity enough to prevent it from raising prices.

Ultimately Congress will not have a formal say on whether or not the deal will be approved, but political pressure can influence the two government agencies that will investigate the deal: the Department of Justice, the chief antitrust authority, and the Federal Communications Commission, the media regulator.

Lawyers working on the deal said this week the combined company's prices would also be constrained by the fact it would seek to attract the 90 per cent of the US population that does not subscribe to either group.

Yesterday the image of Sirius as a company that is fighting to be viable was underscored by the group's fourth-quarter results, which showed a net loss of $246m (€186m, £125m).

"You've seen our losses this year and seen what XM's losses were. You're dealing with companies that are losing hundreds of millions of dollars a year," Mr Karmazin said in a refrain he is likely to repeat before lawmakers today.

The biggest question now is whether the argument will resonate with Thomas Barnett, the chief of the antitrust division.

Jim Rill, the former head of the DoJ's antitrust division and a partner at Howrey, the legal firm, says the fact that satellite radio's offering is much broader than traditional radio means it will be "challenging" to prove that a device like the iPod could really compete.

The deal could also be complicated by other political considerations before the FCC, which, under the leadership of its chairman Kevin Martin, has shown a propensity to use merger reviews to press companies on other regulatory issues, including indecency standards.

Mr Martin would face legal constraints if he sought to enforce terrestrial radio standards on satellite radio as a condition of the deal, but the transaction will nevertheless give the FCC leverage to make programming-related demands on the combined company.

Sirius Narrows Loss On Subscriber Gains (WSJ)

By Ellen Sheng

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Sirius Satellite Radio Inc., which recently agreed to merge with rival XM Satellite Holdings Inc., posted a narrower fourth-quarter net loss Tuesday as revenue more than doubled and subscriber growth continued.

Sirius, New York, which boasts a programming lineup that includes shock jock Howard Stern and National Football League games, also said it expects to end the year with eight million subscribers, up from its current 6.02 million, and to post total revenue of about $1 billion.

1 REPLY ALL

Is the XM-Sirius deal good for consumers? Should antitrust regulators approve it? Read an online debate2 between consumer advocate Mark Cooper and antitrust lawyer Donald Russell.

The country's second-largest satellite radio company behind XM Satellite, Sirius said the results pointed to its continued strength. Since adding Howard Stern and others to its lineup, the operator has enjoyed stronger retail sales growth than its rival.

Sirius added 905,247 net new subscribers during the quarter, down from 1.14 million a year ago. By contrast, XM Satellite said Monday it added 442,679 net new subscribers during the quarter, down from 898,315 the year earlier. Last year's fourth quarter was the first holiday season before the highly hyped Mr. Stern started airing exclusively on Sirius. The buzz around Mr. Stern last year helped boost subscriber additions at both satellite radio companies to record levels.

For the full year 2006, Sirius said it added 2.7 million, up from 2.17 million the year before. XM said Monday it added 1.7 million net new subscribers in 2006, compared with 2.2 million the year before.

Sirius posted a fourth-quarter loss of $245.6 million, or 17 cents a share, compared with a loss of $311.4 million, or 23 cents a share, in the year-earlier period.

Revenue more than doubled to $193.4 million from $80 million the year before due to steady subscriber growth and higher net advertising and equipment revenue.

SATELLITE SCRAMBLE

The proposed merger between XM and Sirius would bring together two rivals who have long tried to out-do each other in the battle for subscribers. See how the two companies compare3 in terms of financials and programming.

Rival XM Satellite Radio, which features Opie and Anthony and Oprah Winfrey, similarly reported a narrower a fourth-quarter loss Monday. The company said results were helped by a 45% increased in revenue. (See related article4.)

Sirius and XM announced a merger last Monday under which Sirius would distribute 4.6 of its shares for every XM share. The companies expect the $11.4 billion deal to close by the end of the year.

Regulatory approval is the biggest question mark hanging over the deal. There are only two satellite radio companies licensed to operate in the country and, under Federal Communications Commission rules, the two wouldn't be allowed to merge. The companies are arguing that competitive concerns shouldn't be an issue because the market includes Internet radio and MP3 players as well as traditional radio.

XM and Sirius have said the merger would ultimately cut costs by an estimated $5 billion to $6 billion. Executives have also said the merger would help the companies compete more effectively.

Sirius said that in the fourth quarter, subscriber acquisition costs fell to $121 million from $145.2 million a year earlier. Subscriber acquisition cost per gross subscriber fell 9% to $103 million from $113 million in the prior-year quarter.

Average revenue per subscriber, a closely watched measurement in the industry, rose to $10.39 from $9.02 a year earlier during the quarter. Churn, or the rate of monthly customer losses, was 2% compared with 1.5% a year ago. Churn is expected to come between 2.2% and 2.4% in 2007.

Sirius Business (WSJ)

By David R. Henderson

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

In expressing its strong reservations about the proposed merger between Sirius and XM, the Federal Communications Commission seems to think that there are only two competitors and that a merger would reduce the number to one. But that's true only if the relevant market is the satellite broadcasting market.

In fact, the market is much larger, including at a minimum all existing radio stations. If you doubt that, ask yourself how you would decide whether or not to subscribe to Sirius or XM. Surely a big part of your decision is the quality and range of programming you can get on "free" radio.

That alone is strong enough evidence for allowing the merger. But there is even stronger evidence, and it has to do with how XM's and Sirius's "free-radio" competitors view the merger. Here we might draw upon the wisdom of MIT economist Morris Adelman, who wrote about 50 years ago: "A useful if not very precise index of the strength of competition . . . is the resentment of unsuccessful competitors."

In other words, if some competitors in an industry resent others and even end up going out of business, competition is alive and well. It's when the competitors get too cozy that we need to worry. It follows that if existing competitors oppose a merger, the merger is likely to be good for consumers.

Look at what the "free" broadcasters are saying about the XM-Sirius merger. As this newspaper recently reported, "The radio industry has loudly opposed the deal since it was announced, and broadcasters cite satellite-radio operators as major competitors in securities filings." Traditional radio broadcasters understand that they are competing with satellite radio. And they oppose the merger. This second fact has been underappreciated.

Suppose you buy regularly from a firm that wants to merge with another firm in the same industry. You might worry that the merged firm would use its increased market power to raise the price you pay. But imagine if you notice that these two firms' other competitors are among those clamoring for the government to prevent the merger.

Would these other competitors oppose the merger if they thought the merger would raise prices for what you bought? Not likely. If that is what they thought would happen, these other competitors would love the merger -- because it would allow them to raise their own prices somewhat, or to keep their prices the same but sell more.

If they oppose the merger, the reason is far more likely to be that they fear the net effect would be to lower the prices of the goods or services they sold -- which means that consumers would be better off with the merger than without.

How can a merger lead to lower prices? A larger firm might have increased market power, allowing it to raise prices; but the larger firm might have economies of scale, leading to reduced costs and lower prices.

Which effect the merger would create is of course uncertain -- but what competing firms think about the proposed merger is a very strong clue, as they typically have more information about the market than do the regulators. When competitors oppose a merger -- as is the case of "free radio" broadcasters with regard to Sirius and XM -- they must be making a judgment that the "economies-of-scale effect" outweighs the "market-power effect." The FCC should take them at their word.

Of course, this is not a foolproof criterion. If competitors began to anticipate that regulators would take into account their opposition to, or support of, a merger, they might try to game the system. If they actually wanted the merger blocked, they would publicly support it. If they thought prices would rise after the merger to their benefit, they might publicly oppose it.

But we can trust that the FCC is not thinking that way, as it is still hung up on a fallaciously narrow definition of the market. This is the bottom line: If the FCC cares about consumers and not about making things cozy for traditional broadcasters, it should allow the XM-Sirius merger.

TXU Profit Up 33%; Dynegy Posts Loss (AP)

The Dallas-based utility TXU Corporation reported a 33 percent increase in profit yesterday, despite weak revenue caused by mild winter weather, but another Texas utility, Dynegy, swung to a loss of $58 million as revenue fell and it took charges for a revamping.

TXU, which has accepted an offer to be bought for $45 billion in what would be the largest leveraged buyout ever, said it earned $475 million, or $1.03 a share, up from $356 million, or 74 cents a share, in the fourth quarter a year earlier.

Excluding what TXU termed one-time charges, the company said it would have earned $1.20 a share, which matched the forecast of analysts, who usually exclude those items from their estimates.

For all of 2006, TXU said it earned $2.55 billion, or $5.46 a share, up from $1.71 billion, or $2.50 a share, in 2005.

Dynegy, a power producer based in Houston that flirted with bankruptcy a few years ago, said yesterday that its loss for the fourth quarter was 12 cents a share, in contrast to a profit of $293 million, or 74 cents a share, in the quarter a year ago, when income from discontinued operations lifted results.

Sales fell 36 percent, to $397 million, from $622 million in the year-ago period. For all of 2006, Dynegy said it lost $342 million, or 75 cents a share, as it incurred $343 million in after-tax charges related to its financial revamping.

The company said that it was positioning itself for growth, starting with the $4.1 billion acquisition of the generating power of a rival, the privately held LS Power Group; that deal is to be completed by the end of March.

The two companies also plan to become joint-venture partners in nine power plants under development.

Another utility, the AES Corporation, a power producer based in Arlington, Va., said yesterday that it had completed an agreement to sell its majority stake in La Electricidad de Caracas, a Venezuelan utility, to Petróleos de Venezuela, the state-owned oil company, for $739 million.

AES also announced that it was investigating the company's accounting for stock option grants and planned to restate earnings for the first nine months of 2006 and for the years 2005 and 2004. The company said the restatements were not likely to be material or to affect cash balances.

In California, Bloomberg News reported that an appeals court ruled that AES and Dynegy could not be sued in state court over claims that they manipulated power prices during the state's energy crisis in 2000 and 2001.

The California Court of Appeals in San Diego, upholding a lower court's dismissal of a group of lawsuits brought by California municipalities and consumers, said that the antitrust claims were pre-empted by federal laws regulating the wholesale electricity market and that a state court could not determine reasonable wholesale power rates.

The case was part of a multibillion-dollar fight between California and power companies stemming from brown-outs and a tenfold price increase during the crisis. AES, Dynegy, Sempra Energy and Morgan Stanley Capital Group were the remaining defendants in the case.

Next Step In TXU Deal Is Backdrop Of Conference (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

New York Times, February 28, 2007

Will anyone dare to mount a rival bid for TXU?

That was the question being whispered yesterday in Frankfurt where many of the world's private equity chiefs were gathered for Super Return, one of the industry's best-attended gatherings.

Speakers included David Bonderman of the Texas Pacific Group, which helped to lead Monday's $45 billion TXU takeover; Todd Fisher of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, the other lead investor in the TXU deal; and Stephen A. Schwarzman of the Blackstone Group, considered one of the most likely candidates to try to crash the TXU sale.

A private equity firm's effort to break up the TXU deal could be a crucial test of the intertwined relationships that so far have limited all-out brawls. Critics contend that the firms, which frequently partner with one another, have a gentleman's agreement not to start bidding wars once a deal is struck.

As an illustration of the clubbiness of the private equity business, no private equity firm to date has publicly tried to top an offer from one its rivals. The Justice Department started an informal inquiry into the possibility of collusion at at least four of the big firms — Kohlberg Kravis Roberts; the Carlyle Group; Silver Lake Partners; and Clayton, Dubilier & Rice — last fall.

It is an issue, among many, that has the buyout kings worried. Mr. Bonderman said during his keynote speech that the industry's image was "something that's probably on everybody's mind."

The industry may have begun to change that with its "green" deal for TXU — among other things, the buyers agreed to scuttle plans for several new coal-fired power plants. A bidding battle over a deal could further change its reputation for mutual back-scratching.

TXU has all the hallmarks of a prize in a private equity tug of war.

The price that Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific agreed to pay — $69.25 a share, representing a 25 percent premium over the average closing price in the 20 days ending Feb. 22 — leaves room for a rival to top it and still make a 20 percent annual return on the deal, analysts said. Investors appear to be betting on a higher bid: shares of TXU closed yesterday at $67.03.

TXU's current deal allows the company to shop itself around for 50 days. The company was represented by Credit Suisse in its deal, and has hired Lazard to look for new buyers.

And then there is the issue of ego: private equity firms constantly talk about trying to outdo the other for the crown, however temporary, of mounting the largest deal ever.

Blackstone, which held that title until last week with its $39 billion acquisition of Equity Office Properties Trust, is planning to take a look at TXU, people close to the firm said. A spokesman for the firm declined to comment. Mr. Schwarzman did not answer questions about the matter in Frankfurt.

Blackstone appears to have been left out of the deal by Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific. Those three firms, together with Hellman & Friedman, acquired Texas Genco Holdings together in 2004, for $3.65 billion.

The Carlyle Group, which has a long history in the energy sector, is also considering jumping into the process, people close to that firm said. Carlyle would have seemed like a natural buying partner for TXU. Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who once worked as an adviser to Carlyle, is advisory chairman to Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific. A spokesman for Carlyle declined to comment.

Anyone considering a rival bid for TXU has some hurdles to clear. The buyers have an impressive roster of political relationships and endorsements from environmental groups.

"And I want to say, 'God bless this takeover of TXU by the private equity market this week,' " Jeremy Rifkin, president of the Foundation on Economic Trends, said yesterday at Super Returns, echoing a view that appears to be shared by regulators.

Just yesterday, Senator John Kerry praised the TXU deal even as he said he would hold a hearing on it, saying, "I'm pleased to see that TXU was open to working with the environmental community and I'd like to see similar cooperation extended in other parts of the country,"

Analysts say, however, that a buyer with a higher offer might win the same endorsements by agreeing to the same environmental plan.

Court Sides With N.C. Cigarette Maker In Wholesalers Dispute (AP)

By Duncan Mansfield, Associated Press Writer

A federal appeals court on Tuesday rejected a lawsuit by 22 cigarette wholesalers claiming that R.J. Reynolds Co.'s discount pricing program was discriminatory.

The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati affirmed a summary judgment in favor of the North Carolina-based tobacco company, a part of Reynolds American Inc., issued in 2005 by U.S. District Judge J. Ronnie Greer in Greeneville.

"Defendant's program is designed to promote its financial welfare at the expense of the wholesalers," the appeals court wrote. "Perhaps it is unfair, but it is not illegal."

"OK," plaintiffs attorney Paul Smith of Washington, D.C., said when told of the decision Tuesday by The Associated Press, declining further comment. Other plaintiffs' attorneys did not immediately return calls.

"Previously, the court upheld R.J. Reynolds' right to choose its own distributors, and today it confirmed the legality of our program, which rewards distributors for selling more of our brands," said Robert Stowe, Reynolds senior vice president of trade marketing.

Smith Wholesale Co. Inc. of Johnson City and the other wholesalers claimed they experienced "millions of dollars in lost profits" when Reynolds instituted a discount program in 2000 to boost sales of its so-called second-tier nonpremium "savings" brands of cigarettes.

Reynolds, based in Winston-Salem, N.C., offered discounts and rebates to wholesalers selling the highest volume of Reynolds products. The plaintiffs, mostly smaller distributors in the Southeast, said that put them at a disadvantage because they had to cater to consumers demanding even cheaper cigarettes sold by other manufacturers.

"Plaintiffs allege that the (program) disfavors them because, unlike RJR's other distributors, they operate largely in rural 'low-end' segments of the market where their retail customers demand fourth-tier brands, and RJR does not price any of its brands at the fourth-tier price level," the court wrote.

The plaintiffs said that meant they had to "pay substantially more than their own competitors for the same RJR products," losing out on discounts ranging from as much as $1.12 a carton in 2003 to 74 cents a carton today.

The appeals court said in a 24-page opinion that even if the plaintiffs' allegations were found to be true, "we nonetheless conclude that summary judgment is warranted."

The three-judge panel concluded that Reynolds' market-share discount program "was offered to all wholesalers using a non-discriminatory formula. It was therefore functionally available to all wholesalers not only in theory, but in fact."

The plaintiffs' ability to qualify for the discounts "was a matter of marketing strategy and brand prioritization," the court wrote. Since "price discrimination has not been established," the judges said, "plaintiffs' claim therefore fails as a matter of law."

"Antitrust experts generally recommend market-share based discount programs like R.J. Reynolds' because they are 'size-blind,'" said Darryl Marsh, Reynolds' senior counsel. "This appellate ruling confirms that view."

The judges said the strategy might "ultimately cull the number of RJR's distributors," but the law "does not require a supplier to ensure the success of its customers."

"Whether this potential loss of participating wholesalers will ultimately benefit defendant remains to be seen," the court wrote.

VMware Fires Broadside At Microsoft (CNET)

By Stephen Shankland, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, February 28, 2007

The up-and-coming virtualization specialist says Microsoft is using its Windows clout to restrict customers choice. Sound familiar?

VMware, the incumbent power in the blossoming realm of virtualization, has accused Microsoft of using foul play to promote its own competing products.

In a white paper published Friday, the EMC subsidiary said Microsoft is using Windows licensing terms to prevent customers from taking full advantage of virtualization.

"Microsoft is trying to restrict customers' flexibility and freedom to choose virtualization software by limiting who can run their software and how they can run it," VMware said.

The software giant rejected VMware's assertions.

"Microsoft believes the claims made in VMware's white paper contain several inaccuracies and misunderstandings of our current license and use policies, our support policy and our commitment to technology collaboration," Mike Neil, Microsoft's general manager of virtualization strategy, said in a statement Tuesday. "We believe that we are being progressive and fair with our existing licensing and use policies and creating a level playing field for partners and customers," he said

Neil added that he believes Microsoft and VMware will be able to settle their differences.

Virtualization lets a single computer run multiple operating systems simultaneously, in compartments called virtual machines. That sharing lets companies use their computers more efficiently. The ultimate promise of virtualization is broader than that, however: by moving virtual machines from one server to another, companies can create data centers that can automatically adjust to shifting work demands or hardware outages.

The Microsoft-VMware debate spotlights the difficult adjustments necessary, as the industry moves into a world where a new software layer breaks the hard link between operating systems and the hardware they use.

There are technical challenges. Software can't be as tightly tied to hardware such as hard drives or network cards, and an operating system might be moved from an overtaxed dual-processor server at one moment to a more powerful eight-processor machine the next.

And there are business challenges too, as companies such as Microsoft and VMware jockey for technology leadership and customer account control.

It's easy to envision virtualization technology as part of the operating system, but VMware has made a strong business selling it as a separate component. Right now, it is moving to deliver higher-level management features that take on products from Microsoft and others.

But Microsoft is building virtualization into the next version of Windows Server, code-named Longhorn, and that could be a minefield for the software company. It has already faced antitrust challenges by building its Internet Explorer browser and Windows Media Player software into the operating system.

VMware stopped short of accusing Microsoft of violating antitrust law--which prohibits a company with a monopoly in one market from using that power to extend into another market--but it came close.

"Microsoft is leveraging its ownership of the market-leading operating system and numerous applications that are market leaders in their respective categories...to drive customers to use Microsoft virtualization products," VMware said. Microsoft needs make sure it's possible for Windows and Windows-based software "to be created, licensed, supported and distributed equivalently on Microsoft or non-Microsoft system virtualization stacks."

VMware leveled several charges at Microsoft:

· Microsoft shared hypervisor interface details at a hardware conference but isn't permitting other virtualization companies to use them. The exception is Novell, which signed a broad intellectual property partnership with Microsoft.

· "Microsoft licensing policies ask for permanent assignment of operating system licenses to hardware and then restrict the movement of those operating system licenses, even for virtualized environments that can be moved seamlessly from machine to machine," VMware said.

In particular, Microsoft permits Windows Server licenses to be moved only once every 90 days, VMware said. That breaks VMware's VMotion technology (which moves running virtual machines from one computer to another) and the higher-level Distributed Resource Manager (which balances software work with available hardware by moving virtual machines with VMotion).

· Virtual machines stored in Microsoft's VHD format may not be converted into other virtual machine formats, including VMware's.

· Microsoft provides support for virtualization only to customers with premier support contracts.

Neil also defended Microsoft's position in a statement and in a blog entry.

Is Windows getting more expensive?

"In the end, customers with mixed environments expect it all to work together," Neil said. For that reason, Microsoft is sharing interface details for its current Virtual Server 2005 product and has begun sharing preliminary details with its upcoming Windows Server virtualization technology, code-named Viridian, he said.

Mac users have been in for a tough haul with Windows Vista's virtualization policies. While Intel-based Macs have made it technically reasonable to run Windows through virtualization, and Parallels' software makes it relatively easy, Microsoft has made it expensive to do so legally. Running Vista on a Mac through virtualization requires a full, not an upgrade, version of Windows. Plus, only Vista Business and Ultimate are authorized for it, and not the far less pricy Home Basic or Home Premium varieties.

Neil, though, argued that most consumers just aren't ready for virtual machines.

"Virtualization is a new technology for consumers, and one that isn't mature enough yet from a security perspective for broad consumer adoption," he wrote. "Our security and data protection features can potentially be subverted by a malicious virtualization layer. We're working with the hardware and software industry to improve the security of virtualization technologies and we will evolve our licensing policies as virtualization becomes more widely used on client systems."

A Bit Of Movement In Antitrust Suit (KCS)

By Julius A. Karash

The Kansas City Star, February 28, 2007

The fight isn't over, but an olive branch has appeared in a local health-care antitrust controversy.

The case involves Heartland Spine & Specialty Hospital of Overland Park. In 2005 Heartland sued several area hospitals and health insurers, alleging a conspiracy to drive it out of business in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

The lawsuit alleged a conspiracy that included insurers refusing managed-care contracts to Heartland. Heartland said being shut out of those networks caused it severe financial damage.

Mary Nan Holley, Heartland's chief executive officer, said last week that the hospital had worked out a settlement with one defendant, UnitedHealthcare, effective March 1. That means Heartland will become an in-network provider for about 350,000 UnitedHealthcare members in western Missouri and eastern Kansas.

Holley said UnitedHealthcare was the first defendant to settle and, as a result, will be the first major insurer in the area to allow Heartland in its network. The arrangement is expected to increase Heartland's patient volume 15 percent to 20 percent, she said. The hospital last year had 827 inpatient admissions and 8,142 outpatient encounters.

The settlement is confidential, but it is no secret that most of Heartland's 150 or so employees receive their health insurance through UnitedHealthcare.

"We're very pleased to be able to offer high-quality health care to United's insured, and very excited that our own employees, who are covered by UnitedHealthcare, can come to their own hospital on an in-network basis," Holley said.

Bill Tracy, the CEO of UnitedHealthcare's local operations, confirmed that his company had settled with Heartland.

The remaining defendants in the lawsuit are: HCA Midwest Division; St. Luke's Health System; Carondelet Health; Shawnee Mission Medical Center; North Kansas City Hospital; Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas City; Coventry Health Care of Kansas; Humana Health Plan; Aetna; and Cigna HealthCare of Kansas/Missouri.

The case is scheduled to go to trial April 1, 2008, in federal court in Wichita.

Rural cuts

Sen. Pat Roberts of Kansas says the Bush administration's budget proposes to cut $143 million from the rural health-care delivery system.

"The proposed budget has drastic cuts in payments to rural physicians, hospitals and home health-care providers," Roberts, a Republican and member of the Senate Rural Health Care Caucus, said at a recent hearing of the Senate Finance Committee. "I don't see how these providers, often the sole provider in many communities, can sustain these cuts."

Roberts said 88 out of 105 Kansas counties are considered rural or frontier and that more than 75 percent of the state's community hospitals are in rural areas.

Roberts said the administration budget would eliminate or cut funding for programs such as clinician recruitment and health insurance for people who can't obtain coverage because of pre-existing medical conditions or lack of affordability.

"I agree that we need to return to a policy of fiscal responsibility and we must get a handle on the growth in Medicare and Medicaid spending so these programs are viable and sustainable for future generations," Roberts said. "However, I'm afraid of going down a path where in order to save a few bucks here or a few dollars there, we end up hurting the people these programs were created to serve."

Onex Gets U.S. Antitrust Clearance To Buy Kodak's X-Ray Unit (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, February 28, 2007

Feb. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Onex Corp., Canada's largest buyout firm, won U.S. antitrust clearance to purchase Eastman Kodak Co.'s health-care imaging unit, including an X-ray business the world's largest photography company started in 1896

The transaction was on a list of completed merger reviews published by the Federal Trade Commission in Washington.

Kodak said in announcing the sale on Jan. 10 that it will be paid at least $2.35 billion in cash and up to $200 million more if certain milestones are met. The sale will allow Kodak, based in Rochester, New York, to pay down debt as it tries to build its digital photography business.

Qualcomm Lawsuit Against Nokia On Hold (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Nokia Corp. said a U.S. judge overseeing a patent dispute initiated by Qualcomm Inc. has put the proceedings on hold until further notice.

Qualcomm, based in San Diego, has alleged the Finnish company violated several patents used to make U.S. cellphones running on the global system for mobile communications, or GSM, standard.

The patents were originally used for a rival technology called code division multiple access, or CDMA, which Qualcomm helped pioneer. Nokia maintains it hasn't infringed any of Qualcomm's patents. The administrative-law judge overseeing the International Trade Commission investigation has two options: dismiss the proceeding or resume the investigation.

Richard Windsor, an analyst at Nomura, said the decision is likely "about giving them more opportunity to reach an agreement." Nokia said that since Qualcomm filed its complaint, it has voluntarily withdrawn three of the six patents from the suit.

Qualcomm spokesman William Davidson said the company was awaiting more information from the ITC judge and that no decision on the merits of the case has been made. The trial was scheduled to begin March 5.

Nuclear Lab Operator Cited For Safety (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

(AP) - LOS ALAMOS, N.M.-The National Nuclear Security Administration proposed a $1.1 million civil penalty against the former manager of a nuclear weapons lab for safety violations that included a researcher spreading radiological contamination to two other states and workers inhaling radioactive substances.

The agency announced the notice of violation Monday against the University of California for infractions that occurred in 2005, when UC was the sole manager of Los Alamos National Laboratory.

The notice spells out 15 separate incidents that violated the Department of Energy's nuclear safety rules.

The incidents include a Los Alamos researcher opening a package of slightly enriched uranium nitride pellets. The package was contaminated with americium 241, a radioactive decay product of plutonium.

The researcher unloaded the pellets without the help of a radiological control technician, and he spread the contamination to his home and places he visited in Colorado and Kansas.

Another incident involved workers who inhaled radioactive substances.

In both cases, the contamination was limited by "good fortune" but had the potential to be significantly greater, acting NNSA director Thomas P. D'Agostino wrote in a Feb. 16 letter to lab director Michael Anastasio.

The notice also referred to a November 2005 inspection that exposed "long-standing" deficiencies in the lab's safety, health and environmental programs.

Since federal law exempted the non-profit university from financial liability at the time of the violations, the UC will not have to pay the fine. But the agency warned the lab's new management team - installed less than a year ago, in part to reverse years of security and safety problems - that those days are over.

"Due both to the recent contract change and changes in the civil penalty provisions of the Atomic Energy Act, future monetary civil penalties imposed ... as part of a notice of violation will no longer be waived," D'Agostino wrote.

The lab is now managed by Los Alamos National Security LLC, which includes the university, Bechtel Corp., BWX Technologies Inc. and Washington Group International.

D'Agostino said he expects corrective actions to be one Anastasio's highest priorities as lab director.

UC spokesman Chris Harrington said in a statement Monday that the university has taken a number of steps to fix the problems outlined by the NNSA.

"The University of California takes safety and security issues very seriously as part of our commitment to managing the national laboratories," Harrington said.

The notice of violation is the latest in a rash of criticism against the lab. Just last month, members of a House oversight committee threatened to strip the lab of its security responsibilities - or even shut it down - to correct security lapses.

Study: 'Tipping Point' For Climate Is Near (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll

Declaring there is "no more time for delay," an international panel of scientists urged the world's nations Tuesday to stave off climate-change "catastrophe" by boosting clean-energy research and sharply cutting industrial emissions that fuel global warming.

Otherwise, Earth this century could cross a climate threshold or "tipping point that could lead to intolerable impacts on human well-being," says the 166-page report prepared for the United Nations. It was written by 18 experts in climate, water, marine science, physics and other disciplines, seven of them Americans.

"It is still possible to avoid an unmanageable degree of climate change, but the time for action is now," says panelist John Holdren, a Harvard University professor of environmental policy.

Without action, the panel says, a litany of harmful consequences awaits: the spread of disease, less fresh water, more and worse droughts, more extreme storms and widespread economic damage to farming, fishing and forests. In the USA, which emits about 25% of the world's carbon dioxide, it could mean more intense hurricanes, heat waves and wildfires.

The two-year study, issued by the U.N. Foundation, says the risk of tipping over that climate threshold rises sharply if Earth's temperature increases 3.6 to 4.5 degrees above what it was in 1750 (it is 1.2 degrees above that point now). That year marked the start of the Industrial Revolution. It led to the widespread burning of coal, oil and other fossil fuels that generate carbon dioxide, the main heat-trapping "greenhouse gas" blamed for global warming.

The scientists say a climate turnaround will take a huge effort. They call for the world's carbon emissions to level off by 2015-2020, then to be reduced by another one-third by the end of the century. Without action, they say, temperatures could rise 11 degrees by 2100.

The report comes three weeks after the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change laid out the latest evidence that human action — burning fossil fuels and deforesting the land — is mostly to blame for global warming.

Tuesday's report recommends a dramatic increase in development and use of "biofuels" such as ethanol to replace oil. It also calls for an immediate shift in power-plant construction away from traditional coal-burners to high-tech designs that capture and hold the carbon dioxide they produce.

The world should spend three to four times more on such advanced energy technology, the scientists add. The USA spends almost $3 billion a year now.

The report also suggests nations define a new category of "environmental refugee" to prepare for people who must flee the extreme effects of climate change, such as rising sea levels.

Conservation May Limit Global Warming (LAT)

By Robert Lee Hotz

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — Dramatic worldwide climate changes can no longer be avoided, but there is still time to stave off the worst consequences of global warming, an international research team said Tuesday.

The scientists from 11 countries urged sweeping conservation measures to hold the expected increase in temperatures to no more than an average of 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit — less than half the expected increase if emissions of greenhouse gas and soot continue unabated.

Based on two years of study, the scientists called for bold actions, including carbon taxes, a ban on conventional coal-fired power plants and an end to beachfront construction worldwide.

The researchers were financed by the nonprofit United Nations Foundation and the 60,000-member research society Sigma Xi.

"Unlike many reports from scientists, this report gives very clear recommendations for what the international community and nations themselves must do to mitigate and adapt to climate change," said biodiversity expert Peter Raven, director of the Missouri Botanical Garden, who helped prepare a Sigma Xi study.

With its emphasis on policy recommendations, the panel's effort marks a shift in the international politics of pollution and climate change, analysts said. Researchers are no longer debating whether human-induced global warming is genuine, but have begun the painstaking process of negotiating international agreement on what to do about it.

Their effort comes on the heels of a landmark United Nations report last month that concluded rising temperatures would continue to increase even if greenhouse gas emissions could be held to current levels.

Global temperatures have increased about 1.4 degrees Fahrenheit over pre-industrial levels, the researchers said. To meet the scientists' goal, global CO2 emissions must level off by 2015 and drop by two-thirds of that level by 2100.

They urged stricter fuel efficiency standards, as well as fuel taxes, registration fees and rebates that favor more efficient transportation, which today is responsible for 40% of the world's carbon emissions.

A 20-fold improvement in car efficiency is well within existing technology, they said. Moving freight by rail instead of truck could also cut emissions substantially.

The researchers also recommended the expanded use of biofuels to reduce dependence on the oil that accounts for one-quarter of the world's CO2 emissions. They endorsed broader use of nuclear power, if it can be made safer. Energy research budgets worldwide ought to triple, they said.

In addition, the scientists called for improved designs of energy-efficient appliances, office equipment and "greener" commercial and residential buildings. Taken together, the heating, cooling and lighting of buildings accounts for about 30% of the world's greenhouse gas emissions.

Most tellingly, the panel called for a ban on any new coal-fired power plants that cannot be equipped to capture and store the carbon dioxide they emit.

All told, the U.S., China and India plan to build about 850 coal-fired plants over the next decade, which by environmentalists' calculations would pump as much as five times more carbon dioxide into the atmosphere than international control measures aim to eliminate.

No matter what people do to reduce soot or curtail emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases, the world will continue to warm somewhat, and people will have to adapt, the researchers said.

To minimize the hazards of rising sea levels and more powerful storms, the group called for a worldwide ban on beachfront construction near existing high-tide lines.

To reduce the effects of climate-related disasters, such as floods or prolonged droughts, the panel urged better international emergency response measures, warning that there may be as many as 50 million environmental refugees by 2010.

Congress Needs A Marshall Plan In Climate-change Debate (HILL)

By Margo Thorning, Ph.d.

The Hill, February 28, 2007

The recent report released by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change on the consequences of increasing greenhouse gases (GHG) is a valuable contribution to the ongoing debate in understanding climate science. However, policymakers need to have a clear understanding of the likely economic impacts of alternative approaches to slowing the growth or reducing the level of greenhouse gas emissions.

While President Bush outlined bold steps in his State of the Union address to slow the growth of U.S. greenhouse gas emissions, Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill appear aggressively set on their own track to tackle the issue. Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has appointed a controversial special committee to study climate change. And, at the helm of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) is poised to push for emissions caps on greenhouse gases.

Al Gore's Oscar win for "An Inconvenient Truth" will no doubt become a centerpiece of the debate and generate even more demand for immediate action.

But before the nation is led down the path of the Kyoto protocol or the dramatic carbon dioxide emission reductions adopted in California, the home state of Pelosi and Boxer, a close look should be given to the high price tag of such "solutions."

The European Union's attempt to meet its Kyoto Protocol target is failing. The European Environmental Agency projects that the EU 15 will be 4 percent over its Kyoto target by 2010 without strong new measures to curb energy use. The EU's emission trading system is not working because only 40 percent of emissions are covered, and raising all energy prices enough to meet Kyoto targets would be political suicide.

Research with a variety of economic models show that the Kyoto Protocol targets would reduce U.S. GDP by 1 to 4 percent by 2010 and cost almost 2 million jobs. Less-stringent targets such as those in the McCain-Lieberman bill could reduce GDP by 1 percent by 2010 and cost almost 1 million jobs.

The real economic costs to the U.S. of mandatory carbon emission targets must be weighed against the environmental benefits. U.S. emissions are a falling share of global emissions; in fact, China's are now expected to exceed those of the U.S. by about 2009.

Unless the new majority in Congress looks at GHG reductions on a global scale, mandatory emission reductions in the U.S. would be all pain and little or no gain for the environment.

A good first step for Congress would be to approve the $52 million in seed money for the Asia Pacific Partnership on Clean Development and Climate (AP6) as prescribed by the 2005 energy bill. The goals of the AP6 agreement are to promote both global economic development and the use of cleaner, less-emitting energy technologies. The AP6 countries — China, India, Japan, Korea, the U.S. and Australia — have half of the world's population, use about half of the world's energy and emit about half of all global greenhouse gas emissions.

Unlike the Kyoto Protocol's mandatory GHG reduction, the AP6 partnership focuses on practical steps to promote cleaner, less-emitting technology for electricity generation from coal-fired plants, capturing and storing carbon dioxide as well as reducing emissions from steel, aluminum production, and coal mining in both developing as well as developed countries. Increasing energy efficiency for buildings and renewable energy supplies are also part of the AP6 agenda to promote economic growth and reductions in all types of emissions, including GHGs.

The partnership relies on sharing technology with developing countries, which is exactly what Sens. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) advocated in the Hagel-Pryor amendment. This piece of bi-partisan legislation promoted the adoption of technologies that reduce GHG intensity (amount of GHGs emitted per dollar of output) in the United States and in developing countries. It was a critical piece of the 2005 energy bill, which President Bush signed. The partnership also owes a great debt to Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) for his leadership in the 2000 Clean Energy Technology Export Initiative, which focused on the commercial development and deployment of clean energy.

In practical terms, transferring the cleanest, most energy-efficient technologies to countries like China, India and other emerging economies whose emissions are growing rapidly will yield significant benefits. According to analysis conducted for ICCF, lowering the emissions intensity of developing countries to that currently associated with new investment in the U.S. would be roughly equal to what would be accomplished under the Kyoto Protocol by 2012 (assuming all 39 counties with targets met their goals).

Facilitating the adoption of the newest technologies will require initiative and vision from government officials. Promoting a favorable investment climate is a key requirement. The Chinese and Indian governments have already taken farsighted steps to do that, but more could be done to minimize corruption and regulatory burdens, establish effective rule of law, recognize intellectual property rights and permit capital to flow freely in to and out of countries. Progress in these areas will bolster the climate for critical foreign direct investment.

But AP6 and other efforts like it cannot succeed without sustained cooperation between business and government. Only when governments are confident that foreign direct investment is likely to take place in the wake of politically risky reforms are they likely to act. As such, businesses and firms from the U.S., Europe, Japan, Korea and Australia that are already present in China and India and are familiar with the legal, political, cultural and economic terrain have a significant role to play.

Remembering the success of the Marshall Plan is helpful here. After World War II, European governments pledged various actions with the money provided by the U.S. government, working in concert with business interests. When Europeans made good on those pledges the plan was extended and broadened. AP6 could operate similarly. Future actions by Australia, Japan, Korea and the United States desired by China and India would be contingent on success in implementing near term reforms agreed to in the process.

Dr. Margo Thorning is managing director of the International Center for Capital Formation (www.ICCFglobal.org), a European think tank focused on public policies to promote savings and investment in the private sector. ICCF advocates the reductions of tax, regulatory, anti-trust, and trade barriers to promote business investment, strong job growth and competitiveness.

A Green Deal On Coal (NYT)

New York Times, February 28, 2007

People who worry about global warming and want the United States to do more to reduce greenhouse gas emissions received some very good news over the weekend from a very unlikely source. As part of an ambitious buyout deal, TXU, a Texas utility that has long been a target of environmentalists, will abandon plans to build eight old-style coal-burning power plants, which would have dumped huge amounts of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere.

The buyers — two private equity companies, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and the Texas Pacific Group — also agreed to invest $400 million to help their customers use energy more efficiently, and to explore cleaner ways to burn coal. In a gesture of potentially broad political consequence, they pledged to join other forward-looking companies in backing federal legislation imposing mandatory limits on emissions of carbon dioxide, the main greenhouse gas.

The deal represents a shrewd reading of the political waters by the new owners. TXU had come under heavy fire from influential members of Congress, the courts and even the local citizenry. The companies also knew that plants using older technologies and producing heavy emissions could be severely penalized if Congress ever chose to regulate carbon dioxide. It also helped that Texas Pacific's co-founder, David Bonderman, is himself an ardent environmentalist who was willing to reach out to TXU's opponents, including influential environmental groups, for their help in negotiating a deal.

Though the deal could be trumped by another offer, it is already being hailed as a pivotal moment in the fight against global warming. We shall see. It is certainly further evidence that the capital markets are becoming increasingly sensitive to the climate change issue. But the country and the environment cannot depend on good sense or even good business sense to persuade other corporate leaders to follow Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific. Congress needs to move briskly toward legislation that would put a price on carbon, either by taxing it or capping emissions.

The Energy Department says there are 159 new coal-fired power plants on the drawing boards; of these, only 32 are considering — though not committed to — technologies that could significantly reduce carbon dioxide emissions. What's needed is federal legislation that would drive them in the direction TXU's new owners have promised to take.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Sen. Asks If FBI Will Punish Those Who Retaliated Against Agent (BVND)

By Frederic J. Frommer

The Belleville News Democrat, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - One of the Senate's most vocal defenders of government whistleblowers wants to know if the FBI plans to discipline agents who a court found had retaliated against a Minneapolis agent who filed a sexual-discrimination complaint.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, sent the letter to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller on Monday regarding the case of Minneapolis agent Jane Turner, who recently won a $565,000 judgment against the agency.

"Given that her allegations have now been substantiated, I am writing to you for information about how you intend to hold supervisors accountable for the acts of retaliation," Grassley wrote in a letter to Mueller. Grassley's office released the letter Tuesday.

FBI spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan would only say that the agency has received the letter and will prepare a response.

Turner, who retired in 2003, also had a separate dispute with the FBI after she accused colleagues of stealing a Tiffany crystal globe from the World Trade Center ruins. Grassley had rallied to Turner's side over that issue as well.

In this week's letter to Mueller, Grassley asked how many FBI supervisors have been disciplined for retaliation over the past five years and what discipline will be taken against those who were involved in the actions against Turner.

He also asks about the role of three specific supervisory special agents in the Turner case, and whether the FBI plans to discipline them.

"Now that a jury has substantiated retaliation by the FBI in this case, I am anxious to find out what the FBI will do to demonstrate that your commitment to protecting FBI whistleblowers is more than just words," Grassley wrote. "Unless retaliators are held accountable, the FBI culture will not change."

He asked for a response by March 7.

In a statement, Grassley said: "It's time for the supervisors who retaliated against Jane Turner, and any other whistle blower for that matter, (to) be held accountable."

On Feb. 5, a jury awarded Turner $60,000 in damages for lost wages and $505,000 for emotional distress. According to one of her attorneys, Robert Hill, a statutory cap on monetary damages will require the judge to reduce the $505,000 to $300,000 - so she will get $360,000.

Records show Turner was rated superior or exceptional in her job reviews until she filed a sex discrimination complaint against her supervisor.

"I'm deeply honored to have Sen. Grassley's strong and unwavering support," Turner said Tuesday. "Senior managers in the FBI, by feeling they are a law unto themselves, are losing the legal and moral authority for the FBI."

Accounting Sought From FBI Director (MINNST)

By Dan Browning,

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 28, 2007

Iowa Sen. Grassley wants to know how many supervisors have been disciplined for retaliation, and if three in particular played a part in a St. Paul agent's case. agency plans to discipline supervisors who retaliated against a whistleblower in its Minneapolis office.

By Dan Browning, Star Tribune U.S. Sen. Chuck Grassley is demanding an explanation of the roles that several FBI supervisors played in the retaliation against a former agent who filed a sex-discrimination complaint against the agency.

Earlier this month, a federal jury in Minneapolis awarded $565,000 to Jane Turner of St. Paul, finding that the Federal Bureau of Investigation had retaliated against her in job reviews after she had filed a discrimination complaint.

Grassley, R-Iowa, has supported Turner since she filed a report in 2002 that some fellow FBI agents had taken items from the wreckage of the World Trade Center in New York after the Sept. 11 attacks.

On Tuesday, Grassley released a copy of a letter that he has sent to FBI Director Robert Mueller asking for an accounting of how many FBI supervisors have been disciplined for acts of retaliation in the past five years. And he asked what role, if any, three male supervisors played in the Turner case, and for an explanation as to whether each would be disciplined.

"It's time for the supervisors who retaliated against Jane Turner, and any other whistleblower for that matter, [to] be held accountable," Grassley wrote.

The agent who directly supervised Turner when she filed her discrimination complaint, Craig Welken, has since retired. But the other two agents Grassley inquired about -- James (Chip) Burrus and James Casey -- still work for the FBI.

Burrus is now assistant director of the agency's criminal division. He testified at Turner's trial that he supported Welken in his review of her work.

Casey is now section chief of the counterintelligence division. He testified that he conducted a review of Turner's files and recommended that she be transferred to Minneapolis from her preferred posting in Minot, N.D., to help get her work back on track.

An FBI spokeswoman said in an e-mail at 2 p.m. Tuesday that the agency was aware of Grassley's letter and was preparing a response, but did not issue a public comment. Mueller has said previously that he would not tolerate retaliation against FBI whistleblowers, a fact underscored by Grassley in his letter.

"Actions speak louder than words," Grassley wrote. "Now that a jury has substantiated retaliation by the FBI in this case, I am anxious to find out what the FBI will do to demonstrate that your commitment to protecting FBI whistleblowers is more than just words."

Grassley asked for a written response by March 7.

Senator Presses FBI For Disciplining (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

A senior Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday asked the FBI whether it planned to discipline senior supervisors after a ruling by a federal jury that the bureau retaliated against a former veteran agent.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican, said in a letter to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III he was assured by the director on "many occasions" he would not tolerate retaliation against FBI whistleblowers and asked how he now intended to deal with the supervisors held accountable for the acts of retaliation.

Two weeks ago, a Minneapolis civil jury of six women and four men unanimously held that the FBI illegally retaliated against agent Jane Turner, a 25-year veteran of the FBI, by downgrading her performance reviews. The jury awarded her $60,000 in lost wages and $505,000 for punitive damages.

Ms. Turner had claimed in a lawsuit that FBI supervisors falsified negative performance reviews in retaliation for her filing of an equal-employment opportunity complaint and that she was subjected to "continued hostility" after reporting another agent's removal of a Tiffany crystal globe from ground zero at the World Trade Center.

"Given that her allegations have now been substantiated, I am writing to you to for information about how you intend to hold supervisors accountable for the acts of retaliation," Mr. Grassley wrote.

In the letter, he asked Mr. Mueller how many FBI supervisors had been disciplined for acts of retaliation over the past five years and what disciplinary actions, if any, would be taken against the FBI officials for their involvement in or approval of the acts of retaliation against Ms. Turner.

Mr. Grassley, a longtime FBI critic who also serves as ranking minority member of the Senate Finance Committee, also asked Mr. Mueller to explain what roles, if any, supervisory Special Agents Craig Welkin, James "Chip" Burrus and James Casey played in the Turner case.

Mr. Welkin, who directly supervised Ms. Turner when she filed her discrimination complaint, has since retired. Mr. Burrus is the assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division and Mr. Casey is chief of the bureau's counterterrorism section.

"Actions speak louder than words," Mr. Grassley said. "Now that a jury has substantiated retaliation by the FBI in this case, I am anxious to find out what the FBI will do to demonstrate that your commitment to protecting FBI whistleblowers is more than just words.

"Unless retaliators are held accountable, the FBI culture will not change," he said.

Mr. Grassley, who asked Mr. Mueller for a written response by March 7, has been an outspoken advocate for Ms. Turner since a report by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General said agents improperly removed items from the site of the September 11 terrorist attack in New York City.

In a Feb. 26, 2004, letter to Mr. Mueller, the senator said Ms. Turner had a "duty and obligation to report such misconduct," adding that her "reward was continued hostility, and the FBI eventually initiated termination proceedings against her."

Athletes, Celebs Accused In Steroids Rap (AP)

Athletes and celebrities were involved as customers of an illicit steroid sales network that produced arrests of four company officials on Tuesday, a New York prosecutor said.

However, Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares declined to name any consumers. He said his office was not investigating patients, but alleged producers and distributors, including doctors and pharmacists.

"I understand that the involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you we are not, at this point, we are not concerned with the celebrity factor," Soares said. "Our focus here is to shut down distribution channels."

Soares was in Florida on Tuesday for two pharmacy raids conducted by federal and state agents at two Signature Pharmacy stores. Four company officials, including a married couple who are both pharmacists, were arrested. They were charged with criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud.

Soares refused to answer most questions about the case, which involves sealed indictments.

"I cannot elaborate any more and I cannot provide you with any more details without compromising an investigation which even at this point is at a very sensitive stage," he said.

The Times Union of Albany, N.Y., first disclosed the steroid investigation in a report citing unidentified sources. The newspaper said investigators found evidence that testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs may have been fraudulently prescribed over the Internet to current and former Major League Baseball and NFL players, college athletes, high school coaches, a former Mr. Olympia champion and another top contender in the bodybuilding competition.

Customers include Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., according to the Times Union, which cited unidentified sources with knowledge of the investigation.

Angels spokesman Tim Mead told The Associated Press the team was aware of the story, adding, "That's the only information we have."

Mead said manager Mike Scioscia told Matthews about it, and that general manager Bill Stoneman and Mead spoke to Matthews. An attempt by the AP to reach Matthews by phone Tuesday night was unsuccessful.

"We strongly recommended that Gary inform his agent and make sure he's aware as well," Mead said. "The information is sketchy at best."

The paper said a New York investigator flew to Pittsburgh last month to interview a physician for the Pittsburgh Steelers about why he allegedly used a personal credit card to purchase roughly $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone in 2006.

The physician, Richard A. Rydze, told the investigator the drugs were for his private patients, the paper said, citing an unidentified person briefed on the interview.

There are no allegations Rydze violated any laws.

Steelers spokesman Dave Lockett told the AP that Rydze works for the club mostly on game days. He is listed among the seven doctors under the "medical staff" designation on the official team employment roster.

"We can't comment any further because we are still gathering information," Lockett said.

A message was left seeking comment from Rydze.

Arrested on Tuesday were Stan and Naomi Loomis, who own the Signature Pharmacy in downtown Orlando, Stan's brother Mike Loomis and Kirk Calvert, Signature's marketing director. Soares' office identified Signature as a "producer" of the illegally distributed drugs.

Also arrested as a result of the New York investigation were three people Soares' office described as "distributors" from a Sugarland, Texas, company called Cellular Nucleonic Advantage.

Before the investigation is complete, Soares' office said, up to 24 people could face charges, including six doctors and three pharmacists.

The Loomis' downtown pharmacy contains a small retail store that sells bodybuilding supplements, a drug laboratory and executive offices.

Investigators loaded boxes into a truck and seized drugs, including anabolic steroids and human growth hormone, said Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation.

"I can't tell you what percentage of their business was legal and how much involved stacking steroids, but there was a mix," Metzger said.

Metzger said the search revealed a "raid card" at numerous Signature Pharmacy employees' desks with contact information for lawyers. The top of the documents identified it as a Food and Drug Administration/Drug Enforcement Agency telephone list, but only lawyers were on the card, Metzger said.

"We found that to be somewhat interesting," Metzger said. "Why would you need to have something entitled a phone call list for the DEA and FDA with lawyers' names if you have nothing to hide?"

Soares' office alleges that Signature filled prescriptions, in some cases from unlicensed doctors, knowing they had not met patients. The office said at least $250,000 in illegal and controlled substances were sold directly into Albany County, and New York state sales exceeded $10 million.

Soares said his investigation began after an Albany doctor was arrested for allegedly trafficking in narcotics online.

Yearlong investigation of Internet drug sales may expose use by pro athletes

ORLANDO, Fla. -- A downtown pharmacy was raided by a law enforcement task force on Tuesday, the climax of a large New York state grand jury investigation into Internet drug sales that could expose widespread illicit steroid use by professional athletes and thousands of people across the nation.

The unprecedented inquiry, led by Albany County's district attorney, has taken New York narcotics agents and an Orlando-based federal task force deep inside a maze of shadowy pharmacies and Web sites that have reaped millions of dollars in profit by allegedly exploiting federal and state prescription laws, according to court records.

More than two dozen doctors, pharmacists and business owners have been, or will be, arrested in the coming days in Alabama, Texas, Florida and New York on sealed indictments charging them with various felonies for unlawfully distributing steroids and other controlled substances, records show.

The Times Union has learned that investigators in the year-old case, which has been kept quiet until now, uncovered evidence that testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs may have been fraudulently prescribed over the Internet to current and former Major League Baseball players, National Football League players, college athletes, high school coaches, a former Mr. Olympia champion and another leading contender in the bodybuilding competition.

The customers include Los Angeles Angels center fielder Gary Matthews Jr., according to sources with knowledge of the investigation.

Sources also said investigators from the New York Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement, which is part of the state Department of Health, recently interviewed a top physician for the Pittsburgh Steelers about his alleged purchase last year of roughly $150,000 of testosterone and human growth hormone.

In the past several years, Internet-based pharmacies have become the new drug delivery system for tens of thousands of customers nationwide, displacing smugglers, overseas mail-order companies and so-called ``gym rat'' dealers who sell steroids from the trunks of their cars, according to state and federal investigators.

Tuesday's raid of Signature Pharmacy, an Orlando business that collected an estimated $36 million in revenue last year, could expose a long list of sports figures, celebrities and others who have turned to Internet pharmacies for illegal drugs such as steroids, authorities said.

``I don't know the names of a lot of the athletes,'' Lt. Carl Metzger, commander of the Orlando Metropolitan Bureau of Enforcement, said during Tuesday's raid.

``This is a criminal investigation, not an administative investigation,'' Metzger told a gaggle of TV reporters at the scene. ``I think that some of their business was legitimate,'' he said, adding that ``much of it was illegal.''

In a press release, Orlando police said the raid targeted steroids and human growth hormone. ``People forget about the damage steroids can cause,'' Metzger said. ``It goes all the way down to the high school level.''

Albany County District Attorney David Soares said his office pursued the case, in part, because New York has some of the strictest prescription drug laws in the country. In addition, Signature Pharmacy last year did an estimated $10 million in business in New York, he said.

Soares said that his critics will probably question why a local New York prosecutor is pursuing the case. ``We're arresting young men on street corners every day for selling drugs,'' he said. ``Signature did $30 million last year ... $250,000 in Albany County.''

Corruption in the Internet pharmaceutical industry, which has received lax oversight from federal authorities, has been organized and systemic, prompting Congressional hearings on the issue and a crackdown in recent months by federal agencies.

Some companies have enlisted unethical doctors who blindly write prescriptions for as little as $25 each, giving pharmacies the authorization they need to dole out thousands of illegal prescriptions, according to court documents filed in Albany, Orlando and in a related federal case in Rhode Island.

Customers usually have to pay high retail prices for their drugs, in part because many purchasers avoid seeking reimbursement from insurance carriers to escape detection. Mostly, they use cash, checks and credit cards to pay for the drugs.

``It's a complete perversion of the medical system,'' said Christopher Baynes, an Albany County prosecutor assigned exclusively to the case for almost a year.

Some federal agents have complained that until recently the Drug Enforcement Agency and other federal agencies had rarely filed criminal charges in such cases. Instead, they were content to revoke the operating permits of pharmacies that have doled out controlled substances, including addictive painkillers, to customers who have not been properly evaluated by a physician.

In part, an agent said, the unwillingness to prosecute the cases criminally has been a result of federal prosecutors in certain areas of the country being reluctant to take on the complex and time-consuming investigations.

While cases involving heroin, cocaine and other addictive street drugs receive enormous federal resources, law enforcement has been slow to catch on to the Internet pharmacies practices, said the agent, who spoke on condition he not be identified.

In New York, investigators have interviewed numerous suspected steroids buyers, including physicians who prescribed or bought large quantities, an Albany narcotics detective, a top Mr. Olympia bodybuilder and the host of a popular cable television program, sources said.

Last month, a New York investigator who has been tracking suspicious purchases from Signature Pharmacy flew to Pittsburgh to interview a top physician for the NFL's Pittsburgh Steelers about why he allegedly used a personal credit card to purchase roughly $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone in 2006.

The physician, Richard A. Rydze, who won a silver medal in platform diving in the 1972 Olympics, told the investigator the drugs were for his private patients, according to a person briefed on the interview. Rydze is an internist at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center. He also is a consulting physician for the FBI and the Federal Aviation Administration.

There are no allegations Rydze violated any laws. Many doctors are allowed under Pennsylvania rules to order and dispense prescription drugs. But investigators in New York said his orders of testosterone piqued their interest because of the large volume, his position with an NFL team and because he allegedly used a personal credit card.

``The doctors pretty much have reign to do anything they want," said Carmen Catizone, executive director of the National Association of Boards of Pharmacy.

But Catizone, who has served as an expert witness for the DEA and other law enforcement agencies in criminal trials, said the credit card purchases raised questions.

``I've never seen a doctor pull out his or her own credit card ... it just doesn't make sense," Catizone said. ``Unless you are trying to build frequent-flyer miles on a credit card, I'm not sure why they'd be using a personal credit card."

Rydze and two spokesmen for the Steelers' organization declined repeated requests for comment over the past two weeks. Pennsylvania state medical board officials also declined to comment. NFL officials were taken by surprise as news of the case swept through the sports world on the Internet.

``We just became aware of this, and we will look into it." NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said. The retail value of the drugs allegedly purchased by Rydze, who tends to Steelers' players during their home and away games, is about $750,000, according to an investigator in the case.

In a related case in Mobile, Ala., two owners of Applied Pharmacy Services have been indicted by an Albany County grand jury. Their customer list allegedly includes former professional boxer and heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield, Los Angeles Angels centerfielder Gary Matthews Jr., and retired baseball star Jose Canseco, an admitted steroid user.

A law enforcement source involved in that investigation said authorities have not identified what types of products allegedly were ordered by Matthews or Holyfield, whom they said used the name ``Evan Fields" when placing orders.

Matthews was informed of his name appearing in a Times Union news report before his spring training game Tuesday. ``There's nothing much to say. A name is mentioned. It's sketchy at best," said Los Angeles Angels Vice President of Communications Tim Mead.

``Certainly as we acquire more information, we'll look into it." Mead said.

Holyfield himself did not comment.

``Evander was asked about this by another member of the media and he said he never heard of the company," Donald Tremblay, public relations director at Main Events, a company promoting Holyfield's upcoming fight against Vinny Maddaline, said.

Still, Holyfield and other alleged high-profile customers represent just a fraction of pharmacies' business, which law enforcement authorities said is centered largely on dispensing performance-enhancing drugs.

The Orlando pharmacy is owned and operated by a Florida couple, Stan and Naomi Loomis, who are both licensed pharmacists. Both were arrested Tuesday on indictments from Albany and led in handcuffs from their business.

In 2002, their company reported revenue of about $500,000. Then, driven by a booming Internet prescription market, and the referral business Signature received from various Web sites, revenue topped $35 million last year, authorities in the case said.

Also arrested at Signature on Tuesday on Albany indictments were Kenneth Michael Loomis, also a pharmacist, and Kirk Calvert, Signature's marketing director.

Among Signature's customers was Jason Grimsley, the former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher who left baseball last year after mail-order steroids were seized at his Scottsdale home by federal agents from San Francisco involved in an ongoing investigation targeting steroid use in professional sports. Grimsley has not been charged with any crimes, but federal agents said he told them about widespread use of performance-enhancing drugs by Major League Baseball players.

In an affidavit from a federal agent who questioned Grimsley, the agent said Grimsley claimed another player, later identified in an ESPN report as former Baltimore Orioles first baseman David Segui, had advised Grimsley on how to obtain human growth hormone from a ``wellness center'' in Florida.

But authorities said they believe Signature's steroid and human growth hormone customers extend beyond baseball to other sports.

During surveillance of the pharmacy last year, investigators said they saw a Philadelphia Eagles football player enter the pharmacy, though they are not certain why he was there. They also identified a member of the Washington Redskins as being a Signature customer, according to an agent in the case.

The pharmacy is located in a two-story, $3.2 million facility on Kuhl Avenue in the heart of Orlando. It contains a small retail store that sells mostly bodybuilding supplements, a high-tech drug-manufacturing laboratory and executive offices on the second floor. A mix of federal and state agents spent Tuesday removing computers and records from Signature's offices.

In the past year, investigators have closely monitored the business through wiretaps. An Orlando investigator also has sifted through the pharmacy's discarded records, removing customer lists and other records, sources in the case said.

People expected to be arrested Tuesday were to be arraigned on sealed felony indictments in New York. They will face extradition hearings over the next several days unless they waive those hearings and agree to appear in Albany on the charges, authorities said.

4 Tied To Pharmacy Are Arrested In Inquiry Into Steroid Sales (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

ALBANY, Feb. 27 — Federal and state investigators on Tuesday arrested four people with ties to a pharmacy in Orlando, Fla., that law enforcement officials said accounted for a large part of the national market in steroids and other performance enhancers that are sold illegally online.

The arrests followed a two-year investigation by the Albany County district attorney into Internet drug sales in New York State. The investigation spanned at least three states, and included numerous people reported to be customers of the pharmacy, including current and former Major League Baseball players, National Football League players, college athletes, coaches and doctors.

At least two dozen other individuals are expected to face indictment in New York, according to P. David Soares, the district attorney for Albany County, including several doctors and pharmacists. At a news conference in Orlando on Tuesday, he said that three people from Texas whom he described as distributors in the operation had been arrested earlier, and that five other doctors would face professional disciplinary charges.

The pharmacy, Signature Pharmacy, filled prescriptions written by licensed and unlicensed doctors who had never met their purported patients, as required by New York law, Mr. Soares said. The pharmacy sold at least $10 million worth of controlled substances in New York, including $250,000 worth of drugs sold and shipped directly to Albany County, according to Mr. Soares.

Mr. Soares said that “there are celebrities involved in the case as consumers,” but declined to name any of the pharmacy’s customers, saying his investigation had centered on “the manufacturing, the distribution, the physicians who are taking part in this.”

The four people arrested yesterday were Naomi Loomis and Robert Loomis, the husband and wife who own the pharmacy; Mr. Loomis’s brother, Kenneth Michael Loomis, a pharmacist at the company; and Kirk Calvert, the company’s marketing director.

All four face charges of criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud, The Associated Press reported. Mr. Soares’s investigation was disclosed Tuesday by The Times Union of Albany on that newspaper’s Web site.

The Times Union named several professional athletes as having been customers of Signature or other online pharmacies that were subjects of the two-year investigation, though Mr. Soares would not confirm any of those names, saying he could not reveal more information “without compromising an investigation.”

One of those named in the Times Union story was Gary Matthews Jr., a center fielder for the Angels. Scott Leventhal, Mr. Matthews’s agent, did not return messages left for him on Tuesday.

Tim Mead, the Angels’ vice president of communications, said yesterday that the team had become aware of the story on Tuesday morning, and that Angels officials met with Mr. Matthews the same day to show him the story.

“It’s a very general story. There are a lot of things in it that are kind of sketchy,” Mr. Mead said. “But we made Gary aware of it, and there will be more down the road.”

Before the 2006 season with the Texas Rangers, Mr. Matthews, 32, had played for six teams in seven seasons and was considered a journeyman outfielder, unable to impress teams enough for them to want to retain him.

But Mr. Matthews's modest stature changed when he had a breakout season with the Rangers, batting .313 with 19 homers and 79 runs batted in. The timing was good for Mr. Matthews, who became a free agent after his increased production in 2006 and signed a 5-year, $50 million contract with the Angels.

A spokesman for the National Football League said that officials with the district attorney's office had not contacted the league and that they had become aware of the investigation only on Tuesday.

A spokesman for Major League Baseball also said that the organization had learned of the investigation only through media reports and had no comment on it.

Another customer was Dr. Richard A. Rydze, 56, of Pittsburgh, a physician who tends to members of the Pittsburgh Steelers as well as private patients.

Mr. Rydze said on Tuesday that he was first approached by federal agents from New York in December, who told him during a brief meeting that he had been "caught in the line of fire" of the investigation into Signature.

They urged him to stop using Signature immediately and to switch to a local distributor, he said in a telephone interview. Mr. Rydze said he obliged, severed ties with the firm, and didn't hear from anyone else associated with the investigation again.

He began using Signature, he said, after meeting company representatives at a booth during an anti-aging conference in Las Vegas in late 2005. For more than a year, he said, he paid the company $90,000 to $100,000 for growth hormone drugs, prescribing them to patients in his private practice who suffered from orthopedic ailments, tendon injuries or growth hormone deficiencies.

But he said he never prescribed the drugs to any members of the Steelers.

"I never have, never would and never will," he said. "My involvement was not abusive. I was doing things by the rules."

Anabolic steroids, human growth hormone and other performance-enhancing drugs have proliferated on the Internet just as legitimate business has. A prescription can be approved by a doctor in any country, based on as little as an online questionnaire, with no face-to-face contact.

The state and federal laws against illegal prescriptions are rarely enforced, as drug agencies focus on heroin, cocaine and methamphetamine.

At least seven different federal and state agencies worked with Mr. Soares's office on the investigation, including New York State health, insurance, and drug enforcement officials, the Florida attorney general, and the United States Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service.

According to an individual with direct knowledge of the investigation, the raids are part of a national effort aimed at pharmacies and doctors — the primary suppliers of performance-enhancing drugs — rather than the trainers and coaches who use them.

That individual, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigations are still under way, said that investigators found more steroids and human growth hormone at the Florida pharmacy than they had originally expected.

The individual also said the raids were related to the arrests of two doctors and the owner of a pharmaceutical distribution company on Feb. 23 in Rhode Island.

In that case, according to The Associated Press, the owner of a New Jersey pharmaceutical company and two doctors from New York were charged in an alleged scheme to illegally prescribe anabolic steroids and human growth hormone to bodybuilders in several states, the United States Attorney's Office in Rhode Island said on Feb. 23.

Daniel McGlone, 54, owner of American Pharmaceutical Group, and Ana Maria Santi, a former doctor who has been stripped of her license to practice medicine, were charged in an 80-count indictment handed up last week by a federal grand jury in Providence, R.I., according to The Associated Press. Victor Mariani, a licensed physician with a practice in New York City, was charged separately and has agreed to plead guilty, prosecutors said.

Investigation Of Steroids And HGH Produces Arrests In Three States (WP)

By Amy Shipley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

MIAMI -- State and federal agents raided an Orlando pharmacy Tuesday as part of a long-term investigation into illegal steroid and human growth hormone sales, the Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation in Orlando said.

The raid of Signature Pharmacy was first reported on the Web site of the Albany (N.Y.) Times-Union, which said it stemmed from a year-long investigation led by Albany County's district attorney, and involved New York Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement agents and the Orlando-based federal task force.

The newspaper said the pharmacy might have supplied prescriptions of testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs to current and former Major League Baseball and NFL players, high school and college athletes, and bodybuilders. Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares said Tuesday night that athletes and "celebrities" were involved but declined to identify them. He also said his office was targeting doctors, pharmacists and distributors, not individual patients.

"I understand that the involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you we are not, at this point, we are not concerned with the celebrity factor," Soares said, according to the Associated Press. "Our focus here is to shut down distribution channels." ...

Several professional athletes were clients of another pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., that might have provided illicit drugs to professional athletes. The owners of that pharmacy recently were indicted in Albany County, the Times-Union reported. An attorney for that pharmacy, Applied Pharmacy Services, did not respond to a request for comment.

Both of the pharmacies offered prescriptions over the Internet, which federal investigators believe has become a primary source for illicit sales of performance-enhancing drugs in recent years as pharmacists skirt lenient laws governing the industry.

A baseball trainer told The Washington Post in 2003 that he had watched one player order a performance-enhancing drug from an Internet pharmacy without an appointment, medical evaluation or prescription.

Twelve agencies participated in the raids of two Signature Pharmacy locations, the Orlando task force reported.

Soares has led the year-long investigation, which he said began after an Albany doctor was arrested on drug charges last year. Investigators collected dozens of boxes of computer equipment, files and drugs during the raid, placing them in a U-Haul truck.

The Times-Union said an NFL team physician used a personal credit card to purchase $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone last year but told investigators they were for legitimate prescriptions.

Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the NFL Players Association, said Tuesday night his only knowledge of the case had come through media reports. "I can't really say anything because I have not spoken to anyone about it," Upshaw said.

Staff writer Mark Maske contributed to this report from Washington.

Drug Agents Raid Downtown Pharmacy After Steroid Probe (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, February 27, 2007

Federal and state narcotics agents arrested the owners of an Orlando pharmacy Tuesday as part of a New York state investigation into the sale of steroids and other performance enhancers to professional and college athletes over the Internet.

Stan and Naomi Loomis, both licensed pharmacists who own the Signature Pharmacy in downtown Orlando and another nearby, and Stan's brother, Mike Loomis, were arrested before a crowd of reporters. The three said "no comment" as a throng of reporters crowded their path to waiting police cars.

Later Tuesday, Kirk Calvert, who was identified as a manager at the pharmacy, also was arrested, but authorities did not immediately disclose the charges against him. All four have been charged with criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud.

Authorities said other arrests had been made, but they did not immediately disclose details.

The Albany, N.Y., Times Union, which first disclosed the investigation, reported that investigators expected to arrest more than two dozen doctors, pharmacists and business owners on sealed New York indictments charging them with various felonies for unlawfully distributing steroids and other controlled substances, court records show.

The Times Union reported that investigators in the year-old case uncovered evidence that testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs may have been fraudulently prescribed over the Internet to current and former major league baseball and NFL players, college athletes, high school coaches, a former Mr. Olympia champion and another top contender in the bodybuilding competition.

The Loomis' downtown pharmacy contains a small retail store that sells mostly bodybuilding supplements, a high-tech drug-manufacturing laboratory and executive offices on the second floor.

Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's metropolitan bureau of investigation, said the Loomises were arrested on a New York warrant, but could not give details. He said Albany County District Attorney David Soares was in Loomis' pharmacy, but Soares was not immediately available for comment.

Investigators loaded boxes into a truck. Metzger said anabolic steroids were among the confiscated items, but he said the legality of them was still being investigated.

"I can't tell you what percentage of their business was legal and how much involved stacking steroids, but there was a mix," Metzger said.

Metzger said authorities found a phone list at numerous employees' desks with contact information for lawyers and representatives with the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Food and Drug Administration.

"We found that to be somewhat interesting," Metzger said. "Why would you need to have something entitled a phone call list for the DEA and FDA with lawyers' names if you have nothing to hide?"

Tuesday's raids of two locations for Signature Pharmacy, which did about $36 million in business last year, could expose a long list of sports figures, celebrities and others who have turned to Internet pharmacies for illegal drugs such as steroids, law enforcement authorities told the newspaper.

In 2002, Signature Pharmacy reported revenue of about $500,000. Revenue topped $35 million last year, authorities told the newspaper.

Soares told the Times Union his office pursued the case, in part, because New York has some of the strictest prescription drug laws in the country. In addition, Signature Pharmacy last year did an estimated $6 million in business in New York, he said.

"We're arresting young men on street corners every day for selling drugs," he told the newspaper. "Signature did $30 million last year ... $250,000 in Albany County."

Steroid purchasers usually have to pay high retail prices for their drugs, in part because many avoid seeking reimbursement from insurance carriers to avoid detection. Mostly, they use cash, checks and credit cards to pay for the drugs.

"It's a complete perversion of the medical system," Christopher Baynes, an Albany County prosecutor assigned exclusively to the case for almost a year, told the Times Union.

Some companies have enlisted unethical doctors who blindly write prescriptions for as little as $25 each, according to court documents filed in Albany and in a related federal case in Rhode Island.

Pro Athletes Received Steroids From Drug Ring, Prosecutor Says (BLOOM)

By Erik Matuszewski

Bloomberg, February 28, 2007

(Bloomberg) -- Professional athletes were among the customers who bought steroids and human-growth hormone from an illegal Internet drug distribution ring, according to a New York prosecutor involved in a yearlong investigation.

Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares didn't identify customers at a news conference yesterday in front of a Signature Pharmacy in Orlando, Florida. The pharmacy was one of two raided in Florida as a result of the probe.

The raids by a task force of federal and state law enforcement personnel led to the arrests of four Signature Pharmacy officials, including Chief Executive Naomi Loomis, the Albany District Attorney's Office said in an e-mailed statement. A phone message left at Signature Pharmacy for Loomis wasn't immediately returned.

As many as 24 people, including six doctors and three pharmacists, face felony charges for unlawfully distributing anabolic steroids and other controlled substances, according to the statement. The businesses shut by yesterday's arrests are believed to supply a large portion of the national market of the on-line sale of steroids, human-growth hormone and other illegal substances, Soares said.

Statewide sales in New York totaled more than $10 million. The Times Union of Albany, New York, reported the network may have illegally prescribed performance-enhancing drugs and testosterone over the Internet to current and former Major League Baseball and National Football League players, as well as college athletes, high school coaches and a former bodybuilding champion.

Possible Customers?

The customers include Los Angeles Angels center fielder Gary Matthews Jr. and a Pittsburgh Steelers doctor who last year purchased about $150,000 of testosterone and human-growth hormone, the newspaper reported, citing unidentified people familiar with the investigation.

There's no phone listing for Matthews. His agent, Scott Leventhal, and Tim Mead, a spokesman for the Angels, didn't immediately return telephone messages. Steelers' spokesman Dave Lockett also didn't immediately return telephone messages.

``I understand that the involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you, we are not concerned with the celebrity factor," Soares said yesterday. ``Our focus here is to shut down distribution channels."

Among the participants in ``Operation Which Doctor" were the Albany District Attorney's Office, the U.S. Justice Department, the New York Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and the Florida Attorney General.

SI Reporters Witness Raid (SI/CNN)

Sports Illustrated/CNN, February 27, 2007

Florida Steroid Sweep Could Implicate More Athletes

As part of a broad operation to crack down on the sale of performance-enhancing drugs over the Internet, authorities raided an Orlando pharmacy and a Jupiter, Fla., "anti-aging" clinic Tuesday morning. Sports Illustrated reporters Luis Fernando Llosa and L. Jon Wertheim accompanied investigators on the Jupiter raid, which authorities believe will reveal a trove of athletes as clients. SI.com caught up with Llosa and Wertheim in South Florida on Tuesday night.

SI.com: What did you witness?

Llosa/Wertheim: This sweep was part of an ongoing operation that involves a number of agencies at both a federal and state level. A really wide net has been cast here.

Shortly before noon, a team -- equipped with a battering ram and bulletproof vests -- descended on Palm Beach Rejuvenation Center. The name of the place is a lot sexier than reality. The offices were on the third floor of a nondescript, mustard-colored building -- the kind of place people drive by and pay no mind to -- a mile or so from the Atlantic Ocean. We saw arrests being made, but clearly investigators were more interested in what material evidence they might find.

SI.com: What do investigators allege?

Llosa/Wertheim: Authorities are concerned about how easy it is to get steroids and human growth hormone (HGH) over the Internet. As an investigator explained it to us, a client using a credit card can "visit" an anti-aging clinic or wellness center on-line, such as Palm Beach Rejuvenation. The customer fills out a brief questionnaire, indicating he'd like to buy such-and-such products. An operator -- and we spoke with several Palm Beach employees Tuesday who likened their office to "a call center" -- speaks with the consumer, takes down some cursory information, and basically takes an order, often for a controlled substance, according to investigators. The operator processes a prescription with a doctor, who is often in a different state (and often being paid, we're told, as much as $50 per script to rubber stamp each order). The signed prescriptions get faxed to the compound pharmacies that know from the very beginning that there is no doctor-patient relationship. The pharmacy then sends the product to the customer. In short, it all makes for a sort of pharmacological Ponzi scheme.

One name that has caught the interest of investigators was that of Richard Rydze, a Pittsburgh internist who also happens to be a team physician with the Steelers for the past 21 years. Investigators allege that Rydze purchased $150,000 worth of HGH with his personal business credit card. The drugs were supplied by Signature. HGH is not only a banned drug in the NFL but the league has committed $450,000 to researching HGH testing.

We interviewed Rydze earlier this month in Pittsburgh about this matter. He confirmed making the purchases but asserted that he uses the HGH to treat elderly patients who are "deficient in growth hormone," and require tendon repair. "[It's] not for athletes, never," says Rydze. "I don't give it to people who want to come in here and look pretty and look young and build up their muscles. I will not do that."

SI.com: What is the Steelers' take on one of their team doctors being questioned by investigators for buying HGH?

Llosa/Wertheim: Team sources told us that they heard about this investigation for the first time Tuesday and "still need to gather information before we can make any comment." Greg Aiello, NFL spokesman, also told us the league had no previous knowledge and "will certainly be looking into it." Interestingly, Rydze told us that: "The Rooneys [the Steelers' owners] are aware that I do this ... I mean, they have my trust that I would never do this with an athlete."

Owners Of Local Pharmacy Arrested Following RaidsRaids Stem From New York Investigation (WESH)

WESH-TV, February 27, 2007

ORLANDO, Fla. -- A task force of local, state and federal agents raided two Central Florida pharmacies on Tuesday and arrested four people.

Search warrants were executed at the Signature Compounding Pharmacies at 1200 Kuhl Ave. in downtown Orlando and at 2304 Aloma Ave. in Winter Park, WESH 2 News reported.

The owners of Signature Compounding Pharmacy were arrested and officials said they could be sent to New York state, where the whole case began.

Naomi and Stan Loomis and Stan Loomis' brother, Michael Loomis, are expected to face charges connected to the illegal distribution of steroids, human-growth hormones and other drugs, officials said.

"We've not done anything wrong," Naomi Loomis said.

Kirk Calvert, who is believed to be he company's marketing manager, was also arrested.

The Florida Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation said some of agencies involved with the investigation include the Orlando Police Department, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, the Florida Department of Health, the IRS, the Food and Drug Administration and the Florida Attorney General's Office.

"They're New York charges, and it's all part of an investigation into steroids and human-growth hormones. I can't be more specific than that at this time," said Lt. Carl Metzger, an MBI agent.

At both pharmacies, boxes and computer files from Signature Pharmacy were loaded into trucks by federal and state agents.

The pharmacy, which makes specialized prescription medicine, was named in a New York grand jury investigation and other legal documents in a case involving the Internet sale of illegal performance-enhancing drugs, some to professional baseball and football athletes, according to reporter Brendan Lyons with the Albany Times-Union, which is owned by the same company that owns WESH 2 News.

"There are pharmaceutical companies in multiple states and physicians in multiple states who are being looked at as far as this case," Lyons said.

Officials said the Naomi, Stan and Michael Loomis will face charges of criminal diversion of prescription drugs and insurance fraud.

The Loomis family and Calvert will have their first appearances in an Orange County courtroom on Wednesday.

After that time, New York officials will move to have them extradited.

According to Russ Scala, who is associated with Signature Pharmacy, the pharmacy sells bioidenticals -- customized, hormone-replacement therapy.

He said the FDA is telling companies like his that when they make customized, hormone replacements, the companies are creating new drugs, which need to be regulated by the government.

Internet companies have made it easier for athletes from high school to the pros to get illegal steroids, and Tuesday's raid could potentially expose a long list of sports figures that have turned to companies like this to supply them with performance-enhancing drugs, officials said.

One athlete named as a Signature Pharmacy customer in published reports is Gary Matthews Jr. of the Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim.

Matthews had a break-out season last year with Texas, which lead to a five-year, $50 million contract with the Angels.

WESH 2 sports anchor Guy Rawlings called the Angels on Tuesday and made them aware of the situation. They have since notified Matthews and his agent, who were also unaware of the situation in Orlando.

The Angels couldn't say much at this early stage other than their player has not been found guilty of any wrongdoing.

Other names popping up in association with the investigation include former heavyweight Evander Holyfield and admitted steroid user Jose Canseco.

Again, at this point, none of these athletes have been charged with anything, but the investigation is continuing.

Steelers' Doctor Questioned In Steroids Investigation (WTAE)

WTAE-TV, February 27, 2007

On Tuesday, a report that surfaced said a doctor who works with the Pittsburgh Steelers was questioned in a steroids investigation.

A reporter with the Albany Times Union said Dr. Richard Rydze was questioned about $150,000 in steroids purchases on his personal credit card.

Brendan Lyons reported a New York state health department investigator, last month, flew to Pittsburgh as part of a wide-scale investigation into the online sale of steroids.

Lyons said investigators questioned Rydze about his alleged purchase of steroids and a human growth hormone.

Lyons said his sources in New York told him Rydze is not a target in the investigation, and in fact, New York authorities have no jurisdiction over him.

Team 4 left a message for Rydze's Downtown office, but he did not return our call.

Steelers President Art Rooney II said he doesn't know anything about the case.

Rydze isn't breaking any laws or rules by buying HGH and testosterone online. However, the NFL has a clear policy banning the use of testosterone by players.

Steelers' Doctor Questioned In Steroids Probe (KDKA)

KDKA-TV, February 27, 2007

Authorities in New York have questioned a top Steelers' physician in an investigation involving steroids and other performance enhancing drugs.

An Albany newspaper is reporting that a task force raided a pharmacy in Orlando, Florida this morning after a grand jury investigation into a group of pharmacies and websites that allegedly profited from exploiting federal and state prescription laws.

Among those questioned was Steelers' team doctor Richard Rydze.

Authorities say Rydze used a personal credit card to buy $150,000 worth of testosterone and humane growth hormone from an internet-based pharmacy in 2006.

Rydze told investigators the drugs were for his private patients.

There are no allegations that Rydze broke any laws but investigators say they were curious given the volume of the purchase and that he used a personal credit card.

The newspaper says neither the Steelers nor Rydze would comment on the investigation.

Steelers Doctor Questioned In Steroid Probe (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, February 28, 2007

Authorities have questioned an associate team physician for the Steelers as part of a yearlong investigation into illegal Internet sales of anabolic steroids, according to a published report.

Dr. Richard A. Rydze, an internal medicine specialist at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center, was questioned last month about a $150,000 purchase of testosterone and human growth hormone, according to a report published Tuesday in the Times Union in Albany, N.Y.

There is no indication that Rydze has done anything wrong, and a spokeswoman for Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares would not say if he is a target of the investigation.

The Times Union story said the investigation could expose widespread illicit steroid use by professional athletes and thousands of others nationwide, including current and former Major League Baseball and National Football League players, bodybuilders and college and high school athletes.

Soares led a task force of 12 state, local and federal agencies in a raid yesterday at two Signature Pharmacy locations in Orlando, Fla., where several people were arrested.

"There are celebrities involved in the case as consumers," said Soares, who refused to identify them or answer most questions about the investigation, which involves sealed indictments.

Pharmacy officials are accused of repeatedly filling prescriptions written by doctors, some of them not licensed, for patients they hadn't met, according to a statement released by Soares' office.

At least $250,000 worth of illegal and controlled substances were sold and shipped to Albany with sales in New York alone totaling more than $10 million, according to the statement.

The Times Union report states that a New York investigator who has been tracking purchases from Signature flew to Pittsburgh to ask Rydze why he used a personal credit card to purchase some $150,000 worth of testosterone and human growth hormone last year.

The newspaper quotes unnamed sources as saying Rydze told investigators that the drugs were for his private patients. The retail value of the drugs, according to the Times Union report, is about $750,000.

Physicians are allowed to order and dispense prescription drugs, but investigators told the Times Union that the orders placed by Rydze drew interest because of the volume, his position with an NFL team and his use of a personal credit card.

A young man who answered the door last night at the Rydze home in Mt. Lebanon said the doctor would have no comment and referred all questions to the Steelers. A Steelers spokesman had no comment last night.

"UPMC has just learned about this from the newspaper article today and we don't have any more information," said UPMC spokeswoman Susan Manko. "We're not making any more comment at this time."

Federal officials in Pittsburgh said they learned of the investigation yesterday after getting calls from the media.

Rydze, who won a silver medal in the platform diving competition at the 1972 Olympics in Munich, is medical director of the FBI's Pittsburgh office, the Little Sisters of the Poor nursing home and Community College of Allegheny County.

Greg Aiello, spokesman for the NFL, and Carl Francis, spokesman for the NFL Players Association, said they only became aware of the story late yesterday afternoon.

"We will very definitely be looking into it," Aiello said.

Francis said executive director Gene Upshaw and other NFLPA officials plan to discuss the matter.

Arrested during yesterday's raids were the Signature Pharmacy owners, a pharmacist and the company's marketing director.

The four are charged with criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud.

Three people, identified by Soares' office as distributors from a Sugarland, Texas, company called Cellular Nucleonic Advantages, were arrested on felony counts and extradited to Albany.

Dr. Anna Maria Santi, whose age and address were not released, was identified by Soares' office as a "dealer" and charged with 13 felonies.

DOJ_NMG_0137977

"The New York component of this case will result in felony charges against up to 24 individuals, including six doctors and three pharmacists," according to the statement from Soares' office.

"An additional five New York doctors will be facing professional disciplinary charges."

Woman, 49, Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering (CCCT)

Corpus Christi Caller Times, February 27, 2007

A Corpus Christi woman on Monday pleaded guilty to federal charges in connection with a money laundering and drug distribution operation out of Country Meat Market, which she and her husband own.

Rosalinda Perez, 49, pleaded guilty to money laundering in U.S. District Judge Hayden Head Jr.'s courtroom. Her husband, 46-year-old Alfredo Garcia, pleaded guilty on Feb. 15. to conspiring to distribute cocaine out of the meat market.

Garcia remained in the Victoria County Jail Monday on a $500,000 bond. Perez, who was out of jail on a $30,000 bond, was rearrested Monday and will remain in custody until Head decides the punishment for her and her husband on May 31.

Each faces as many as 20 years in prison, officials said.

Investigation into the couple began in September 2005, when authorities in New York notified Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Corpus Christi that a vehicle registered to Alfredo Garcia had been found in New York with a small quantity of cocaine inside, according to officials with the U.S. Attorney's Office.

DEA agents set up surveillance and, through undercover work, saw Garcia selling cocaine from the Country Meat Market in the 2300 block of Airline Road and his residence in the 2400 block of Songbird Lane, according to U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle.

According to arrest affidavits, Garcia on two separate days sold large quantities of cocaine to confidential sources with the DEA. Perez deposited the money into bank accounts, which the couple shared.

The couple was arrested Dec. 18, 2006. Authorities found drugs and weapons, including silencers, at the home and business, officials said. Perez told Head on Monday that she had taken part in the crime.

"I helped," she said.

She said she supported her husband's illegal activity by depositing money into their account. The money was used to pay utility bills, car notes and mortgages on a condominium on Ocean Drive.

She said she often threatened to leave her husband and Head asked her why she never had.

"I didn't want to kick him while he was down," Perez said.

Nationwide Study: Drug Use Dips, But Alcohol Use On Rise (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Seven states in the South and Midwest are driving an increase in the percentage of people nationwide who drink alcohol regularly, a new study shows.

Alaska for the third year in a row has the highest rate of illegal drug use in the nation, the study found.

The study, being released today by the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA), found rates of illicit drug use significantly higher than the national average in nine other states — Rhode Island, Vermont, Colorado, Montana, Oregon, Maine, Massachusetts, New York and Connecticut — plus Washington, D.C.

SAMHSA used data from interviews with 136,100 people 12 and older, collected as part of the National Surveys of Drug Use and Health in 2004 and 2005. Illicit drugs include marijuana, cocaine, heroin, non-medical use of prescriptions, inhalants and hallucinogens.

Nationally, 51.1% of Americans reported drinking alcohol in the past month, up from 50.2% in the previous study.

"We see a clear red flag around alcohol use," SAMHSA Administrator Terry Cline said.

Those who said they drank alcohol in the past month ranged from a low of 30.1% in Utah to a high of 65.3% in Wisconsin, the study found.

"We've been at the top of all the states in terms of risky drinking, heavy drinking for a long time. It's part of the culture here," said Richard Brown, an associate professor at the University of Wisconsin School of Medicine and Public Health.

Brown said Wisconsin has a $12.6 million grant over five years to screen people for risky drinking habits. He said the Legislature is considering raising beer taxes.

"We know one of the best ways to curtail drinking among young people is to raise the price, because they just can't afford it," he said.

Wisconsin also showed a significant increase in drinking, along with six other states: Alabama, Arizona, Kansas, Minnesota, Tennessee and Texas.

North Dakotans reported the highest rate of binge drinking, with 31.5% having five or more drinks at one time in the previous month. The national rate is 22.7%, the study found.

Drug use nationwide dipped slightly from 8.1% to 8.02% in the previous study, while drug use in Alaska rose from 11.79% to 12.16%. One in 10 Alaskans said they smoked marijuana. Iowa had the lowest rate of illicit drug use, at 5.88%.

Stacy Toner, acting director of Alaska's Division of Behavioral Health, said the agency's annual report attributed the state's drug problems to a lack of services in isolated communities and poverty.

Bribery Wrecks Drive To Root Out Opium (TEL)

Telegraph, February 28, 2007

The British-backed campaign to eradicate opium poppy growing in Afghanistan has fallen behind schedule and is threatened by corruption, The Daily Telegraph has learned.

Afghan police guard a poppy field in Kandahar province

The operation was designed by the British to end record levels of cultivation in the southern province of Helmand.

A 500-man Afghan police force backed by American private security contractors and two helicopter gunships began work in the drug heartlands two weeks ago aiming to destroy 22,000 hectares before April's harvest. In two weeks, only 1,200 have been ploughed.

A policeman provided a detailed account of systematic corruption within the force. "The only people [whose crops are] being eradicated are those without money or connections," said the man, who cannot be named for his own safety. "On the eradication force, this is being called 'the season to make money'."

Powerful local landowners were bribing officials at a rate of about £500 per hectare. A hectare produces about £3,500 worth of opium.

advertisement

Western counter-narcotics officials said bribery allegations were being investigated. "As with every year, there are allegations of corruptions," said one official who declined to be named.

He said aerial and satellite photographs would be used to verify that eradication had taken place. However, the interior ministry spokesman, Zmarai Bashiri, said he was unaware of the charges of corruption and did not believe them.

This year's effort is regarded as a crucial test of the Kabul government's ability to tackle the drug problem after previous years ended in disaster amid similar tales of corruption.

If the campaign fails in Helmand, which produced 40 per cent of the country's opium last year, then British officials admit that US-led pressure for a radical campaign of aerial spraying of poppy next year will become irresistible.

British and Afghan officials as well as the UN have opposed spraying as a blunt instrument that risks destroying legitimate crops.

The eradication force was recruited in Kabul to blunt the impact of corruption among local officials and police from Helmand's tight-knit tribal society. The strategy appears to have failed.

"The local police are worse than us at taking bribes," said the police officer, who was recruited in Kabul. "But every officer from the highest to the lowest is doing their best to take bribes."

He claimed two battalion commanders and high-level district and provincial government officials were involved. On wages of around £30 a month, the eradication force receives a £5-a-day bonus to try to curb the temptation to take bribes.

Total poppy cultivation in Helmand is thought to be around 70,000 hectares this year, similar to last year's when only 5,000 hectares were destroyed. At the current rate, eradication this year would not exceed that though western officials insist that the rate of destruction has increased.

Western officials were initially encouraged by the campaifgn. on the first day of operations as fleets of tractors tore up fields in Nad Ali district, west of the provincial capital Lashkargar. Attempts at bribery were appeared to be resisted.

Military commanders fear that eradication, delivereed corruptly and unfairly, could increase support for the Taliban.

Bloomington Explosives Case Expands With Munitions Find (MINNST)

By Chao Xiong

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 28, 2007

Military-grade ammunition was found Tuesday at a south Minneapolis building linked to a man jailed the day before on suspicion of having military explosives at his home, Minneapolis police said.

A federal investigation that remains closely guarded by authorities became public Monday during a search of the man's Bloomington house. The investigation continued Tuesday at a commercial retail building at 5200 47th Av. S., which is owned by the man's wife, said Minneapolis Police Deputy Chief Rob Allen. The findings in Minneapolis are not as worrisome as those in Bloomington, he said.

"There's nothing that's raised our concern to the degree they were at in Bloomington," Allen said. "She's [the wife] being very cooperative."

Authorities would not speak in further detail about what was found in the Minneapolis building's garage. The building houses a convenience store, a massage center, a hair salon run by the suspect's wife and a second-floor apartment. No one was arrested Tuesday.

Allen said the man -- described by one acquaintance as a gun-show regular -- stored items on the property. Tenants said he was also the building's repairman. A Minneapolis police bomb squad was called to the scene, and a block was taped off.

The man, who hasn't been charged with a crime, was arrested Monday after authorities found "small quantities" of explosive materials and "quite a few" firearms at his home in the 1700 block of W. 84th Street, said Steve Bogdalek, assistant special agent in charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Authorities from the ATF, the FBI and the state Bureau of Criminal Apprehension wouldn't say why or for how long the man was being investigated for possessing the materials. They refused to say whether his cache of detonation cords, blasting caps, guns and explosive materials was part of a larger operation. FBI special agent Paul McCabe said there is no public safety risk at this point.

The suspect has no criminal record in Hennepin County. He is being held at the Hennepin County jail without bond. Authorities have said the case could be presented for federal charges.

Most of the firearms recovered were legally owned by the man, Bogdalek said. All of the explosive materials recovered can be obtained legally -- some by permit and others without -- he added, refusing to say whether the man complied with the law in obtaining the materials.

Arlene Fernandes, who owns the massage center, said she was surprised with the search in Minneapolis because the suspect's wife is "prim and proper."They have all these little old ladies with blue hair that come in" to her salon, Fernandes said.

Canines Help Search For Gun In Road-rage Case (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, February 28, 2007

Road-rage killing horrifies race fans

DELAND -- Four specially-trained canines are being sent out today to help deputies look for the gun used in a road-rage incident that killed a race fan on Interstate 4.

The canines and their handlers are from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. They will team up with the Volusia County Sheriff's Office to search a large area along I-4 where Erik Houk, 36, was shot and killed while driving back to Land O'Lakes from the Daytona 500, ATF officials said.

Houk was transported to Florida Hospital DeLand after the Feb. 18 shooting, where he was pronounced dead.

Three men -- David P. Edwards, 21, Ronlee Harvin, 21, and Charles Onasanya, 18 -- were arrested in Sanford after the shooting and told police they threw the gun somewhere along I-4 after they left the scene, officials said. Deputies have been looking for the weapon ever since.

The ATF bureau is the Department of Justice's lead agency for training dogs to detect explosives. Its canines are certified to detect 19,000 odors, including gunpowder and explosives, Davidson said. Officials will also use a portable Raytheon Thermal Imaging device to look for the gun.

Agent Says He Discussed Buying Arms From Man (ELPT)

By Darren Meritz, El Paso Times

El Paso Times, February 28, 2007

A federal agent testified Tuesday that he discussed purchasing firearms, in addition to explosive devices, from one of the two men accused of making and possessing pipe bombs that authorities discovered in a sting earlier this month.

Meanwhile, lawyers for the defendants argued Tuesday before U.S. District Court Magistrate Judge Michael McDonald that the government had not established that the suspected pipe bombs actually could have exploded and caused a danger to the public.

Alfredo Rubio, 23, of San Elizario, along with Juan Ortiz, 22, of Socorro, are accused of conspiring to make and possess 15 pipe bombs that Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives undercover agents discovered Feb. 21 during a meeting in Canutillo.

Frank Henderson, a special agent with ATF, said in court Tuesday that he was working to arrange a purchase of weapons as well, including a MAC-10 assault rifle, rocket launchers and a machine gun.

Henderson testified that the Feb. 21 meeting was the second between him and Rubio. The agent said that during the first meeting, on Jan. 20 at a parking lot in the Northeast, he paid Rubio $2,000 for seven pipe bombs, then transported them in the front seat of his truck. Henderson also testified that law enforcement had not tested the devices to determine whether they would explode as designed.

"We would assume they explode," he said.

The judge allowed each defendant free on $10,000 bonds. Rubio was ordered to wear an electronic monitoring device.

IMMIGRATION:

5 Plead Guilty In Illegal Workers Case (AP)

By Michael Virtanen, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 28, 2007

(AP) - ALBANY, N.Y.-Five former managers from a major crate and pallet manufacturer that employed illegal immigrants pleaded guilty Tuesday, 10 months after federal agents staged sweeping raids at company sites in 26 states.

James Rice, 37, of Houston, an executive regional general manager of IFCO Systems, pleaded guilty to conspiring to employ illegal workers. Robert Belvin, 43, of Stuart, Fla., a former general manager of the Albany IFCO plant, pleaded guilty to two felony conspiracy charges.

The two executives could face up to two years in prison and a $250,000 fine, Assistant U.S. Attorney Tina Sciocchetti said.

Netherlands-based IFCO Systems NV describes itself as the leading pallet services company in America. It reported $108 million in profits in 2006 on revenues of $647 million.

In April, more than 1,100 people were arrested on administrative immigration charges at more than 40 IFCO sites. More than half of IFCO Systems' roughly 5,800 employees during 2005 had invalid or mismatched Social Security numbers, the government said at the time.

U.S. Department of Homeland Security officials said the raids were part of a stepped-up effort to target employers of illegal immigrants.

Defense lawyers said they reviewed prosecution material that included taped conversations involving their clients.

"Under the circumstances, we thought the only rational thing to do was to plead guilty," said Belvin's lawyer, Terence Kindlon.

Rice's lawyer declined to comment.

Three local plant officials, Dario Salvano, 36, of Amsterdam, N.Y., Scott Dodge, 44, of Elmira, N.Y., and Michael Ames, 44, of Shrewsbury, Mass., each pleaded guilty Tuesday to one misdemeanor.

They could face up to six months in jail and $3,000 fines for each illegal alien employed, though they likely will get reduced terms because they cooperated, Sciocchetti said.

Charges were pending against two other IFCO managers in Houston and Cincinnati.

White House Pushes Immigration Overhaul (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

For weeks, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has waged a clandestine charm offensive on behalf of an immigration overhaul. He consulted with supportive lawmakers, listened to adversarial congressmen and slipped into the private offices of wary senators, the only sign of his presence the beefy security men waiting outside.

Last week, Chertoff took skeptical members of Congress on a helicopter tour of the southern U.S. border to promote the administration's stepped-up enforcement measures.

They gave chase to illegal immigrants, and at one stop the lawmakers picked up a welder and — with a spray of sparks — helped build the solid-steel barrier rising along parts of the border with Mexico.

Today, Chertoff launches a higher-profile effort to win enough votes to pass a comprehensive overhaul when he testifies at the first Capitol Hill hearing on immigration legislation since Democrats took over.

Chertoff's campaign has impressed some lawmakers who may be crucial to the fate of his effort, but it's not clear whether they have been swayed enough to support it.

"It's remarkable how much progress they are making," said Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.), a staunch opponent of the administration's immigration policies who visited the border with Chertoff. But the trip "reaffirms to me that what we tried to do last year was right — that is, delineate the need for security and require its completion first."

The campaign comes as the White House is working hard to sell its domestic legislative priorities to Democrats. An immigration overhaul is one area where President Bush's agenda closely matches that of the Democratic leadership.

In addition to confronting stubborn opposition, the administration is contending with a tight schedule and volatile politics. Bush has two years left to cement his legacy, but presidential campaign politics will make complicated legislation difficult to tackle.

"I think we've made a lot of progress on the border, but we need to address all the elements of the problem," Chertoff told reporters Tuesday. "We want to work with Congress. That's the whole point of being in government — to get stuff done."

Chertoff will testify with Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, who has accompanied him on Capitol Hill to promote Bush's vision for legislation that would bolster border security and workplace enforcement, create a program to allow for guest workers, and give most of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants living in the U.S. a way to earn citizenship.

The House has passed an immigration enforcement bill, but it is unclear how much support there is for broader legislation.

Debate will probably start in the Senate, with Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) expected to introduce a bill next month that resembles the legislation the Senate passed last year, 62 to 36.

To pass, the bill would need the support of at least the 21 Senate Republicans who voted for it last year. It may even need a few more, because some freshman Democrats campaigned against "amnesty" for illegal immigrants.

The administration is upbeat about the prospects and has started to aggressively lobby Republicans who say enforcement must come first.

The White House hopes that if GOP lawmakers see improvements in border security and workplace enforcement, they may be inclined to support a comprehensive overhaul. Raids last week on restaurants across the country, including several in Los Angeles County, contributed to that effort. So did Chertoff's border tour with at least 10 lawmakers.

At one stop, in San Luis, Ariz., Chertoff held a news conference at the new steel fence — part of a 28-mile test section — to promote border security.

Since Bush ordered 6,000 National Guard troops to the border in May, administration officials say they have seen a dramatic drop in the number of arrests, a sign that fewer people are trying to cross.

As of Jan. 31, arrests were down 27% from last year, with the largest drop, 62%, occurring along a part of the Arizona border where the administration has doubled the number of agents to 850, installed fencing and more than 500 ground sensors, and added five helicopters for a fleet of eight.

The Homeland Security Department also has increased the number of detention facilities to hold illegal immigrants arrested at the border.

"This is the kind of tangible indication of progress that the American people have been waiting for," Chertoff said during the border tour.

The message was also directed at the lawmakers, a carefully chosen group that included members of the House and Senate judiciary committees, which oversee and shape immigration legislation, and long-standing foes of a comprehensive overhaul.

Chertoff and Gutierrez visited Isakson to discuss the legislation he recently introduced that would require the administration to certify that border security was complete before any new overhaul measures could begin.

Chertoff briefed Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) on border security before the Arizona trip. Nelson opposed the Senate legislation last year, citing concerns that Americans could lose jobs to immigrants.

Chertoff also brought along Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), the ranking Republican on the immigration subcommittee and an opponent of the administration's immigration policy. Two House Judiciary Committee members on the trip, Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah), support the White House on immigration, and a third, freshman Rep. Jim Jordan (R-Ohio), is new to the debate.

"It eased my worries that we weren't having enough enforcement, because inadequate enforcement over the last few years allowed this problem to grow," Nelson said of the Arizona visit, his first to the border. Nelson said he thought more security was needed before other changes were tackled.

King, one of the strongest backers of a 854-mile fence along the border, was unmoved. "This is not what you'd call a real good start, but at least it's a beginning," he said.

King said Chertoff requested a private meeting, but it "just identified how tenacious each of us might be."

DOJ_NMG_0137982

"Chertoff is a pretty good listener, but he works for the White House, and they have a different goal," King said. "We have a working relationship and we'll be able to talk about this policy, but my position is that until we stop bleeding at the border we can't have a discussion about the 12 million who are here."

Low Pay And Broken Promises Greet Guest Workers (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

To a rice farmer from Thailand making $500 a year, the recruiter's pitch was hard to resist — three years of farm work in North Carolina that would pay more than 30 times as much as he earned at home.

The pitch was so persuasive that the farmer, Worawut Khansamrit, put his farm up as collateral to pay the recruiter $11,000 to become a guest worker. "The amount of money they promised was very attractive," said Mr. Khansamrit, a slight, soft-spoken 40-year-old with a 15-year-old daughter he wants to send to college.

But after he arrived in North Carolina with 30 other Thai workers, he found there was only about a month's work. He was then taken to New Orleans to remove debris from a hotel damaged by Hurricane Katrina — work he says he was never paid for. This month, he and other Thai workers filed a federal lawsuit asserting that they were victims of illegal trafficking.

Mr. Khansamrit's tale highlights the abuses that many guest workers face at a time when President Bush and many in Congress are pushing to expand the guest worker program as part of an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws.

Each year 120,000 foreign workers receive visas to do farm work or other low-skilled labor, usually for three to nine months. These programs grew out of the World War II bracero program, in which hundreds of thousands of Mexicans worked on farms and railroads, often in deplorable conditions.

Labor experts say employers abuse guest workers far more than other workers because employers know they can ship them home the moment they complain. They also know these workers cannot seek other jobs if they are unhappy.

"I'd say a substantial majority of U.S. guest workers experience some abuses with their paycheck," said David Griffith, a professor in the anthropology department at East Carolina University and author of the new book "American Guestworkers: Jamaicans and Mexicans in the U.S. Labor Market." "It's the recruitment process especially where they get cheated."

The abuses take many forms. Guest workers often pay exorbitant fees and are frequently given fewer weeks of work and lower wages than promised. Many employers fail to make good on their commitment to pay transportation costs. The Thai workers, who were supposed to be paid $16,000 a year for three years, ended up earning a total of just $1,400 to $2,400. Most of the Thai workers had their passports taken away after they arrived, leaving them trapped.

"The program has been rife with abuses, even during the best of times," said Cindy Hahamovitch, a history professor at the College of William and Mary, who is writing a book about guest workers. "There will never be enough inspectors to check every labor camp, contract and field."

For decades, farmers, tree-planting companies, and hotel and restaurant owners have argued that they need guest workers, citing a shortage of Americans willing to fill jobs in their industries. In Washington, many supporters of an expanded guest worker program say they want to strengthen protections to curb abusive treatment.

"The business community supports the idea that these temporary workers should have the exact same employment protections as American workers," said Randel Johnson, co-chairman of the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition, a business group lobbying to expand the guest worker program. "When an employer can't find an American worker to fill a job, the economy is helped if the employer can find someone else."

Critics, including many labor unions and immigrant groups, say employers exaggerate the labor shortage because they are eager for cheap, docile, temporary labor from abroad. The critics say there would not be such a shortage of American workers if employers offered a living wage for these jobs.

In Congress, proposals to expand protections for guest workers include a provision to bar employers from retaliating when these workers protest and one that would let them sue in federal court over contract violations.

Earlier this month, Mr. Khansamrit and 21 other guest workers sued several labor contractors and farmers in federal court in North Carolina, accusing them of fraud, breach of contract, minimum wage violations and illegal trafficking.

The lawsuit, brought by Legal Aid of North Carolina, asserts that the contractors received recruitment fees that are illegal under Thai law, provided far less work than promised, and violated federal law by not paying transportation costs from abroad and not paying three-fourths of the wages promised.

"None of them gave us what they promised," said Pradit Wiangkham, 42, a Thai electrician turned guest worker. Mr. Wiangkham also worked unpaid in New Orleans, where he said the contractor ordered the workers to sleep in a foul-smelling hotel that had no electricity, lights, hot water or potable water. In North Carolina, the living arrangements were not much better; at times 33 Thai workers slept in a storage shed behind the labor contractor's house, the workers said.

The workers' lawyers say federal officials should have detected that something was awry because the contractors were applying to bring in so many Asian workers to work just three months.

"Why would someone want to bring workers from Asia all the way to the East Coast for such a short-term, low-wage job?" said Lori Elmer, a lawyer for the workers. "They couldn't break even unless there was fraud."

Seo Homsombath, the president of Million Express Manpower, a small labor contracting company that works closely with recruiters overseas, did not respond to faxes and a letter to his home in North Carolina. Roy Raynor, another principal, declined comment.

But in a separate lawsuit, Mr. Raynor testified that Mr. Homsombath and he were supposed to receive payments from the recruiters in Thailand. He said he was to receive $1,200 for each worker, ostensibly for training them to pick cucumbers.

David James, a Labor Department spokesman, said the department was investigating whether the contractor failed to provide adequate wages and housing and failed to pay for transportation. He said the department had no rules regarding the payment of recruitment fees overseas.

Advocates say the Labor Department should require employers to repay recruitment fees and transportation costs from abroad when such costs effectively bring the workers' wages below the minimum wage.

The Thai guest workers are not alone in their complaints. Legal Aid of North Carolina has also sued on behalf of three Indonesians.

Several of the Indonesians and Thais have applied for special visas available to workers who have been trafficked illegally. With such visas, they hope to work in the United States to repay their debts.

"I felt completely defrauded," said Indra Budiawan, who had been a waiter in Indonesia. "They never gave me any work after I arrived."

Mr. Budiawan, 28, paid $6,000 — 10 times his annual pay — putting up his in-laws' ancestral land as collateral after a recruiter showed him a brochure about farm work in North Carolina and about the good housing and food that guest workers receive. "When I was at the airport in Jakarta, I felt very happy," he said. "I felt extremely proud about the job I would have in America, given that there is so much poverty and unemployment in Indonesia."

But when he arrived, the head of the GTN Employment Agency, Leeta Kang, told him there were no farm jobs. He was taken to a sign-making store that was the contractor's main business. There, Mr. Budiawan slept on the storage room floor, waiting for work that never materialized.

Mr. Budiawan told Ms. Kang that he wanted to leave. But he said she demanded $2,000 for a return ticket and for the passport she had taken from him. After two weeks without work, Mr. Budiawan fled. He is now living in Miami with two other Indonesian guest workers.

Mr. Budiawan called his father-in-law, whose land was used as collateral, to explain his predicament. "I felt very ashamed," he said. "Everyone was depending on me. And now the bank has taken steps to repossess our ancestral land."

Ms. Kang insisted that it was not her fault there was no work for Mr. Budiawan. "He showed up way behind schedule," she said. "By the time he arrived, the farm owner had already canceled everything."

Ms. Kang said a squash farmer had completed his harvest and no longer needed Mr. Budiawan. She said she had tried in vain to contact the recruiters in Indonesia to alert them that she no longer needed Mr. Budiawan and several others.

"The agents in Indonesia were obviously just trying to get money out of them," Ms. Kang said. "Whatever these people paid, none of it went to us."

Mike Moore, the squash farmer, said Ms. Kang had asked him to apply for far more guest workers than he needed. "She told me to take 50," he said. "I told her, 'I might need five. I might need 25.' She said, 'That's no problem. Even if you don't need them, we have plenty of work for them in other places.' "

Some experts say abuses are more likely when contractors, rather than farmers, bring in guest workers.

"The guest worker program is not for contractors who feel they might be able to find work for other people," said Mary Bauer, director of the Immigrant Justice Project at the Southern Poverty Law Center. "It's for people who have a compelling need to bring in workers from abroad. There's an enormous incentive for contractors to bring in as many people as possible, even when there isn't enough work, because they often make money from recruitment fees."

Experts say that in some states, contractors bring in less than 10 percent of the guest workers, while in other states, they bring in half.

Like the other Thai guest workers, Chinnawat Kompeemay, who ran a grocery store near Bangkok, is in limbo, living in temporary housing in Virginia.

"All I wanted was to provide my children with a better education and living standards," he said. "If my children get the education I want them to have, they won't be tricked the same way. They won't be taken advantage of like their father."

Immigrants Boost Pay, Not Prison Populations, New Studies Show (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

Two new studies by California researchers counter negative perceptions that immigrants increase crime and job competition, showing that they are incarcerated at far lower rates than native-born citizens and actually help boost their wages.

A study released Tuesday by the Public Policy Institute of California found that immigrants who arrived in the state between 1990 and 2004 increased wages for native workers by an average 4%.

UC Davis economist Giovanni Peri, who conducted the study, said the benefits were shared by all native-born workers, from high school dropouts to college graduates, because immigrants generally perform complementary rather than competitive work.

As immigrants filled lower-skilled jobs, they pushed natives up the economic ladder into employment that required more English or know-how of the U.S. system, he said.

"The big message is that there is no big loss from immigration," Peri said. "There are gains, and these are enjoyed by a much bigger share of the population than is commonly believed."

Another study released Monday by the Washington-based Immigration Policy Center showed that immigrant men ages 18 to 39 had an incarceration rate five times lower than native-born citizens in every ethnic group examined. Among men of Mexican descent, for instance, 0.7% of those foreign-born were incarcerated compared to 5.9% of native-born, according to the study, co-written by UC Irvine sociologist Ruben G. Rumbaut.

Both studies are based on U.S. census data, which includes both legal and illegal immigrants. They were released just days before the U.S. Congress is to restart debate on major immigration reform legislation and as numerous states, including Texas, consider harsh measures against illegal migrants.

The authors say their work shows that immigrants clearly benefit U.S. residents and are being unfairly scapegoated for problems they do not cause.

"There are grossly distorted perceptions between what people think about immigrants and the reality," Rumbaut said. "The old bromide that education is the way to reduce prejudice comes into play here."

Immigration hawks, however, took issue with both studies.

Steven Camarota of the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies said the wage study, by examining immigrants only in California, failed to consider their effect on the rest of the country. Immigrants working for lower wages in a California factory, for instance, could keep wages down in a competing enterprise staffed by native-born citizens in another state, he said.

Immigrants, who make up one-third of California's labor force, could also be discouraging natives from moving to the state and taking advantage of higher-paying job opportunities, Camarota said.

And, by examining only wage effects, the study failed to address the declining rate of native-born adults working in California, Camarota said. Their percentage in the workforce declined from 65% in 2000 to 62% in 2005, one of the lowest rates in the country that could be caused by competition from immigrants, he said.

"The idea that immigrants compete only with other immigrants is absurd on its face," he said, adding that no industry in America employs only immigrants.

Peri said, however, that his study's more detailed analysis of California's employment trends showed no displacement of native-born workers. Other studies have shown that immigration has had a negative effect on African American high school dropouts. But those conclusions were rooted in different assessments of whether blacks performed identical work as immigrants, he said.

Of the crime study, Camarota said the U.S. government had failed to systematically collect 2000 Census data on immigration status from prisons and other institutions. The study's foundational data are therefore flawed, he argued.

But Rumbaut defended his study, saying the results were consistent with other research stretching back a century. They include national immigration studies conducted in 1911 and 1994, work by two Princeton economists examining 1980 and 1990 census data and more recent analyses of homicide rates in three border cities.

The co-author of the crime study was Walter A. Ewing, a research associate at the Immigration Policy Center. Among other findings, the study showed that the gap in incarceration rates between native-born and foreign-born men was wider in California. Incarceration rates, which rose the longer an immigrant was in the country, were highest among high school dropouts. Those of Asian descent generally showed lower incarceration rates and higher educational levels than Latinos.

Despite the data, Rumbaut said, many continue to perpetuate images of crime-prone immigrants. Last year, the study says, President Bush blamed illegal immigrants for bringing crime to their communities, as did the city of Hazleton, Penn., in passing an ordinance barring them from renting homes or working.

"The problem of crime in American society today is overwhelmingly a problem of natives, not immigrants," Rumbaut said.

In the wage study, Peri examined immigration flows and wages of California workers between 1960 and 2004 using U.S. Census data. It found that immigrants did not worsen the job opportunities of natives with similar education and experience during the entire period.

The benefit for native-born workers ranged from a 0.2% wage increase for high school dropouts to 6.7% for those with some college, the study showed.

However, the study found that other immigrants suffered wage declines by as much as 20%.

"The findings would seem to defuse one of the most inflammatory issues for those who advocate measures aimed at 'protecting the livelihood of American citizens,' " the study said.

Family Second (NYT)

By Michele Wucker

THE Senate's expected introduction this week of a revamped education bill will draw needed attention to the question of who may live and work in the United States. Making sure that the workers we need can come here legally should be a priority — but it's not. Of the permanent-resident visas (green cards) awarded in 2005, 58 percent went to foreign-born relatives of United States citizens; only 22 percent were connected to employment.

Family ties are profound, and we should continue to admit spouses, minor children and parents of naturalized and native-born American citizens without quotas. But it makes no sense that roughly as many green cards are available to adult siblings and adult children of citizens — with no regard for their job abilities — as for skilled workers.

There are shortages of both temporary and permanent visas for scientists, engineers, mathematicians, doctors and nurses. I've interviewed dozens of talented people who gave up waiting and took their skills elsewhere. Meanwhile, family chain migration is common: an immigrant becomes a citizen, then invites his brother, who brings in his children and his wife, who eventually can sponsor her parents and her sister, who can bring her children and husband and his parents. As a result, the foreign-born population in the United States has increased to record numbers since the current system was created in 1965.

Our economy depends heavily on skilled immigration. Half of research and development workers, one-quarter of doctors and nurses, and a quarter of all doctoral degree holders were born in other countries. Government and trade groups estimate that we need some 20,000 more doctors and 300,000 more nurses. Yet because only 140,000 employment-based visas are available each year, skilled workers can wait five years or more for a green card. Annual per-country visa caps make the wait even longer for high-migration countries like India and China, which send us many engineers and scientists, or the Philippines, which sends many nurses.

Skilled workers with professional careers are less likely than unskilled, low-wage workers to risk working under the table. A few lucky ones obtain visas when they marry American citizens. Even those who get green cards can find their spouses and children entangled in the system; there's a six-year wait to reunite the nuclear family of a Mexican green card holder.

Phasing out family-based preferences for adult siblings and adult children would free up 138,066 green cards a year, nearly doubling the size of the job-based category and making space for green card holders to bring wives and younger children. Adult siblings and adult children could still immigrate under more readily available job-based visas.

As adult-relative visas are phased out, we must address the plight of roughly a million extended adult relatives waiting for visas because of country or category caps. Still, eliminating the system's false promise would be fairer for all concerned.

New laws could make it easier for the workers we need to come in the front door instead of sneaking through the back door — or going elsewhere. Even those who so far have opposed increasing work visas ought to see the value of doing so in return for a solution that eases chain-migration pressures and reflects demographic and economic reality.

Report: Immigrants Do Not Commit Most Crimes (NCT)

By Edward Sifuentes, Staff Writer

North County Times, February 28, 2007

NORTH COUNTY -- A common perception that immigrants are responsible for much of the nation's crime is not supported by evidence, according to a study released Monday by an immigrant rights group.

Violent and property crime rates have dropped 34 percent and 26 percent respectively since 1994. At the same time, the illegal immigrant population doubled to an estimated 12 million, according to the study, called the Myth of Immigrant Criminality and the Paradox of Assimilation.

But critics said the study is biased and based on incomplete Census data.

The authors, sociologists Ruben Rumbaut and Walter Ewing, said immigrants have faced similar perceptions throughout the nation's history. Previous waves of immigrants, such as Italians and Irish, were often viewed as more inclined to crime than native-born people, they said.

Similar views are now thrust upon the newest immigrants, who are predominantly from Latin America, the authors said.

"This myth is not supported by the data and is refuted by empirical data," said Rumbaut, a professor of sociology at UC Irvine.

Researchers said they did not analyze legal and illegal immigrant populations separately, because the U.S. Census data does not ask whether immigrants are in the country legally or illegally.

Based on 2000 Census information, the study concludes that the problem of crime in the United States is not caused or aggravated by immigrants, regardless of their legal status. The study was released by the Immigration Policy Center, a research organization that focuses on the contributions immigrants make the country.

The policy center is a division of the American Immigration Law Foundation, a Washington, D.C.-based nonprofit focusing on immigration.

One of the key findings the study cites is that U.S.-born men, ages 18-39, are five times more likely to be incarcerated than foreign-born men in the same age group. However, the "paradox of assimilation" is that the children of immigrants tend to have higher incarceration rates than their parents, according to the study.

"Their children are another story," said Robert Sampson, a professor of sociology at Harvard University. "They become acculturated. They don't look back at the conditions in Mexico, El Salvador or Vietnam."

Critics of the study said the report is based on faulty data.

Steven Camarota, research director for the Washington D.C.-based Center for Immigration Studies, said 2000 Census data for the immigrant prison population was not reliable because of problems in collecting the information. The center advocates stricter immigration laws.

"The process of collecting information from institutions completely broke down" during the 2000 Census, Camarota said.

That doesn't necessarily mean that the study's conclusions are wrong, Camarota added.

"I think it's probably correct that the foreign-born are less likely to commit crimes," Camarota said. But, "It is the children of illegal immigrants (that are likely to commit more crimes) not the illegal immigrants themselves."

Census officials could not be reached for comment Monday.

Gary Walker, who cofounded the North County-based group Predatory Aliens Stop Killing Our Police!, also said the study released Monday is not credible. His group focuses on raising awareness about crimes committed by illegal immigrants.

"It's a very agenda-driven type of report to spin the facts," Walker said.

The facts paint a very different picture, Walker said. He points to a Government Accountability Office report that says 27 percent of the federal prison population is made up of immigrants and other sources that he says point to a larger crime problem, including anti-illegal immigration Web sites, local news and police blotters.

In recent months, many local governments, including the Escondido City Council and the City of Hazleton, Pa., have adopted laws targeting illegal immigration in part due to the perception that immigrants bring more crime to cities.

Bill Flores, a North County civil rights activist and retired San Diego County assistant sheriff, said the study's conclusions are similar to a study he conducted on bookings between 1997 and 1999 at San Diego County jails run by the sheriff's department.

"They only surprise that I saw was the fact that the local picture was such an accurate reflection of the national scene," Flores said.

That study, called "Bookings -- A Study of Persons Detained in the San Diego County Jail System," looked at about 100,000 bookings a year.

The study suggested that immigrants' place of birth had little to do with the type of crime being committed. About 28 percent of the crimes of all the crimes committed by those incarcerated in county jails were violent, regardless of whether they were born in San Diego County, elsewhere in the U.S. or in another country, the study showed.

Activists on the other side of the immigration debate say that the illegal immigrant crime wave is no myth.

Researcher Rumbaut said anecdotal evidence used by some anti-illegal immigration groups is part of an emotional and political response to immigration, but it is not based on scientific research.

"There's not a single authoritative source for those numbers," he said. "Those numbers seem to be pulled out of thin air."

TAX:

Real-Estate Professionals Say IRS Snares Them By Mistake (WSJ)

By Kemba J. Dunham

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Some real-estate professionals say they are being mistaken for sometime investors by the Internal Revenue Service, and that could prohibit them from taking advantage of certain tax and economic benefits.

Consider the case of David Friedman, a real-estate broker and property owner in Los Angeles. Like many professionals in the business, he not only sells homes to consumers, he also buys and sells undeveloped land and owns single-family homes that he rents out. He says he works every day and has amassed holdings in Southern California and Oklahoma that are valued at $20 million.

Yet after 20 years in the business, Mr. Friedman finds himself in a battle with the IRS, which is auditing his past tax returns over whether he is really a full-time real-estate professional or one of the many part-time real-estate investors who have sprung up across the country in the past decade.

"Real estate is all that I do, I'm not a contractor or a doctor who does real estate on the side," Mr. Friedman says. "I just think that the IRS has some issues believing that someone truly does this full time."

The distinction is important because full-time real-estate professionals, defined as someone who spends more than half of his working hours in real estate and more than 750 hours a year tending to real-estate activities, can fully deduct losses -- including depreciation, interest expense on loans and property taxes.

But those who don't fit into that category are typically considered to be "passive" real-estate investors with a limited ability to deduct their losses, says Alan Weiner, a CPA and tax partner at the firm of Holtz Rubenstein Reminick LLP in Melville, N.Y.

Robert Marvin, a spokesman for the IRS, said the tax agency can't comment on individual taxpayer cases. However, he indicated that the agency is paying more attention to real-estate activity because it is one of the areas where research shows there is a large tax gap, meaning taxpayers are underreporting income to the IRS. The tax gap in income from rents and royalties is about $13 billion and $11 billion for capital gains. (Income from real-estate activity is included in, but not exclusive to, both categories.) Mr. Marvin said that several thousand returns of real-estate professionals have been audited since last year and approximately 3,000 are under audit now.

But some tax attorneys say these professionals are being unfairly scrutinized. "Unfortunately, real-estate professionals are being caught in a broad net that is intended to catch investors," says Philip Panitz, a federal tax litigator in Westlake Village, Calif., who represents Mr. Friedman. "My clients are real-estate professionals, although the IRS disagrees and they're saying 'prove it.' "

Of the eleven cases Mr. Panitz has pending in the U.S. Tax Court, five involve people who say they are full-time real-estate professionals whom the IRS is trying to reclassify as passive investors. Two years ago, none of his cases involved this issue. "Whenever I see this kind of trend going on, I know some sort of sweep is happening," Mr. Panitz says.

The "passive loss" rule goes back to 1986, when Congress added the measure to stop real-estate investors who were receiving paper-loss deductions, such as depreciation, and using these paper losses to shelter real income from other jobs, Mr. Panitz says.

Real-estate professionals were excluded from this act because real-estate was their job. "If that person had a deduction related to the buying and selling of property, those deductions directly correlated to what they did for a living," Mr. Panitz adds.

Since he has been audited for 2002, Mr. Friedman is now struggling to prove that real estate is his profession. He says he has provided the IRS auditor with every receipt and canceled check related to his business. But they always ask for more proof, he adds, including detailed logs of how he spends his time, a listing of all projects in which he is involved and all the people he talks to on any given day.

"It takes hundreds and hundreds of hours out of my time to provide all these details," he sighs. "I just feel like I'm being harassed."

It has been financially draining as well. Mr. Friedman says that in the past few years, he has spent about $20,000 in fees to his accountant and tax attorney, who are helping him prove his professional status. Because his case is ongoing, those costs could reach $100,000. If the IRS does conclude that Mr. Friedman isn't a real-estate professional, his tax returns for the years in question would have to be adjusted and if one factors in penalties, interest and tax liabilities, he could end up owning the government hundreds of thousands of dollars.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Visit Floyd School (LCJ)

By James R. Carroll

Louisville Courier-Journal, February 28, 2007

Silver St. Elementary one of several stops

President Bush will visit New Albany's Silver Street Elementary School on Friday, in addition to attending a campaign fundraiser in Louisville.

He also plans to meet with University of Louisville students, according to the White House and Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

Bush is scheduled to visit Silver Street Elementary, 2023 Ekin Ave., at 2:15 p.m., according to a schedule the White House released last night.

He will discuss his "No Child Left Behind" program, which holds states accountable for student performance. Schools are required to test students each year in reading and math in grades three through eight, and those that fail to make progress face sanctions.

Silver Street, which has 264 students, has made "adequate yearly progress" each of the four years since the law went into effect, according to the state Department of Education.

Silver Street "has done very well" since Bush signed the act in early 2002, Superintendent Dennis Brooks of New Albany-Floyd County Schools said last night.

He called the president's visit an "unexpected opportunity" for students and teachers at the school.

Teachers likely will spend the next few days working on social studies lessons, explaining what the president does and the importance of the job, Brooks said.

The children also will learn how to behave in front of such a distinguished guest, he said.

"Our students will be prepared," Brooks said.

McConnell told reporters yesterday that the president also will meet privately with about 40 scholars from U of L's McConnell Center.

The time and place of that session are not on the White House schedule, and neither McConnell nor U of L would provide details. A call to the White House was not returned.

The White House announced last week that Bush will speak at a McConnell for Senate reception at the Seelbach Hilton Louisville.

The scheduled time for the president's remarks has been changed slightly, to 5:35 p.m. instead of 5:45 p.m., as announced last week.

Asked yesterday whether a presidential visit might hurt his re-election prospects next year, McConnell said he is not worried.

"Kentuckians by and large understand the need to be strong in the war on terror, and I'm not at all concerned about defending my position of support for the president," McConnell said.

President Bush To Visit New Albany School (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

President Bush will visit an elementary school in New Albany on Friday and will speak about reauthorizing the five-year-old No Child Left Behind law.

The White House said Monday Bush will visit Silver Street Elementary School about 2:00pm. Friday and is expected to make remarks about No Child Left Behind at 2:40pm at the school.

The president will be stopping by the school on his way to a fund-raiser in nearby Louisville, Kentucky, for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

President Bush To Visit Southern Indiana School (WDRB)

WDRB-TV Louisville, Kentucky, February 27, 2007

President Bush is coming back to Kentuckiana. The president will be in town on Friday for a fundraiser for Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell -- but he's also making a stop in Indiana.

President Bush will visit a New Albany school on Friday. And right now, students and faculty members are sprucing things up for their special guest. 4th Grader Jacob Domalewski tells Fox 41, "I'd probably scream once I saw him."

It is a big week for everyone at Silver Street Elementary School in New Albany. School Superintendent Dennis Brooks refers to the "Great excitement here this morning." The great excitement is about a visit from President George W. Bush.

Principal Tony Duffy says, "It's such an honor. It's a once in a lifetime opportunity for our students and our teachers and everyone involved in our school."

Duffy found out about the visit on Monday and shared it with his staff: "It was kind of the moment when people look at you in disbelief." In fact, Duffy had some disbelief of his own when he received the phone call from the White House. "I asked her, okay, I'm sure you're from the White House and I said, who put you up to this?"

After recovering from the shock, staff and students started preparing for the president's visit. Duffy says, "We are cleaning, and that is something that we need to do, and we're making space for the folks that are coming in."

The president is expected to update the school on No Child Left Behind. School officials suspect he chose Silver Street because of its success with the initiative.

Superintendent Brooks says, "This is a school that has worked very hard to improve student outcomes and that certainly is, I'm sure, part of the reason."

Silver street has 264 students. The few we talked to knew a little bit about the president. 4th Grader Jacob Domalewski says, "I know he's in charge of the country." And he said, "I know he has two twin daughters who I think are in 7th grade." The Bush twins are actually in college. But students will know that and much more about the president by Friday. Principal Duffy says, "Each individual teacher is going to be working with that all week."

The president is expected to arrive at Silver Street at about 2 o'clock on Friday.

Bush To Visit Silver Street Elementary (WLKY)

WLKY-TV Louisville, Kentucky, February 27, 2007

The White House has released more details on President George W. Bush's pending March 2 visit. His itinerary includes a stop at Silver Street Elementary School in New Albany, where he'll talk about reauthorizing the five-year-old No Child Left Behind law.

Afterward, he'll attend a fundraiser for Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Kentucky). McConnell, the current Senate Minority Leader and a 24-year senator, is raising money for re-election.

Democrats seized control of the Senate by the slimmest of margins after last year's election, preventing McConnell from becoming Senate majority leader.

McConnell, the Senate minority leader, has been an unwavering Bush supporter on the Iraq war and the president's domestic policies. McConnell has said he'll seek a fifth term next year.

No Democrat had announced plans to challenge him.

Labor Rides Political-Wind Shift (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Organized labor aims to use the House's expected passage tomorrow of a pro-union bill to further the rest of its legislative agenda, even though the bill, under heated industry opposition, faces likely defeat in the Senate.

The Employee Free Choice Act would make it easier to organize workers by giving them the right to unionize as soon as a majority signs cards in favor of a union, a process known as "card check" that can take a few weeks. The typical secret-ballot election can drag on for months and is often slowed further by charges of labor-law violations. Union officials see the bill as a key to stemming a decline in membership and correcting a perceived weakening of workers' rights under the Bush administration. Today, unions represent 7.4% of the nation's private-sector work force, down from 35% in the 1950s.

· The Situation: Tomorrow the House will likely pass legislation that would make it easier for unions to organize workers.

· What's at Stake: Unions hope the bill will help reverse a decline in membership, while business groups argue the bill takes away workers' rights.

· What's Next: The bill is expected to stall in the Senate, but unions are using their current momentum to push the rest of their legislative agenda.

Although passage is expected in the House, where it has 234 co-sponsors, the bill is expected to face a filibuster in the Senate, in large part because of intensifying objections from employer and industry groups.

In the past two days, the National Association of Manufacturers sent two letters to members of Congress, saying that the association would use tomorrow's vote in determining its future support for lawmakers. The association argues the bill "further erodes the competitive capabilities of American manufacturers." A coalition representing more than 300 state and local employer groups also is lobbying against the bill, and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce said it has sent more than 24,000 emails to members of Congress to oppose it.

The last-minute flurry of opposition also is an attempt to discourage a potential compromise that could involve dropping the card-check provision while keeping provisions that make arbitration mandatory if a first contract isn't reached between a union and an employer, and assess stiffer penalties to employers who violate labor law during organizing drives.

"There's always the danger that someone in the Senate will see themselves as a deal maker and do something like that," said Randel Johnson, vice president for labor policy at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The Chamber and other business groups would fight the binding-arbitration portion of the bill just as hard as the card-check rule, he said.

Beyond the pending vote, the increasing resistance from business groups also indicates their concern about labor's closer ties to lawmakers since the fall election. Democratic lawmakers are planning to propose efforts in coming months to expand sick-leave coverage, introduce bills on workplace safety, on retirement security, and a bill that would effectively reverse a National Labor Relations Board decision last year on the supervisory status of workers. These measures have been on labor's legislative agenda and opposed by business groups. "It's going to be a long two years," said Mr. Johnson.

Organized labor isn't expected to give up on the Employee Free Choice Act, and the fact the measure is up for a vote at all, and likely to receive approval from a full House, is a victory for organized labor. A year ago, a House vote on the measure was unthinkable to many union officials. Now, the campaign represents one of labor's biggest pushes in decades. Many union leaders are looking ahead to the presidential race and saying that in 2008 they will only back candidates who supported the bill.

At the same time, labor wants to move quickly on other measures while it has the limelight and momentum from an expected House victory.

Anna Burger, secretary treasurer of the Service Employees International Union, said it is crucial to get Congress to act on issues such as health care and immigration reform now. "I think there's a move both in the House and the Senate to get something done [on immigration reform] by June," she said. "I think that this is the moment."

Next week, leaders of the AFL-CIO's 54 affiliate unions plan to announce details on a bankruptcy-overhaul bill, which would make it harder for companies to walk away from wage and benefit obligations when filing for bankruptcy-court protection, as well as a strategy to deny renewal of the president's fast-track authority on trade agreements when they meet at their winter conference in Las Vegas.

Meanwhile, many individual unions are seeking more specialized legislation. The International Brotherhood of Teamsters, for example, is seeking a legislative fix to stop a pilot program started last week that gives Mexican trucks greater freedom to travel throughout the U.S. The union is demanding hearings on the program. "We're going to do everything we can to get this ridiculous pilot program stopped," said Leigh Strope, a Teamsters spokeswoman. There also will be a renewed push by labor to get the stalled minimum-wage increase signed into law.

Labor leaders have tried to position the Employee Free Choice Act as helping to bridge the widening income gap, which they said is connected to the steep decline in union membership. "The single best opportunity for working women and men to get ahead economically is to come together with their co-workers to form a union," said John Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO.

Yet business groups have called the bill undemocratic because it gives workers the option of skipping a secret-ballot election and could lead to unfair pressure by unions. They have also attacked the unions for having a double standard, noting that unions want to keep a secret-ballot process when it comes to the process of decertifying a union.

Some labor experts have said the employer argument is misleading because it doesn't take into account the context in which many union elections are held, as workers may be pressured by employers. "Cuba has secret-ballot elections. If you think those are democratic then you might think these union elections are democratic," said Harley Shaiken, a labor expert at the University of California at Berkeley who testified in favor of the bill in recent congressional hearings.

Despite the battle over this legislation, there may be areas, including health care and immigration reform, where business and labor may be willing to compromise on legislation. A bill on immigration is expected to reach the Senate in March. While a number of business and union leaders have joined together to work to reduce the number of uninsured Americans, there is little consensus at the federal level on what approach to take.

Labor Looks To Score First Big Win In Years (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, February 28, 2007

A coalition of business groups has launched a massive effort to defeat legislation under House consideration this week that is organized labor's No. 1 priority for the 110th Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0137991

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is leading this drive, whose magnitude rivals the 2001 campaign supporting President Bush's tax cuts. As of last week, the Chamber alone had directed more than 24,000 letters, phone calls and e-mails to House members in opposition to H.R. 800, the Employee Free Choice Act of 2007.

The effort has continued this week with advertising in 60 conservative-leaning blogs and e-mail blasts to House chiefs of staff and legislative assistants on labor. Along with the Chamber of Commerce, the business coalition includes dozens of national and local business groups. Together, they are targeting 51 congressional districts with radio advertisements and phone calls urging constituents to press their representative to oppose H.R. 800.

These districts cover 29 Democrats and 22 Republicans, including freshman Reps. Heath Shuler (D-N.C.), Tim Mahoney (D-Fla.), Ron Klein (D-Fla.), Joe Courtney (D-Conn.), David Loebsack (D-Iowa), Jerry McNerney (D-Calif.), Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), Steve Kagen (D-Wis.), and Carol Shea-Porter (D-N.H.). All but Mahoney and Buchanan are cosponsors of the bill.

In terms of the effort, "we're beating what we saw for the tax coalition in 2001," said Bruce Josten, executive vice president of government affairs for the Chamber. Bill Miller, the chamber's vice president for congressional affairs, said his group is also outpacing its work in the 2001 "prize fight" that it won over labor when Congress approved legislation rolling back the Clinton administration's ergonomic rules.

Organized labor's effort is just as intense. The AFL-CIO has sent more than 4.7 million messages to union members, their friends and family, and other allies, who have responded by sending 257,000 messages as of last week to members of Congress, sources with the group said.

The AFL-CIO last week organized 90 events across the country with various members of Congress, including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), to raise awareness of the bill. It is also running newspaper advertisements in support of the bill.

Despite these efforts, sources on both sides acknowledge the bill is unlikely to become law this year. While the House will likely approve the measure this week, the Senate will probably not to be able to muster the 60 votes necessary to break an expected GOP filibuster on the legislation.

The tough Senate fight is illustrated by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the only GOP senator to cosponsor identical legislation last year. This year, Specter, whose business groups have lobbied on the issue, has taken no position, according to his office.

"It might not happen in this Congress," said Kelly Ross, a legislative representative of the AFL-CIO. "But we'll try to make it happen in this Congress, and if it doesn't, we'll try the next Congress."

Debate over the bill's "card check" or "secret ballot" provision has dominated both sides' campaigns. The bill's main section would effectively rewrite U.S. law so that workers would no longer be required to use a secret ballot when voting on whether to unionize.

If the legislation becomes law, workers could form unions as long as a majority of employees sign cards designating a labor group as their bargaining representative. Business groups charge that such an open system with no secret ballot would allow union supporters to bully and intimidate workers into joining unions. Union representatives counter that the present system allows employers to get rid of union organizers and threaten and intimidate workers into voting against forming a union.

But the two sides do agree that the bill would generally make it easier for workers to unionize, which could have enormous implications in the political world. Organized labor is a consistent financial backer of Democratic campaigns.

The House bill includes two other contentious sections besides the card-check provision, and some business sources say they could accept them only if the Senate removed the card-check section. According to the Chamber's Josten, one of those is a provision requiring that employees and employer go to binding arbitration if they cannot agree on a contract through mediation. That idea is as bad and onerous to business as the card-check rule, Josten said.

The other disputed section of the bill would impose stiff civil penalties, up to $20,000, on employers who commit unfair labor practices while the initial collective bargaining contract is being negotiated.

One group that has taken aim at the binding-arbitration provision is the National Association of Manufacturers, which warns that some members may not even be aware of key parts of the bill.

"There are members of Congress who aren't fully up to speed on the bill," said Jason Straczewski, the group's director of human resources policy. He said his group is sending the message that the binding-arbitration provision is just as much of a problem as the card-check measure.

Meanwhile, Ross said the AFL-CIO would oppose moving through a bill with only parts of H.R. 800, especially if that means the removal of the card-check provision. She said the three sections of the bill are intertwined and meant to act together. Stripping the card-check provision from the bill would therefore help defeat the bill's purpose.

Speaking from the opposite side, a business source also said that it would make sense for labor to demand that the entire bill be approved. That would hurt the bill's chances of final passage in both chambers, after which labor might ease its position and support moving only a stripped-down bill, the source explained.

Business Group Raps Freshmen (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, February 28, 2007

With the House expected to vote Thursday on a measure that would make it easier for workers to unionize, a business coalition launched a six-figure radio ad campaign late Tuesday in an attempt to convince three Democratic freshmen who represent conservative districts to defy organized labor and vote against the bill.

Reps. Nancy Boyda (Kan.), Tim Mahoney (Fla.) and Heath Shuler (N.C.) were all elected in Republican-leaning districts in November, and the business group Coalition for a Democratic Workplace — saying these Members ran as "pro-business" Democrats — is urging their constituents to call them and register displeasure with H.R. 800. The bill would give workers the option of checking a card to indicate their desire to unionize, as opposed to current regulations that mandate secret-ballot elections.

"All three of these Members ran as pro-business Democrats, and we want to make sure that every single freshman Democrat who ran as a new kind of Democrat votes like one," said Todd Harris, a Republican operative who is serving as a spokesman for the business coalition.

The coalition's effort joins a U.S. Chamber of Commerce radio campaign already under way in opposition to the labor legislation. At a cost of roughly $500,000, it is targeting 51 Members, including 22 Republicans who represent labor-heavy districts or are seen as possibly inclined to support H.R. 800.

Neither Boyda, Mahoney nor Shuler seem particularly worried that supporting H.R. 800 will cause them re-election problems next year, as all three plan to vote in favor of the bill. In fact, Boyda and Shuler are co-sponsors.

Boyda said the mail she's received from constituents has been overwhelmingly supportive of her position on H.R. 800. Although Kansas' 2nd district was represented by Republicans from 1994 to 2006, it was held by Democrats for 24 years before that, and Boyda said her district is more pragmatic than conservative.

"We're not wealthy people in the 2nd district. It's a district of working families," Boyda said Tuesday in a telephone interview. "They may be sorry that they spent their money to tear me down on this one. They may be sorry, but we'll see."

The 60-second radio ad targeting the three freshman Democrats is scheduled to run for almost a week on all of the major news-radio stations in their districts, as well as on some highly rated country and mainstream music stations. The linchpin of the coalition's campaign, as referenced in the ad, is that Democrats have demanded the Mexican government mandate secret ballots for Mexican workers who want to unionize, while they oppose them for American workers.

The bill, dubbed the Employee Free Choice Act, would allow workers the option of checking a publicly viewable card indicating their desire to unionize, eliminating the current method that mandates secret-ballot voting supervised by the federal government.

Supporters say the bill would eliminate corporate coercion against unionizing and make it easier for workers to organize; opponents claim the bill would subject workers to intimidation by union officials, discouraging those who are against unionization from voting that way.

House Republicans leaders, making a concerted push to defeat the bill, met Tuesday with members of the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace to strategize on coordinating opposition to H.R. 800, as well as minimizing the number of Republicans who might vote for the bill.

The six House GOP leaders who met with the coalition included Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) and Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.). Among the coalition's members are the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Federation of Independent Business.

"Anyone who thinks [Thursday] is going to be the only vote is kidding themselves. The message was, don't give up the fight, we have our work cut out for us over the next couple of days," said Danielle Ringwood, a spokeswoman for Associated Builders and Contractors, another coalition member.

Ringwood did not want to speculate on the outcome of Thursday's scheduled floor vote, but said House Members of both parties tend to oppose the bill — if not at least question its merits — once they're educated on what it would do. But she said organized labor has drummed up support practicing an effective game of "coercive lobbying."

The AFL-CIO, which held events in 90 Congressional districts with 150 House Members over the Presidents Day recess, is cautiously optimistic that H.R. 800 will pass the House.

Bill Samuel, the union's spokesman, said many Democrats from Republican-minded districts are unlikely to face reprisals at the ballot box for supporting the bill, because they represent areas that are culturally conservative but labor-friendly.

That is why freshmen like Boyda and Shuler, who represent districts that tend to vote for Republican presidential candidates, are co-sponsoring the bill and do not fear a political backlash in next year's elections, Samuel said. The same goes for Mahoney, who is one of just seven or eight Democrats who is not co-sponsoring H.R. 800.

Samuel predicted that as many as two dozen Republicans could ultimately vote for the bill.

"What does it mean to be a red-leaning district where you have a large labor population?" Samuel asked rhetorically. "They may be culturally conservative, but they line up very closely with organized labor."

The business coalition argues that the option of "card-check" unionization — or "majority sign-up," as organized labor prefers — will lead to intimidation by union officials, as workers who oppose forming a union will be loath to do so using the publicly viewable card-check or sign-up forms.

Additionally, the coalition claims, 16 Democratic Members have publicly demanded that the Mexican government preserve secret balloting as the only means by which its workers can vote for unionization. Business groups say American workers should not be given any fewer protections than Mexican workers, and they believe this argument will resonate with the public if they can get the message out.

The coalition uses an August 2001 letter that liberal Democratic House Members wrote to Mexican officials encouraging them to "use the secret ballot in all union recognition elections." The coalition's radio ad tries to make the point.

"Your vote. In America it's as sacred as the Constitution. And it's cast in private," the ad's voice-over begins. "But union bosses want to change that. They want you to choose in public. Yes public."

After some additional rhetoric, the ad concludes: "What's worse? The same liberal leaders want to protect private ballot elections for workers in Mexico. Private ballots for Mexico and open ballots for Americans. That's crazy."

Walter Reed Puts Congress In Bipartisan 'foul Mood' (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 28, 2007

The poor conditions and bureaucratic mazes facing wounded soldiers and Marines at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center have sparked condemnation from Democratic and Republican lawmakers as they prepare for a hearing next Monday at the hospital.

Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform national security subcommittee, with support from Republican Reps. Tom Davis (Va.) and Christopher Shays (Conn.), announced earlier this week that he would conduct a hearing at Walter Reed, located in northwest Washington, D.C.

The Washington Post reported earlier this month that some wounded soldiers and Marines lived in moldy and rodent-infested housing complexes, while others were financially strapped or physically harmed by bureaucratic inefficiency.

The anecdotes in the Post have spurred an array of responses from lawmakers, generating headlines in local newspapers. Several committees will hold hearings starting this week and several lawmakers, such as Rep. Joe Donnelly (D-Ind.), created a veterans' advisory board.

Donnelly, who sits on the Veterans Affairs Committee, told the South Bend Tribune yesterday that "Everybody's in a very foul mood right now" with respect to the media accounts.

That includes Republicans. A day after the Washington Post story appeared on Feb. 20, Davis, the ranking Republican on the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, asked chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) to conduct a hearing at Walter Reed's Mologne House, one of the outpatient buildings.

Davis noted past hearings he conducted as chairman that examined the medical care National Guardsmen and Reservists received. He said in his letter that "The investigative series that appeared in the Washington Post … is in part based on three years of work by our Committee's investigative staff."

Shays followed up with his own letter one day later, writing, "The conditions described, which included mold, rodent and insect infestation and dilapidated walls and ceilings, are outrageous and deserve swift remediation."

He asked Waxman to "immediately schedule a hearing at Walter Reed to investigate the circumstances that led to the current conditions and conduct oversight of the repairs."

The Oversight and Government Reform panel, the main investigative committee in the House, is stacked with partisans and freshman Democrats —Reps. John Yarmuth (Ky.), Bruce Braley (Iowa), Paul Hodes (N.H.) and Peter Welch (Vt.) — who ran on holding the Bush administration accountable.

Republican lawmakers on the panel include Reps. Dan Burton (Ind.), Kenny Marchant (Texas), Lynn Westmoreland (Ga.) and Patrick McHenry (N.C.).

While media accounts have noted that the Army has worked to improve the physical conditions at some of the residences and outpatient facilities, lawmakers have taken little comfort.

"You could put all of the wounded soldiers in the Ritz-Carlton and it wouldn't fix the personnel, management and record-keeping problems that keep wounded Guard and Reserve soldiers languishing in outpatient limbo," said David Marin, the Republican staff director on the Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

Congress Reevaluates High-cost Defense Programs As Budget Ax Looms (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, February 28, 2007

Congress is grappling with how to fix a number of high-profile defense programs that are costing taxpayers billions of dollars yet have poor records of success.

Congress traditionally has been averse to canceling defense programs that grow strong constituencies. However, with a defense procurement budget that in recent years has experienced exponential year-over-year growth but that now could be flattening — or even facing cuts — Congress may be forced to quash several technologically complicated programs still in development, according to both congressional sources and outside observers.

Programs in danger may include the Army's Future Combat Systems and the Joint Tactical Radio System; the Air Force's Joint Strike Fighter and several satellite programs; and the Navy's Littoral Combat Ship.

While outright cancellations do not appear imminent in the 2008 defense budget, defense authorizers and appropriators will focus on reevaluating, in some cases redirecting and reprogramming funds.

Defense committees have begun to focus on somewhat less complex and less challenging systems. Too often, congressional sources say, the Pentagon embarks on ambitious programs with even more ambitious deadlines, and as a result forgoes critical early testing and evaluation on technologies.

When the programs enter operational testing and so-called low-rate production, problems crop up, forcing the services to return to the drawing board and incurring cost overruns and delays.

The Army's Future Combat Systems, which bears a $160 billion price tag, is one example of an ambitious program that is facing intense congressional scrutiny. Lawmakers consistently have criticized the development of the technologies and cut money for the program during the last three years (about $825 million).

"FCS has to be pretty ruthlessly vetted, and we'll see whether we'll get all these complicated systems," the chairman of the Air and Land Forces subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii), said.

He said the Pentagon is focusing too much on "Star Trek"-type military programs and too little on figuring out how to defeat improvised explosive devices, commonly known as road bombs.

"We need to do a little more training and equipping and concentrate on the basics rather than the razzle-dazzle technologies," Abercrombie said in an interview.

The Department of Defense has plans for "systems that are high-tech and are pushing the envelope, and whenever you do that you take on risk and cost," said a congressional source who asked not to be quoted by name.

"If you do hard development programs in a short time you have to take smaller bites of the apple, and that would help you with the money problem."

Former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's aggressive push for transformation across the services could leave the Pentagon with more troubles, according to the congressional source.

This year the Navy had to stop work on the General Dynamics-Lockheed Martin built Littoral Combat Ship after learning that the price of the first LCS (built by Lockheed) would total $420 million, well above the $220 million the service expects to pay for future ships.

Chief of Naval Operations Adm. Michael Mullen told House defense appropriators that the Navy did not adequately oversee the program and has set ambitious goals for it, putting pressure on the program's costs and schedule. The Navy plans to buy 51 Littoral Combat Ships.

Meanwhile, the Marine Corps is seeking new contractors to develop the Expeditionary Fighting Vehicle (EFV), an all-capable amphibious armored vehicle, which now is prone to breakdowns and technical glitches.

The Marine Corps so far has spent $1.7 billion on the EFV while the total cost of the program rose to about $12 billion from $8 billion, leading to more Pentagon oversight. Contractor General Dynamics received about $80 million in bonuses on the contract.

A Navy study faulted the company for wanting to rush into production rather than troubleshoot the problems. Navy Secretary Donald Winter said the EFV will be reworked, with the focus on improving its reliability.

The EFV program is critical to the Marine Corps. "It would be a very unhappy prospect to have to cancel the EFV," the congressional source said.

The setbacks with the EFV and the LCS indicate systemic problems in the Pentagon procurement system, said House defense appropriator Sanford Bishop Jr. (D-Ga.) at a recent industry conference.

"Low-ball estimates by contractors, approved by the department, engineering changes by the military and poor contractor performance — all play a role in the LCS situation and, generally, pervade the procurement and contract fulfillment process," he said.

Bishop also conveyed a message from House defense subcommittee Chairman John Murtha (D-Pa.):

"Low-balling by industry, acquiescence by the Pentagon, poor performance by contractors and little, if any, oversight by Congress will come to a screeching halt! There is a new sheriff in town! The committee is done with rewarding bad behavior and reckless spending that takes away money for other needed programs."

Defense appropriators said that they want to be supportive of the defense industry. Murtha plans to increase the ship buys to 12 per year and increase the Air Force's aircraft purchases in 2008 by 100.

The defense industry often complains that program requirements change constantly and details are added after a contract is awarded, increasing the scope of the programs, as well as the cost.

The requirements process is a good place to start to rein in costs and control potential failures, said the congressional source. The Armed Services panels will examine the requirements process — plagued by overambitious requirements or requirements that keep growing.

The strategy is to focus on the first steps of the acquisition process so that "you do not get into crunch-time in the endgame," the source said.

Defense insiders say program costs are driven by decisions made as the initial 10 to 15 percent of the work is being completed. The government lacks the technical expertise required to oversee complex programs, and often the testing-and-evaluation community does not see the technologies until they enter low-rate production and so-called operational testing.

Often, developmental testing is skipped. Moreover, weapons-systems testers do not have the authority to halt systems.

Even if the testing is done early, "unfortunately, people do not pay attention to what happens and sometimes they cut the testing short to stay on schedule," a former Pentagon official who dealt with the issue said.

"There is a lack of discipline in the process and things go ahead when people know that it is not going to work and it is not going to cost that little."

The Marine Corps V-22 Osprey is a costly and tragic example. The Marine Corps bought more than 60 of the vertical take-off and landing aircraft in low-rate production, running the risk of needing additional funding to incorporate fixes to problems uncovered after their procurement. 30 Marines died while testing the V-22.

The Department of Defense invested about $15 billion in the program during the last 25 years.

"Congress will have to cancel programs," said Jeff Green, a former House Armed Services Committee professional staff member and former staff director of the readiness subcommittee who recently opened a lobby firm.

"Politically, the corner that the new majority painted itself into" will force it to cancel those programs that will not make it through systems development and demonstration. "The list of programs that are not vulnerable is much shorter," Green said. He counts the multi-national Joint Strike Fighter as an endangered program as its price tag is increasing; its capabilities are too close to another high-priced fighter, the F-22, and the defense budgets are getting tighter.

House Democrats Angling On Domestic Issues (POL)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Politico, February 28, 2007

Even as Iraq dominates the headlines, congressional Democrats are moving swiftly on key domestic issues aimed at improving their 2008 reelection chances and splitting Republicans.

This week's House debates on easing union organizing and giving Congress more say in foreign purchases of critical domestic infrastructure are cases in point. One makes good on a campaign promise to an important ally. The other reminds voters about the Bush administration's controversial approval of port purchases by a United Arab Emirates firm and potentially casts doubts on Republican stewardship of homeland security issues.

Coming next are scheduled hearings and debates on health care, education, prescription drugs, stem-cell research and immigration reform, all issues that Democrats campaigned on during the 2006 midterms. This runup to the Easter break is just a sneak peak at the broader agenda Democrats are planning to put in place for the rest of the year. What it shows is that House

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) are in a hurry to pocket some key domestic victories and avoid the "do nothing" label they gave Republicans last year.

"It's clear that 2007 is a critical year for Congress," said Democratic political adviser Geoff Garin. "It's pretty certain that the spotlight will turn from Capitol Hill to presidential politics early and that the Congress's ability to get a lot done will be eclipsed in some significant measure."

Congressional wariness about the fast-paced 2008 presidential campaign is evident in the aggressive schedule set for the immigration reform law. Reid has set a goal of having the measure in a conference committee by August, "lest presidential politics overtake it," said spokesman Jim Manley.

But in the footrace to get things done, Democrats could stumble.

The ineffectual rollout of Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha's strategy to tie war funding to troop training and service rotations is a reminder that the skills of even some veterans in the Democratic caucus are rusty.

Pelosi and Reid also face the hurdle of maintaining unity in caucuses with muscular conservative and liberal wings.

Thursday's debate on union organizing is a case in point. The issue moved like lightning through the House committee headed by labor ally California Rep. George Miller and is supported by the vast majority of the caucus. But the early timing of the legislation, so soon after the minimum wage increase vote, is creating some angst among newly elected and some veteran conservative and moderate Democrats.

Democratic strategists say those challenges are outweighed by a need to fulfill their campaign promises. Indeed, any early domestic victories could prove even more vital if Democrats are unable to reverse course in Iraq.

"You don't want the agenda to be consumed by one issue that sucks all the oxygen out of the room and nothing else can survive," said Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University.

Some of the issues up for action in the next few weeks are emerging early because of independent deadlines for action. The president's signature education legislation, No Child Left Behind, is in need of a tardy reauthorization, and a clean water measure is being pressed to provide critical funding for states to improve sewer systems and other infrastructure.

But others are plucked from a Democratic playbook that sets as priorities the middle-class economic squeeze, child health and safety, energy and environment, as well as conducting oversight of the war, wasteful spending on Iraq reconstruction and the Katrina cleanup in New Orleans. Republicans are largely stuck playing defense, although their numbers in the Senate give them a chance to cut off debate on some legislation or insist on modifying others. More broadly, though, their chances of shaping the 2008 debate depend largely on Democratic missteps.

Bill McInturff, a Republican adviser, said this strategy isn't far-fetched. He recalled the heady days of the 1994 Republican revolution when members remained disciplined in pushing through the Contract with America agenda. A year later, however, attitudes changed as Republicans wound up shutting down the government in a disastrous showdown for them with President Bill Clinton over the budget.

"I think there is every possibility that the Democrats will overreach in over-investigations, too much spending and taxes, and by responding too much to their own primary voters on Iraq and not the public," McInturff said.

Until then, Republicans must tiptoe through political minefields laid by their adversaries. The stem-cell debate expected soon on the Senate floor is a prime example of an issue that tends to unite Democrats and split the Republican Party. In the 2006 Missouri Senate race, for instance, the state's normally pro-Republican business community lined up behind a ballot initiative that promoted stem-cell research. The initiative was opposed by incumbent Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who was defeated by Democrat Claire McCaskill, who backed the measure.

Immigration is another divisive issue for Republicans, although Democrats are likely to suffer their own defections. The proposal that Massachusetts Democrat Sen. Edward M. Kennedy and Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain are expected to introduce will hew closely to a measure debated last year that called for a guest worker program and tougher enforcement. That proposal was modeled after reforms proposed by President Bush. Democrats plan to pressure him to use the full White House arsenal to get the reform proposal through, even if it means driving a wedge between the president and his party.

Blue Dogs Believe Their Day Is Here (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 28, 2007

While there are plenty of indications that the fiscally conservative Blue Dog Coalition's cache is expanding on Capitol Hill — an invitation to the White House, regular meetings with the Speaker, plum committee assignments — one lawmaker found perhaps the most telling affirmation far from Capitol Hill and closer to the produce aisle.

"I've been in grocery stores and people come up and say, 'I see you belong to that Blue Dog group,' and I had no idea they would even know what the group is, but it really has taken on some added importance," said Rep. Dennis Moore (D-Kan.), the coalition's policy chairman.

In fact, members of the Blue Dogs are anything but reticent about their growing influence within the new Democratic majority, as the moderate lawmakers — who now number nearly four dozen, the largest contingent in the group's 12-year history — seek to maximize their impact in the House following the power switch in the 110th Congress.

On a recent weekday afternoon, leaders of the moderate group gathered in the office of Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.), the coalition's communications chairman, to discuss their place in the new majority, as well as their aims for the 110th Congress. In addition to Ross and Moore, the group included Democratic Reps. Allen Boyd (Fla.), the group's administration chairman, Stephanie Herseth (S.D.), the group's whip, and John Tanner (Tenn.), a co-founder of the Blue Dogs and a current co-chairman of its political action committee.

"I think one of the things that's different now, I think there was a time when Blue Dogs were looked at by some Democrats as though perhaps they weren't really Democrats and I think that's no longer the case," Ross said.

"I think people are recognizing that not only do we represent the middle, which is where we believe the American people are and certainly where we are, I think people within our own Caucus now recognize that we have created the majority and that we have done some pretty heavy lifting as a group to ensure that Democrats did regain a majority."

Pointing to their own growth since the 1996 elections, the Blue Dogs note that their members have captured 24 seats from incumbent Republicans, including those now held by Moore, Ross and Herseth — a tactic the group saw magnified in the 2006 cycle when House Democrats won contests in a number of moderate and conservative districts, handing the party control of the chamber for the first time in a dozen years.

The Blue Dogs themselves added nine freshman lawmakers, raising their own count to 44 members.

"We think it should be obvious to everybody what our role has been in helping us win the majority," Boyd said.

The coalition's leaders assert those efforts already have begun to pay dividends. In particular, Ross pointed to the House adoption of "pay-as-you-go" spending rules — one of the Blue Dogs' top priorities — at the outset of the new Congress.

"We do think that the fact that, not in the first 100 legislative hours, but the first 24 hours of the 110th session of Congress, PAYGO rules being reinstituted on the floor of the House was a significant milestone and demonstrates that we are being taken seriously," he said.

In addition, Boyd asserted that Democratic leadership has "been very inclusive when it comes to the committee assignments. They have been very inclusive when it comes to consulting us on legislation. We meet with them on a regular basis.

"We think this is the group that represents where the greatest bloc of Americans are — toward that big middle. Not far left, not far right, but that big middle, that's going to be able to get things done," he added. "And it's going to have to be done on a bipartisan basis."

Even as the Blue Dogs acknowledge their own potential to serve as a bridge to their moderate Republican colleagues, however, the Democratic lawmakers seek to tamp down expectations that any formal bipartisan efforts are under way, noting that their own group has only recently completed its internal organization.

"I think we're trying to find our way in the majority. The Republicans are trying to find their way in the minority. And both of us are having growing pains. That will come, but it's been so busy and so hectic," Tanner said. He added: "We want to be a complement to the Democratic Caucus and a vehicle if necessary to the Republican Conference to try to make that happen."

While members of both the Blue Dogs and the moderate Republican Tuesday Group previously have suggested the organizations could work together in the new session, for now the Democrats suggest those efforts are limited to one-on-one sessions or the committee level.

"We're still very early in this new Congress, and while we were having discussions throughout the last Congress, particularly before the election and after the election, as we've now moved into majority status our focus has been on our cohesiveness — adding nine new members to our organization — influencing the policy decisions and the direction and agenda of the Democratic majority," Herseth said.

Nonetheless, the Democrats did make time in December to accept an invitation to the White House, along with the centrist New Democrat Coalition, to meet with President Bush.

"I appreciate the president's reaching out to us, and I'm hopeful for the next two years we can start to work together for the American people, because that's what they want," Moore said.

Despite that gesture, however, Democrats said they remain hesitant about working with the Bush administration, citing not only a lack of comity in recent years but also more specific concerns about the president's budget proposal and accounting methods.

"If the administration continues to reach out to us as they have, on their ideas and the desire to get serious about entitlement reform, you'd have a pretty receptive group of folks here that would want to undertake that difficult task," Herseth acknowledged. "But it's a little bit hard for us given some of the distrust that has evolved over the last few years because of the unwillingness to really reach out to us."

Moreover, Ross emphasized that pursuing bipartisanship does not mean the Blue Dogs will turn against their own party.

"We're a lot more interested in affecting Democratic policy and moving Democratic ideas to the middle than we are into defeating Democratic proposals," Ross said. "We want to help and influence [the Caucus] and not be an obstructionist, but we're not going to be a rubber stamp either."

Although the Blue Dogs face some philosophical differences within their own party, most notably with Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), whose San Francisco-based district trends more liberal than many of the rural districts represented in the coalition, the Members sought to downplay any potential divide.

"Let's face it, we all know that both parties, in large part, are controlled by extremes that in some cases are different from what we might represent in the middle," Boyd said. "We don't think the Speaker's philosophy or her particular district's philosophy is important. What we think is important is the management style she uses. How she is inclusive with us, how she acts."

Emphasizing that the relationship remains positive thus far, the Blue Dogs cite the House's initial efforts to reinstitute PAYGO rules, as well as conversations with the Speaker to pursue a statutory version of that law covering tax cuts as well as spending programs.

"We have talked and talked and talked about the importance of reinstituting the PAYGO rules," Moore said. "The Democratic Caucus has now done that, and we're looking at statuary PAYGO. To her credit, Speaker Pelosi and the leadership in our Caucus are also saying we need to look at this and see if we can go do that."

In addition, Ross noted that the House leadership has offered to pursue a vote on the Blue Dog-backed proposal to implement new accountability standards on government spending on the Iraq War. During remarks on the House floor prior to the Presidents Day recess, Pelosi cited the legislation, authored by Reps. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) and Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.).

"I think we're going to play an important role in continuing to push this accountability of our government," Ross said. "It's our duty and obligation to provide oversight, and the last six years this Congress hasn't been doing it."

In the meantime, the coalition's members are preparing to take on the upcoming budget debate and developing potential legislation in other areas as well as via their internal task forces, including: budget and fiscal policy; business and technology; energy and natural resources; government accountability; health care; immigration reform and border security; national and homeland security; and retirement security.

Much as with the full Democratic Caucus, the Blue Dogs also will give attention to maintaining their majority in the 2008 cycle, notably the defense of their freshman lawmakers.

During the 2006 cycle, the coalition's political arm raised more than $1 million, and according to Ross, Blue Dog lawmakers contributed more than $20 million in combined dues and funds raised to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"We will support, of course, all the members financially, to the extent that we're successful in fundraising," Tanner said, adding that the Blue Dogs also will advise their members to "exert their independence" on votes.

"That's not a slap at the leadership," Tanner explained. "One of the philosophies of the Blue Dogs when we started was that the voting card that we all carry should belong to the people that hired us. ... When it comes down to votes affecting the country's future we think it's entirely appropriate for Members to behave as representatives and not as parliamentarians. All that entails is voting the district. ... That usually takes care of any problems."

Lobbying Law Misses Some K St. Numbers (HILL)

By Jim Snyder And Jeffrey Young

February includes an annual Washington ritual apart from the Presidents Day recess: the tallying of lobbying revenue totals. In the highly competitive world of K Street, firms anxiously await to see how they did in relation to their rivals.

But while firms act like ambitious law students checking class rank, some critics believe that the Lobbying Disclosure Act (LDA), the law that defines what activities a firm must report annually to Congress, hasn't kept pace with the industry's evolution. Firms now have public relations, strategic consulting, grassroots and federal marketing arms — all of which have the potential to influence public officials, but which often take place outside the public eye.

"The Lobbying Disclosure Act is a good starting point to understand how much money is being spent," said Alex Knott, a political editor at the Center for Public Integrity, which maintains several lobbying databases. "But there are huge amounts of money that don't get reported."

The firms themselves are sympathetic to complaints about the limitations of the LDA, albeit for different reasons. Believing annual revenue rankings are a potential marketing tool for their own businesses, firms are quick to note other revenue streams that aren't included in LDA figures — particularly if it's been a bad year for lobbying.

The Senate has passed a bill to update the LDA, enacted in 1995, but — aside from a new requirement that lobbyists detail fundraising activities — the changes do not include expanding what type of activity should be reported.

The LDA defines "lobbying activities" to include lobbying contact with anyone working for Congress and certain high-ranking executive-branch officials. The definition includes activities to support such contacts, like research and "planning activities," when the intention is to influence the formulation of legislation.

The statue's lack of specificity makes for varied interpretations, said Larry Noble, the former executive director for the Center for Responsive Politics.

"You do have a real need out there for some bright lines and education," said Noble, now a lawyer at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom.

"There's always a question of where an activity falls along these lines. When you have room for interpretation, some people are going to read the law more strictly than others."

It is not clear under the LDA, for example, how much an association or firm spends on "issue advertising" (of the type found in this publication or on local television), even though it is intended to influence policy.

Associations that pay for such advertising would include it on expenses in tax forms, but these forms do not make plain what the issue is or which legislation the ad was trying to affect.

Federal marketing efforts — the pitching of a client's product to a federal agency — are also undisclosed.

Lobbying at federal agencies should be included on LDA forms, but federal marketing activities are often not required by disclosure rules unless, said Pam Gavin, superintendent of Public Records, the firm is making a pitch to a senior political figure within the administration.

Meetings with procurement officials probably don't fall under the LDA's purview. While this activity is regulated by government procurement rules, agencies have different policies that determine, for example, whether public comments to proposed rules are posted online.

Grassroots efforts, too, are not reported on an LDA form. An effort in Congress to force greater disclosure of grassroots activity did not make the Senate's LDA reform bill.

The Senate bill would require firms and other lobbying entities to file lobbying reports quarterly rather than semiannually. The bill also would require lobbyists to report campaign fundraising.

Gavin, who oversees LDA compliance, said the law was intended to provide the public with a general look at lobbying activities.

Requiring too-specific information presents a forest-and-trees problem, she said. Lobbying efforts could be obscured in an itemized list that includes a $10 cab ride to Capitol Hill.

"The whole idea is if my 16-year-old son wanted to do a report on who was lobbying [on an FDA bill], he should be able to go on the Internet and find out who is doing that," Gavin said.

But government watchdogs contend that imprecise rules about what activities must be disclosed lead to less valuable information being reported on how special interests try to influence policy.

"There's a lot of gray areas and, certainly, people who are willing to exploit it," said Steve Ellis, vice president for programs at Taxpayers for Common Sense.

Lobbying firms are not necessarily hiding what they do. But firms often have different definitions of what to include in an LDA form. Some firms over-report.

"The firms ... have an incentive to inflate their numbers" to impress clients and chasten competitors, said Tim LaPira, of the Center for Responsive Politics.

If LDA numbers are down, firm representatives often point to the other areas of their public-policy business that are up.

Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld's lobbying revenues dipped nearly 9 percent last year from 2005, but its overall public-policy practice grew by 10 percent. The difference came from undertaking regulatory work that falls outside the LDA and from helping clients prepare for congressional oversight and investigations, a growth area for several firms under a new Democratic majority.

Cassidy & Associates made $24.6 million on lobbying in 2006, a drop of more than 11 percent year to year. (Its affiliate, The Rhoads Group, made another $4.8 million.)

But Cassidy also made nearly $1 million in what gets lumped as "other revenue" that is not included in LDA numbers. That includes money from its strategic-communications practice as well as its federal marketing work.

While all the firm's revenues should be considered to get a picture of Cassidy's business, however, lobbyists there don't believe disclosure rules should be toughened.

"If you help them market to a federal agency, you are not advocating, you are marketing," said Gregg Hartley, Cassidy vice chairman and chief operating officer.

Another big source of revenue for firms trying to influence public policy is lobbying on behalf of foreign governments. Firms report these revenues largely under the Foreign Agents Registration Act. But the reports are not as readily available online as LDA reports are, and there can be months-long lags between when a firm registers to lobby for a client and when the public could know.

"The LDA is just the tip of the iceberg," the Center for Public Integrity's Knott said.

Kerry Puts GOP Donor On Defensive (WP)

By Mary Ann Akers

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Not that Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) was out for revenge or anything. But he did seem to enjoy at least a small measure of satisfaction in making mega-GOP-donor Sam Fox squirm during yesterday's Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing to consider Fox's nomination to be ambassador to Belgium.

Fox contributed $50,000 to fund the infamous Swift Boat Veterans for Truth ads that sought to smear Kerry's Vietnam War record in the 2004 presidential campaign.

The panel did not vote on Fox yesterday, but committee member Kerry got in his say. He walked in a bit late and explained that he did not intend "to play some sort of 'gotcha' game," but he wanted to know: How does the nominee feel about the level of "personal destruction" in politics these days?

Fox replied that he was "very concerned" that politics have become too "mean and destructive," especially with the participation of independent "527" groups such as Swift Boat Veterans. He tried not so subtly to redirect Kerry's line of questioning by saying, "Sir, you're a hero," adding that no 527 group "can take that away from you."

Why then, given Fox's dim views of 527s, did he give such a large chunk of money to help Swift Boat? Kerry asked.

Fox explained that he and his wife donate generously to GOP political causes. "When we're asked, we generally give," he said. He said he could not recall who asked for the Swift Boat donation but explained that he thought it was important to give to a 527 working on behalf of Republicans because a 527 "on the other side" was stooping to such low levels as comparing President Bush to Adolf Hitler.

"So two wrongs make a right?" Kerry asked.

Fox said he thought the dirty work of 527 ads was "disgraceful," but "that's the world we live in."

HUD Gets New View Of Who's Homeless (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

A groundbreaking survey of homelessness being released today found that 704,000 people nationwide sought shelter at least once in a three-month period.

Families with children accounted for one-third of those seeking emergency shelter or transitional housing between February and April 2005, the most recent period studied, according to the report by the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The rest were individuals, mostly adult men. Nearly half were black.

The count covered only those seeking shelter, not people living on the street, so the total number of homeless people would be higher.

"This first-of-its-kind study is a huge leap forward in our understanding of not only how many people are homeless, but also what their needs are," HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson says. The report says, for example, that at least a quarter are disabled.

HUD, which briefed USA TODAY on the report Monday, says it is the most comprehensive government estimate ever of homelessness. Previous counts looked only at the number of people homeless on a given day or week.

The three-month figure — equal to the population of South Dakota — is an estimate based on a sample of 80 communities. It will serve as a baseline for annual reports to Congress and may be expanded to include people living on the street.

Martha Burt, a homelessness scholar at the Urban Institute, says the new database has shortcomings. For example, it has limited information about the health of those seeking shelter, and she thinks future versions will have trouble tracking those living on the street.

HUD's report also cites a previously reported one-night survey of hundreds of communities in January 2005. That survey found 754,000 homeless people, including 45% who were living on the street. USA TODAY published its own estimate of 727,000 in October 2005, based on earlier tallies.

The three-month count found that on an average day, 335,000 people sought shelter, but more than twice that number sought shelter at least once during the entire period.

Dennis Culhane, a professor of social policy at the University of Pennsylvania who co-wrote the HUD report, says it's unclear whether homelessness has increased or declined, because past estimates were done differently.

He says poverty among blacks, who are more likely to live in urban areas, runs deeper than for other groups.

Culhane says families with kids have remained a steady one-third of the homeless, and he says government needs to do more to provide housing, such as expanding rent subsidies.

One of every three homeless kids has a diagnosable psychiatric disorder, such as post-traumatic stress, by age 8, says Ellen Bassuk, a psychiatrist who is president of the National Center on Family Homelessness.

"They have trouble sitting still and learning in school," she says.

Nine of 10 homeless mothers have been victims of violence, often domestic, she says.

Michael Stoops, director of the National Coalition for the Homeless welcomes the new count but says more housing and shelters are needed as well as a focus on the root causes of the problem. He says homelessness "can happen to everyone."

Democracy 21 Renews Calls For Doolittle Probe (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

Government watchdog group Democracy 21 singled out Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) for special scrutiny yesterday, renewing its call for the ethics committee to conduct an investigation into multiple potential ethics violations by the lawmaker.

Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer said there is no evidence that the committee had taken any action about Doolittle in the last Congress even though his group and a series of press reports raised serious questions about whether Doolittle violated House ethics rules. Now that all of the new committee members have been named, Wertheimer wrote in a letter to the panel, it's time the committee conduct an investigation on its own authority into the lawmaker's actions and ties to former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who is now serving time in jail.

Specifically, Wertheimer points to Doolittle's practice of paying his wife's company a 15 percent commission on all contributions that the company raised for Doolittle's campaign committee and leadership political action committee (PAC) and whether it violated House ethics rules. He also called on the committee to look into whether fees paid to Doolittle's wife, Julie Doolittle, on contributions indicted defense contractor Brent Wilkes and his associates made to his campaign committee and PAC were linked or appeared to be linked to any official action Doolittle took to help Wilkes's company obtain millions of dollars in government earmarks.

Wilkes was recently indicted in connection with the investigation stemming from former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham's (R-Calif.) bribery conviction and jailing.

Doolittle spokesman Richard Robinson said, "This is a phony, left-wing group that is admittedly recycling the same baseless allegations that it has already raised numerous times with the ethics committee to no avail. We don't expect this latest partisan attack to yield any different result because it remains completely without merit."

Wertheimer wants the panel to probe media reports that claim that Doolittle intervened in support of Abramoff's tribal clients in matters involving gambling licenses pending at the Department of the Interior.

Senator's Railway Lobby Link May Have Helped Derail Loan (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The federal government killed a $2.3 billion railway loan after opponents attacked Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), because he was the railway's lobbyist before winning election and backing legislation favoring the loan to his former client.

The privately held Dakota, Minnesota & Eastern Railroad wanted the money for an 860-mile Midwestern rail-line renovation and expansion project. The Federal Railroad Administration said its denial was based on financial factors. But project backers and detractors said the loan sank after opponents, led by the Mayo Clinic, based in Rochester, Minn., ginned up congressional heat on the agency. The key to that was Thune's role: The Republican did nothing illegal, but his seamless transition from the railway's lobbyist to its Senate champion handed ammunition to opponents and their own lobbyists.

"The legislation that I introduced . . . had been introduced in three previous congresses," Thune said yesterday. Mayo, he said, "had their lobbyists come in and tell me to my face that they were going to go after me."

His previous work for DM&E, as the company is known, "gave them something to attack."

Mayo Clinic chief executive Glenn Forbes disputes that. "Our real interest is in serving patients," he said. "This project put us definitely in a corner with no interest on anybody else's side to understand our concerns. So yes, we certainly confronted the issue."

The local battle over the rail line has raged for nearly a decade. A Mayo-led coalition of opponents says the project would bring increased rail traffic, which could endanger the safety of clinic patients, staff and the Rochester community.

DM&E chief executive Kevin Schieffer and project backers say the line is vital for the region's corn and coal industries. The track running through Rochester was there before Mayo was, Schieffer said, and renovating it would enhance its safety. Schieffer vows to pursue the project, which has surmounted several court and regulatory challenges over the years.

Chris Gade, spokesman for both Mayo and the opponent group known as the Rochester Coalition, said that before the rail-line project gained traction, Mayo had never hired Washington-based lobbyists.

Thune's role in the railroad project was a topic during November elections, and after Democrats won a majority, opposition gathered steam on the Hill.

Thune worked as a DM&E lobbyist for two years, earning more than $200,000 from the company, before winning his Senate seat in 2004. In 2005, he helped write legislation expanding a federal railroad loan pool from $3.5 billion to $35 billion. DM&E was not mentioned in the legislation, but the expanded funding enabled it to apply for $2.3 billion, about one-third of the project's $6 billion price tag.

While DM&E applied for the loan about one year ago, last month the process entered a 90-day period during which the railroads agency must approve or reject it. Opponents and their lobbyists went into high gear. The loan, one PR firm's e-mail read, "is a deal being done in near complete secrecy -- the loan was inserted into the Transportation Appropriations Bill by former DM&E lobbyist turned Senator John Thune, who was paid $160,000 by DM&E the year he ran for the Senate."

Opponents drummed up opposition from a bipartisan group of three dozen legislators, 18 of whom wrote Transportation Secretary Mary Peters questioning the loan. "Asking the taxpayers to fund one of the largest government-funded loans to a private business in our country's history is unjustified, particularly given the lack of transparency," the letter read.

Rep. Tim Walz (D-Minn.), whose opposition to the project helped him win his seat in November, sponsored legislation to assert congressional oversight of the loan. "It's just appalling to me how it was done," he said. "I want to see rail expanded, too, but I want it done correctly. It's about the system and the transparency of government."

On Monday, the railroads administration sent a letter to Schieffer denying the loan. "I read a lot of things for the first time in the official denial letter," he said. "The list is long and deep with supporters, and we are committed to doing everything we can to see it through."

Mayo's Forbes vowed further challenges: "Our commitment would be unwavering," he said.

Looking back, Thune has no regrets, except: "The railroad probably could have done a lot better job on the PR front."

Wall St. Slide Fuels Worries On Economy (NYT)

By Floyd Norris And Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

Stock markets around the world plummeted yesterday in a wave of selling set off by a plunge in China that was reinforced by worries of weakening economies. The falling prices continued in early Asian trading today, but by midday the Chinese market seemed to be stabilizing.

While China was the first market to tumble, it was not clear what set off the selling. But once it began, it spread first to other Asian countries, then to Europe and the United States.

“It was sort of one of those days where somebody snaps their fingers, and the market’s hypnotic trance is over,” said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial.

In China, where the stock market had been soaring, the government had warned banks about improper loans to finance stock speculation.

In America, the selling seemed to add to worries that a decline in the housing market, and problems in particular with loans to risky borrowers, could spill over. And a report yesterday indicating that orders for durable goods — items like washing machines and computers — were surprisingly weak in January revived doubts about the strength of the American economy.

Alan Greenspan, the former chairman of the Federal Reserve, in a speech transmitted to a business conference in Hong Kong on Monday, said that he could not rule out a recession in the United States later this year. In so doing, he seemed to distance himself from Ben S. Bernanke, the current Fed chairman, who has been much more upbeat.

Noting that global markets have been strong for years, Mr. Hoffman said: "We've had this 'What me worry?' mentality. And this is a little bit of a wake-up call."

The Dow Jones industrial average fell as much as 546 points yesterday afternoon, before closing down 416.02 points, or 3.29 percent. In percentage terms, it was the worst day for the market since March 2003. In terms of points, it was the steepest slide since the first day the market resumed trading after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in 2001.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, the benchmark index for many investors, slid 3.47 percent, and the technology-heavy Nasdaq composite index fell 3.86 percent. All three major indexes erased their gains for the year.

The sell-off left almost every major stock lower, including all 30 stocks in the Dow industrials and all but two in the S.& P. 500 and one in the Nasdaq 100. As the 4 p.m. closing bell finally rang at the New York Stock Exchange, traders on the floor erupted with hearty boos.

At the close, said Howard Silverblatt, an index analyst with Standard & Poor's, the S.& P. 500 had lost $452 billion in market value, and other American stocks had shed an additional $180 billion.

After steady declines in all markets, panic seemed to hit the American market just before 3 p.m., perhaps caused by sell programs that went off at 2:52 p.m., when the S.& P. 500 fell to the point where it was down 3 percent for the day. Within 10 minutes, it had fallen to its low for the day, down 4.3 percent. It ended with a loss of 3.5 percent.

Investors once took such big falls in stride, but in recent years no such thing has happened as volatility has largely evaporated from the market.

There were some technological problems yesterday. Dow Jones, which calculates the Dow industrials, said its system fell behind shortly before 3 p.m., and that a big fall was shown when the backup system came on. But Standard & Poor's, which calculates the S.& P. 500, said it knew of no similar problems with its calculations.

Despite the tumble, the Dow is down only 4.4 percent from its record high reached last week. And the sell-off was not severe enough to set off any of the circuit breakers the New York Stock Exchange has put in place to help minimize big losses.

One sign of the nature of the sell-off was what went up. United States Treasury prices soared, and yields fell, as some investors sought safety.

"Treasuries rally, the stock market sells," said Ethan Harris, chief United States economist for Lehman Brothers. "It's kind of a classic risk-aversion reaction."

If the rout in the markets is sustained, it will be the first major test for Mr. Bernanke. Two weeks ago, he said the Fed saw inflation as a greater threat than economic weakness.

"You've got a certain cavalierness about market-driven economic signals from the new academic-driven Fed," said Robert Barbera, the chief economist of ITG, an advisory firm.

Mr. Barbera said that Mr. Greenspan gave more attention to market indicators than Mr. Bernanke has.

The selling yesterday began in Shanghai, which had hit a record on Monday. But in tumultuous trading yesterday, the Shanghai composite index plunged nearly 9 percent.

Stephen Green, a senior economist and stock market analyst working in Shanghai for Standard Chartered Bank, said the market fundamentals had not changed drastically in recent weeks, adding that the stock markets in China tended to be volatile, particularly after reaching record highs.

"People are just on edge," he said. "It's very possible in two weeks we'll be right back up there."

The sell-off in China started a few hours before an explosion was reported at an American base in Afghanistan. It killed several people but did not injure Vice President Dick Cheney, who was inside the base at the time.

Chinese markets stabilized in Wednesday morning trading, with the main Shanghai market index up a quarter of a percent and the main Shenzhen market index up 4 hundredths of a percent.

Other Asian markets — Singapore, Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines and Indonesia — which had all shrugged off Tuesday's decline in Shanghai, dropped sharply on Wednesday morning in response to the heavy selling in Europe and New York.

The Topix index in Tokyo fell 3.45 percent on Wednesday morning while the Hang Seng Index fell 3.37 percent in Hong Kong.

Of Tuesday's trading, Mr. Barbera of ITG said, "People are unwinding the carry trade." In that trade, which has been very popular with hedge funds, traders borrowed yen, at very low interest rates, and then invested the money in assets in other countries.

DOJ_NMG_0138004

"Now you try to get closer to shore," said Mr. Barbera, saying that traders had sold investments and used the proceeds to repay their yen borrowings.

From Shanghai, Tremors Heard Around The World (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

SHANGHAI, Feb. 27 — In China's wild cowboy stock market, record-breaking run-ups have been followed by mini-crashes that have been largely confined within this country's borders.

But on Tuesday, China's worst one-day tumble in a decade set off a tumult that rolled through markets around the globe, from Tokyo to Frankfurt to Brazil to Wall Street.

Speculative frenzy had lifted the Shanghai composite index above the 3,000-point milestone on Monday and then gave way to a tumultuous sell-off on Tuesday that sent shares plummeting nearly 9 percent.

The downturn shattered all sorts of records, and analysts said there was no clear reason for Tuesday's severe drop in Shanghai, equivalent to a 1,100-point drop in the Dow Jones industrial average. But the Chinese stock market was rife with rumors that the government was considering new measures to tame the world's hottest stock market before a bubble developed.

To many investors and analysts here, however, the extensive sell-off was just the latest indication that share prices in China had often become unhinged from the broader economy. Millions of everyday investors rushed blindly into stocks, emptying out their savings account to "play the market," as many of them say.

Perhaps the most remarkable sign of the recent irrational exuberance underpinning China's stock markets was that during the last year, when a company announced bad news, its stock price shot through the roof.

Early this year, for instance, when a group of 17 Chinese companies was cited by regulators for misappropriating corporate funds, their stock prices all skyrocketed. When the Tianjin Global Magnetic Card Company failed to report quarterly earnings last April, its stock doubled.

Tuesday was different, though. With shares in Shanghai tumbling, stocks listed in Shenzhen also collapsed, falling 9.3 percent. In Hong Kong, the benchmark Hang Seng index fell 1.76 percent, and in Japan, the Nikkei dropped about half a point, to 18,119.92.

The volatility of Shanghai sometimes produced unusual results. Shares of the Industrial and Commercial Bank of China, which went public simultaneously on the Shanghai and Hong Kong stock markets last October, performed very differently on the two markets, for example. I.C.B.C. shares dropped 8 percent on Tuesday in Shanghai but just 1.8 percent in Hong Kong.

But with stocks in Hong Kong reacting on Wednesday morning to the global sell-off, I.C.B.C. shares dropped 3.7 percent on Wednesday morning in Hong Kong but rose two-tenths of a percent in Shanghai.

None of the world's major stock markets have been as volatile as that of China, where people refer to the stock market as "dubo ji," or the slot machine. The gyrations have become almost commonplace for a stock market that suffered through a five-year depression until 2006, when it rose more than 130 percent, the world's best performance.

The Chinese government, however, is worried about an over-reaction that could produce a bubble and then a crash that could send bankrupt investors into the streets in protest.

Analysts say that at least in some cases, the stocks of tainted companies have risen because the companies were viewed as shedding old problems and starting anew. Still, some of those problems reflect deep cultural attitudes and are unlikely to be fixed overnight.

Analysts also argue that the market has been running up because of stronger fundamentals, rising profits, improved regulation and oversight by officials, and confidence in the market's long-term prospects.

But in this current run of market mania, even corruption appears to be a buy signal. That was the case for the Shanghai Bailian Group, which reported on Dec. 29 that its chairman was under investigation for fraud. The company's shares have climbed 45 percent since then.

Two weeks ago, after the chairman of the Shanghai Hai Niao Enterprise Development Company was detained, his company's shares rose 15 percent.

"There's just too much liquidity out there, too much," says Chang Chun, a financial reform expert at the China Europe International Business School in Shanghai. "This is a psychological thing."

China's stock market system is still relatively immature, and trustworthy information about a company's performance is still hard to come by. So the average investor does little or no research.

Just to find names of stocks to buy is a task for new investors. So if they see even a mention in the press, positive or negative, they start buying. If alert investors are lucky, they might get a tip. If state television mentions a company, it must be worth something, and if they don't catch the full story, they at least have a name.

"If I hear a stock mentioned on the TV news I will pay attention to it," says Xu Xiaochen, a 55-year-old retiree.

In any case, many investors here seem to believe that the secret to picking stocks is luck and confidence in the government, not the fundamentals of any particular company.

"I don't know how to choose a stock," says a 61-year-old retiree who gave her name as Miss Hou at a local brokerage house a few weeks ago. "But I trust those technology companies. Maybe the names of some companies sound lucky to me, so I choose to buy these stocks."

Government officials began cautioning several weeks ago against "blind optimism" in the stock market. Banks were ordered to stop making loans to people who were speculating in the market. Trading volumes have been so high that the Shanghai Stock Exchange recently warned that the country's electronic trading system could be destabilized.

Stock prices fell sharply for four straight days in early February as investors seemed to contemplate the possibility of an overheated market.

After a brief pause, they rushed in again. Foreign money is also piling in, according to JPMorgan, and hardly an analyst is willing to bet against the stock market.

"You can't be a fundamental investor in China," said Michael Pettis, a professor of finance at Peking University. "You can only speculate."

Mr. Pettis, who has long been a market skeptic here, is now raising a fund to invest in Chinese stocks, based on his projections of the inflow that will push up prices.

"There's a huge amount of money in the banking system with nowhere to go," he said. "I think you're going to see that money getting out of the banking system."

Mutual funds are also helping some individual investors, while others are scrambling into initial offerings, which over the last year have had a strong opening-day track record.

Of the 15 companies that went public on the Shanghai Stock Exchange, 12 of them experienced opening-day rises of more than 10 percent.

Now, regulators are seeing a growing number of stock frauds directed at small investors. And Chinese officials worry that investors are still relying on a welfare state — which is increasingly disappearing — to take care of them.

As for the companies that are seeing their stock prices climb despite their troubles, they may be hard pressed for explanations, but nonetheless defend the phenomenon.

"The stock is the stock, and the C.E.O. is the C.E.O.," said a woman working in the executive office at Shanghai Haixin Group after she acknowledged that the chief executive was under investigation. "As for our C.E.O.'s bad news, yes, it happened. But it is outdated and not newsworthy at all. As for the stock price, we don't know either."

China Volatility Sparks U.S. Sell-off (USAT)

By Adam Shell And John Waggoner

USA Today, February 28, 2007

NEW YORK — If stock investors were complacent, they're not anymore.

U.S. stocks, overdue for a nasty fall after seven months of uninterrupted gains, got their comeuppance Tuesday amid a global sell-off that began in China, spread to Europe and ended with a minicrash on Wall Street that left investors nursing their biggest losses since 9/11 — and wondering if the worst is over.

For weeks, stock gurus have warned that the Dow Jones industrial average's longest run without a 2% correction since 1954 was worrisome: Some negative catalyst was bound to spook investors and start a selling frenzy.

The selling spark came Tuesday across the globe in China, a highflying market with a speculative zeal rivaling the '90s dot-com stock gold rush. Shanghai's benchmark index plunged nearly 9% amid fears the Chinese government is moving to squash speculation in stocks.

The Dow swooned in response, falling as much as 546 points at one point, before closing down 416.02 points, or 3.3%, at 12,216.24. It was the Dow's seventh-worst point decline and worst since Sept. 17, 2001, the day U.S. markets reopened after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Chinese share prices were up slightly in afternoon training today. Shares in Japan, Australia and Seoul, meanwhile, fell more than 3%.

There was no shortage of theories on Wall Street as to the sell-off's cause.

New York-based investment manager Michael Holland said, "The China story was a great excuse to sell. Down 9% was a number the market could focus on."

Chris Orndorff, a portfolio manager at Payden & Rygel, called it a "self-fulfilling prophecy. … Everyone was expecting a pullback, so when it came, a lot of people sold into the downdraft." Orndorff says investors with cash on the sidelines might want to start looking to buy stocks that are now selling at lower prices.

Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors, says scary declines anywhere in the world cause panic selling: "The transmission mechanism for selling is clearly psychological."

Mark Headley, portfolio manager of Matthews Pacific Tiger fund, says it's not all about China. "This is more about the vulnerability of the U.S. economy," he says: A 9% decline in an index that was up 44% in 2007 on top of a 110% gain in 2006, was not surprising and, therefore, should not have warranted such a big sell-off here.

The rapid cooling of the Chinese market, coupled with a U.S. report showing a bigger-than-expected drop in orders of durable goods, raised fears that two of the world's best-performing economies were in danger of slowing. It also added credence to a statement made a day earlier by former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan that a recession could not be ruled out in the USA.

Says Milton Ezrati, senior strategist at money management firm Lord Abbett: "When the two engines of world growth look like they might disappoint, that is enough to scare most investors."

Wall Street economists have also warned that serious economic dislocations could result from the fallout from the weak housing market. Similarly, signs of mounting distress in the subprime mortgage market could also pose a danger to stocks.

Still, Bush administration officials Tuesday reiterated that the U.S. economy is in good shape. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson briefed President Bush on the market decline, the White House said.

"The president's economic advisers are keeping an eye on the markets. We believe that the economic fundamentals in the U.S. economy are sound," said White House spokesman Tony Fratto.

Despite the reassuring words, many investors are no doubt wondering if Tuesday's free fall is the beginning of something more serious, such as a 1987-style crash.

"No," says James Stack, editor of InvesTech Research, in Whitefish, Mont. "We don't have the triggers for a crash."

In the 1987 stock market crash, for example, the Dow fell 508 points, or 23%, in a single day. But events leading up to the crash were far more unpleasant: The yield on the 10-year Treasury note rose to 10.23% in October 1987 from 8.83% at the start of the year. Short-term interest rates were rising at the fastest pace in four years, and the dollar was falling on international currency markets. "We don't have those pressures today," Stack says.

Valuations today are almost 50% below the sky-high price-earnings ratios (company's stock price divided by its earnings per share) in early 2000 — the last time the market plunged — with stocks trading at less than 16 times estimated earnings. The 10-year T-note yields fell to 4.52% Tuesday from 4.63% Monday. Gross domestic product grew at a robust 3.5% pace in the fourth quarter of 2006 and 3.4% for the entire year. Inflation remains tame at 2.1%.

Stack is still cautious. Tuesday's decline "is simply bringing investor expectations back to reality." Adds Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America: "I don't think we are set up for something dramatic, like a 10% correction."

Investors should get used to more sharp up-and-down swings, says Tim Swanson, chief investment officer for the National City Private Client Group.

Tuesday's "market action has no doubt left many asking, 'Is this the beginning of the end?' The short answer is: We don't think so, … but rather (it was) an important reminder that volatility won't stay low forever. After a very long period of low volatility, it is easy to get lulled into a false sense of security."

Swanson says investors shouldn't be surprised if there is more volatility. He's sticking with his moderately bullish stance because he doesn't believe the underlying fundamentals have changed.

The prime mover in the Chinese meltdown was the market reserved primarily for the Chinese, known as A shares.

"Those were the ones going crazy," says Raymond Mui, senior portfolio manager for Acadian Asset Management in Boston. The Chinese A shares rocketed 128% last year. "Chinese citizens were borrowing to buy into the stock market, and the government was clamping down on that," Mui says. "That's why you see the drop."

The National People's Congress, which meets next week, is widely expected to pass measures to dampen speculation. This week, the Chinese government required banks to increase their reserves to 10%, up from 9.5%, which makes less money available for loans.

The Chinese weren't the only ones pouring money into their local stock market. Investors poured a record $23 billion into U.S. emerging-markets funds last year, about half of which went to China funds. So far this year, an additional $6.8 billion has gone into emerging-markets funds, $715 million of which went to China funds, says EmergingPortfolio.com, which tracks fund flows.

The rush to emerging markets reflects a worldwide reach for higher returns than developed markets could offer, says Jerry Webman, chief economist at OppenheimerFunds. With those higher returns comes higher risks.

Big international funds took a hit Tuesday: American Funds EuroPacific Growth, which has $99 billion in assets, fell 3.2%. China-focused funds fell more. Fidelity China Region dropped 3.7%, and Dreyfus Premier Greater China Growth A fell 4.9%. Specialty exchange-traded funds really took it on the chin. IShares FTSE/Xinhua China 25 index fund fell 9.9%.

The Dow's decline of 3.3% wasn't nearly as severe. But that's not to say there weren't scary moments. Around 3 p.m. ET, the Dow appeared to drop 151 points in one minute. It happened with incredible swiftness because of a computer glitch that kept some trades in the Dow's 30 stocks from being immediately reflected.

Dow Jones, the media company that manages the flagship index, said that around 2 p.m. it discovered computers were not properly calculating trades. The company blamed the problem on heavy volume and switched to a backup computer. The result: a massive swoon in the index that happened in the seconds it took Dow Jones to switch to its secondary computers.

Measured by percentage loss, Tuesday's Dow decline looks much less threatening. It was the 37th-largest percentage loss since 1950, Stack says, and ranks at 237 since 1900. "In historical terms, it's pretty mild," he says.

One money manager who specializes in Chinese stocks says investors must put the decline in perspective. "If you want a guide to what's going on in China, the Chinese stock market is the last place to look," says Edmund Harriss, portfolio manager of the Guinness Atkinson Asia Focus fund. "It's a very thin market." Investors there tend to buy and sell according to price movements, not fundamentals, Harriss says. "We're seeing a technical pullback which, while significant, has to be seen in the context of the market more than doubling in the past 12 months."

Hu Xingdou, professor of economics at Beijing Institute of Technology, agrees: "The forecast for the stock market looks good over the next year. The Chinese economy is still growing, the state-owned companies are changing for the better, and stock prices remain relatively low."

The scary plunge did remind people that stocks don't go up in a straight line forever. "We'll get a sudden renewal of appreciation for risk," says Jack Ablin, chief investment officer at Harris Private Bank.

So where do we go from here? Orndorff won't rule out a "relief rally," but he advises monitoring how Asian markets react today to the heavy selling on Wall Street.

"The whole world is watching," says Headley.

US Durable Goods Orders Slide (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington A

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

US industrial investment appeared to have slowed at the start of this year as figures released on Tuesday showed a steep fall in demand for capital goods.

There was an unexpected drop in orders of durable goods across industry sectors as demand slid by a record 8 per cent to $204bn in January. The biggest monthly fall ever recorded underlined the continued risks to US economic growth from weak domestic business demand, which has lagged behind consumer spending.

The sluggish industrial activity highlights the US economy's reliance on consumers to sustain the growth of 2.5-3 per cent expected by the Federal Reserve this year.

The central bank has a fundamentally benign analysis of the US economy that sees growth recovering and inflation moderating, with interest rates on hold at 5.25 per cent for some time.

But the surprisingly cool demand for industrial goods revealed on Tuesday added to a chill that swept through global markets, as investors priced in an increasing likelihood that the Fed would be forced to cut interest rates.

The thin order books also prompted Wall Street economists to revisit their forecasts for growth for the first quarter, following already severely reduced expectations for growth last quarter.

Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JPMorgan, said: "The weakness in orders points to softness ahead for manufacturing and sluggish capital spending. The weakness was broad-based and points to clear risk to our forecasts."

The fall in orders was led by big drops in demand in volatile sectors such as aircraft, which fell 59 per cent.

Demand for capital goods excluding defence and aircraft orders fell 6 per cent, while orders for motor vehicles and parts dropped 5.1 per cent. However, there were signs of renewed vigour among American consumers, who defied expectations and saw increased confidence this month, according to a private survey by the Conference Board.

There were signs of tentative stability in the housing market as sales of existing homes rose by 3 per cent last month, the biggest rise in two years.

Sales increased to 6.46m last month from 6.27m the previous month, according to the National Association of Realtors. But the median price of a home fell by 3.1 per cent to $210,600 from a year ago. The Fed is cautiously optimistic that the housing market is levelling out.

Durable-Goods Orders Plunged 7.8% In January (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Orders for computers, machinery and other durable goods plunged in January, an indication that this year's outlook for modest economic growth may be making businesses cautious about their capital-spending plans.

Meanwhile, existing-home sales rose last month as lower prices and generous incentives lured some buyers back into the market. But economists say it will be tough to determine whether the housing market has reached a bottom before the spring selling season arrives.

The Commerce Department said new orders for durable goods fell 7.8% in January following a 2.8% increase in December, largely because there were fewer orders for transportation equipment. Boeing Co., for example, received 39 orders for new planes in January, down from an unusually large 212 in December. After two exceptionally strong years in which it secured more than 1,000 new orders per year, the Chicago-based aerospace giant expects to receive roughly half that number this year.

Economists tend to ignore transportation-led fluctuations in overall durable goods orders as long as underlying measures are solid. But that wasn't the case with yesterday's data.

Orders excluding transportation fell 3.1%, and orders for non-defense capital goods excluding aircraft -- a closely watched proxy for future business investment -- dropped 6.0% last month, the second decline in three months. The data suggest many companies are hesitant to plow their profits into such growth-enabling investments as structures and equipment, a trend that emerged late last year and appears to be continuing.

"We started to see some signs late in 2006 that the momentum in business equipment investment wasn't as bullish as it was earlier in the year," said Brian Bethune, U.S. economist at consulting firm Global Insight. "Now the momentum has diminished."

After increasing at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 7.7% in the third quarter last year, business investment in equipment and software fell at a 1.8% rate in the fourth quarter. Today, the government will release its updated estimate of the economy's fourth-quarter growth, and economists expect the initial tally of a 3.5% inflation-adjusted growth rate to be lowered to between 2% and 2.5%, mostly because of weaker-than-expected inventory accumulation and higher imports.

John J. Castellani, president of the Business Roundtable, whose members are big-company chief executives, said concerns over the future course of economic growth are making some companies cautious. These worries have been reflected in the group's quarterly surveys of CEOs. In December, 39% of CEOs surveyed said their company's capital spending would increase over the next six months, down from 56% a year earlier.

If sustained, weak business spending would impose another drag on the economy at a time when pullbacks in residential investment and manufacturing production are already weighing on growth. It would also come as a surprise to economists since most have assumed businesses will spend freely after a year of record-breaking profit margins. Federal Reserve policy makers are also forecasting solid gains in capital spending this year.

Meanwhile, the National Association of Realtors said existing-home sales rose 3.0% in January to a rate of 6.46 million units, or 4.3% below year-ago levels. The median sales price was $210,600 last month, down 3.1% from a year earlier. The inventory of unsold homes on the market was unchanged last month at a 6.6-month supply.

The combination of lower prices, reasonable interest rates and warm weather spurred home buying activity in January, and a cold spell in February could depress sales. The key question is whether buyers will come out in force this spring, enabling sellers to lift prices and builders to reduce unsold inventories without further production cuts.

"We shouldn't be surprised to see a near-term sales dip, but that will be followed by continuing recovery in home sales," predicted David Lereah, the Realtors' chief economist.

Separately, the Conference Board, a New York-based research group, said its index of consumer confidence rose to 112.5 this month from 110.2 in January, as consumers' assessments of economic conditions, including the availability of jobs, improved.

Economists Worry As Businesses Tighten Spending (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — Businesses are showing little appetite for investment in items such as heavy machinery and computers, a trend that is likely acting as a drag on the economy.

DOJ_NMG_0138009

A proxy for business investment fell at the fastest rate in three years in January, according to a report out Tuesday. New orders for capital goods, excluding defense and aircraft, fell 6% in January after adjusting for seasonal variations. That was the third drop in four months and the biggest since January 2004, the Commerce Department said.

While the numbers are notoriously volatile, the sharp drop last month raised concern among investors and economists that businesses are stepping on the brakes.

"This trend is not something that makes one comfortable about the strength of the economy," Naroff Economic Advisors President Joel Naroff said in a note to clients.

The data follow other reports that have shown businesses may be growing more cautious.

Business investment fell in the fourth quarter for the first time since early 2003, according to government data. A survey of 446 chief financial officers in November showed businesses expected to increase investment by less than 5% in the next year, a drop from a 7.5% gain they forecast in June, according to the study by Duke University and CFO magazine. A survey of CEOs by the Business Roundtable also has shown a decline in spending expectations.

And while more than 40% of manufacturers said in a Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia survey in January that they expected to increase investment, 21.7% said they planned to reduce investment, the biggest number since the question was first asked in January 2004.

A number of factors are making businesses scale back spending, says John Graham, a finance professor and director of the CFO survey at Duke University's business school. Interest rates have increased and energy costs, although off the record highs hit last year, are still elevated. Businesses are also watching how the slowdown in housing affects consumers.

Companies "are just going to be cautious in that environment," Graham says. "The last thing they want to do is build the extra capacity and they (later) find it is not needed."

The caution comes even though business balance sheets are in good shape, according to the Federal Reserve. Companies' financial assets were up 4% in the third quarter from the prior year, the latest data.

Business investment accounts for about 11% of U.S. economic activity vs. 70% for consumer spending. But business investment is still important to watch as a barometer of how company owners are feeling about the economy, which can influence hiring, salaries and other factors that can affect consumers, Union Bank of California senior economist Keitaro Matsuda says.

"Their sentiment is reflected in their buying and purchasing patterns," he says.

Recession Unlikely This Year, Many Economists Say (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske And Lisa Girion

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The dreaded R-word — recession — is back in play, contributing to Tuesday's stock market plunge.

But is recession a real possibility?

Many analysts say recession is unlikely this year, that Tuesday's market sell-off was long anticipated and would be short-lived as the economy rebounds from a housing slump. Also helping the economy are renewed consumer and business spending, a strong but not overheated labor market and possible intervention by the Federal Reserve, analysts say.

"The economy is percolating along pretty well except for the housing sector," said Edward Leamer, director of the UCLA Anderson Forecast, adding, "We don't see anything in the data that we monitor that suggests the economy is having any real trouble."

Stanford University economist John Taylor said that Tuesday's stock market drop might restore some volatility to what has been an unusually stable stock market, but that it was not a reflection of economic troubles.

"If you look at the overall economy, both U.S. and global, you see continued growth," Taylor said.

Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan brought the R-word back Monday, suggesting a recession could come by year's end. And recent data, including a surprisingly weak durable-goods report Tuesday, suggest the economy has not rebounded as strongly as some analysts had expected.

Nouriel Roubini, chairman of Roubini Global Economics in New York and a professor of economics at New York University, had predicted a recession to begin in the first or second quarter of this year and said Tuesday's market downturn provided more evidence of impending trouble. The government today is also expected to sharply lower its estimate for growth in last year's fourth quarter, down to 2.5% from 3.5% last month.

"We have lousy economic news," said Roubini, a former White House and Treasury Department economist. "It's just the beginning of much worse things to come."

With the recovery now 5 years old — long in the tooth by most economic standards — such warnings are not easily dismissed. But other analysts drew a distinction Tuesday between the slow growth they're seeing and conditions that could tip the economy into recession.

"Recession is becoming in my opinion a rather rare event, because the government has learned to manage the economy better," said Keitaro Matsuda, senior economist at Union Bank of California in San Francisco.

Matsuda said he didn't see the economy slipping into negative growth "any time soon."

"We don't see that happening in our forecast," said Kenneth Beauchemin, U.S. economist with Global Insight in Lexington, Mass. "Productivity growth has slowed down, but it hasn't been terrible and we expect it to pick up again. And there's still some slack in labor markets."

Beauchemin said that although unemployment remained a low 4.6% nationally, employers had been posting openings more slowly.

And Tuesday's data showed signs that the housing slump might be ending. The National Assn. of Realtors reported that sales of previously owned homes rose 3% since January, the largest gain in two years.

Beauchemin expects growth to post a "decent" 3% this year.

A recent decline in interest rates, helped by Tuesday's sharp bond market rally, raises another possibility: that the Fed might come to the slowing economy's rescue and cut rates. Concerns about possible blowups in the sub-prime mortgage market also could encourage the Fed to cut rates after pausing last summer in its two-year campaign of raising interest rates to fight inflation.

"There's going to be more and more talk about the economy being weak and the prospects for the Fed lowering interest rates," said Ed Yardeni, president of Yardeni Research in New York.

Yardeni said recession talk "has been brewing" among analysts this year, and Greenspan simply brought it to the fore, catching markets by surprise. Yardeni expects the government to report today that fourth-quarter growth fell to 2% but said it would rebound to 3% by year's end as consumers continue to spend, making a recession "not possible" this year.

Consumer confidence rose to a 5 1/2 -year high this month, with the Conference Board's index up to 112.5 from 110.2 in January.

"My view is, so far the economy continues to demonstrate that it's remarkably resilient," Yardeni said.

Although the Commerce Department reported Tuesday that new orders for durable goods fell by 7.8% in January after a December gain of 2.8%, Yardeni called the data "volatile" — not enough to stake a recession on.

Businesses have been dialing back spending, attempting to sell existing inventories, said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of Economic Outlook Group in Princeton Junction, N.J.

"That is not necessarily an indication that the economy is in trouble," Baumohl said.

Financial Experts Say Investors Shouldn't Panic (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

Don't panic. That's what financial planners were advising clients today as they tried to cope with the worst day for the stock market in almost four years.

It seemed the perfect day to hit the "sell" button. Stock markets around the world were tumbling and safe havens such as gold were taking a beating. But dumping stocks in the heat of the moment -- even one this hot -- wouldn't be prudent, financial advisors say.

"It's best to try to take the emotions out of market decisions," said financial planner Victoria Collins of the Keller Group in Irvine. "If your assets allocation is clear and you're confident about it, you should be able to ride out market fluctuations like this."

Of course, that assumes you have a clear asset allocation plan. Market meltdowns are painful reminders that an investment mix of stocks and bonds that matches an investor's risk profile and savings needs is crucial, pros said. Indeed, while stocks were suffering around the world today, U.S. government bond investors were enjoying a banner day.

"Days like today can be scary for people, but the focus on the long term and building a portfolio is still important," said Paul Herbert, senior mutual fund analyst at Morningstar Inc. "And on days like this, people get a reminder of just how important they are."

As a general rule, advisors tell their clients to lighten up on stocks as they get closer to retirement and move more money into bonds.

Fixed-income investments typically are less volatile than stocks, making it less likely that investors will suffer a blow that can't be recouped within the shorter time frame of their retirement years. Bonds can also provide a steady stream of income for retirees suddenly without a regular paycheck.

But advisors caution that forsaking stocks completely would be a mistake -- even for older investors and even on days like today. With people living longer and retirement expenses such as health care growing, the added boost that stocks can give a portfolio is essential, even for investors well into their 60s.

"The old rule of thumb of switching to 100% fixed income when you retire doesn't make any sense these days," Collins said.

Anatomy Of A Wall Street Freefall (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The dramatic drop in U.S. stocks began yesterday when sharp declines in the Chinese market triggered a global equities sell-off. News of a larger-than-expected drop in durable-goods orders heightened skittishness, even before the U.S. markets opened.

By the end of the day, the Dow Jones industrial average had suffered its largest one-day decline in percentage since 2003, dropping 416.02, or 3.3 percent, to 12,216.24. The sharpest decline occurred shortly before 3 p.m., when the Dow dropped 200 points -- triggered by a technological glitch that caused a backlog of trades to be calculated at nearly the same time.

The Nasdaq composite index dropped 96.66, or 3.9 percent, to 2407.86. The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 50.33, or 3.5 percent, to 1399.04.

The slide in U.S. shares erased about $600 billion in market value. Following losses last week, the blue-chip average erased all its gains for the year so far.

In early trading, even as the Dow dropped 100 points, many analysts shrugged off the decline, saying such fluctuations were not surprising and were relatively small, given that the Dow has gained 10,000 points since the Black Monday crash of 1987.

But after the rapid descent that put the Dow down more than 540 points, the tension increased, and traders speculated about what had caused the afternoon plunge.

"You have to figure . . . there must have been someone very large who got out," said Chris Low, chief economist with FTN Financial. "Every single market is down. I've rarely seen such a sell-off."

Analysts and economists said a number of factors contributed to the market's slide. "It starts out with the Chinese government saying they're going to crack down on speculators," Low said.

Every sector was affected, but among the hardest hit were commodities, which were riding high based on the belief that demand from China would only grow. The materials, energy and technology sectors were also knocked down, while emerging-market companies and riskier small-cap stocks took a hit as investors fled to safer turf, such as bonds.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies fell 3.8 percent, to close at 792.66.

With the markets awash in cash, investors have been willing to venture out to riskier investments, a trend that had to reverse at some point, analysts said. Yesterday, they were turning to safer investments. "Treasuries were up, large-cap stocks are off 1 percent, emerging markets are down several percent," said Jerry A. Webman, chief economist at OppenheimerFunds. "By the time you get to Shanghai, you're off 8.5 percent. There is a flight to quality."

Declining stocks outnumbered winners by more than 6 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange; 4.3 billion shares were traded, compared with 2.8 billion Monday.

Some market strategists said they were holding off on buying, seeing a potential for larger drops. Others characterized the retreat as a long-overdue correction and good for a market still fundamentally strong. They said recent increases in oil prices, geopolitical events in the Mideast and growing concern about the subprime-mortgage market combined to set off the market downturn.

"The trick is for real investors not to overreact," Webman said. "The last thing people want to do in this kind of environment is get off their long-term financial plans."Movers

U.S. Steel shares dropped $7.39, to $86.51.

Apple fell $4.72, to $83.93, after delaying the launch of Apple TV.

Caterpilla r dropped $2.43, to $64.83.

Walt Disney Co. fell $2.01, to $33.10.

Credit Correction (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Any equity selloff as large as yesterday's will produce a multitude of explanations. Among other culprits, we heard about "overbought" Chinese stocks that were due for a correction, a weak durable goods report, the Kabul explosion aimed at Vice President Dick Cheney (see below), and former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan for declaring Monday that a "recession" was possible later this year.

Our own "whodunit" contribution would point to the mortgage-related markets, which sold off nearly as much as stocks. This reflects the cracks appearing in the housing credit markets, especially in subprime loans but with some damage up the income chain as well. Along with emerging markets such as China, this is where the excesses have been most notable. And when Adam Smith does a house cleaning like yesterday's, he sweeps the dirtiest corners first.

The question is whether this is a forecast or merely a correction. As evidence of the latter, we'd point to Mr. Greenspan, whose Monday remarks seem to have been over-interpreted as a recession prediction. In the same discussion, we're told, he called the world economy "benign and stable." Nonetheless, we'd also note that Mr. Greenspan's predecessor as Fed Chairman, Paul Volcker, didn't muse about recession dangers after he left office in the 1980s. He didn't want to complicate Mr. Greenspan's monetary task at the time.

We also wouldn't make too much of one month's decline in durable goods. These are notoriously volatile, especially in transportation, which was way down in January. Today's report on fourth quarter GDP is also widely expected to be revised downward from the original 3.5%. But much of that revision may be due to an inventory work off, which bodes better for growth going forward. The labor market remains strong, if slowing from the rapid pace of job growth in 2006.

The bigger risks continue to be political and monetary. The era of tax cutting has ended with the arrival of the Democratic Congress, and other policy errors are possible (see further below). As for the Fed, we'd feel better if current Chairman Ben Bernanke had been running a tighter monetary policy for the last year; it might have left him with more policy room if the economy does turn sour. As it is, any easing now runs the risk of a dollar rout, which could lead to an even larger loss of confidence and selloff.

The current problems in the housing credit markets owe a great deal already to the Fed's mistake in keeping monetary policy too easy for too long during the late Greenspan era. We now have to ride them out, and Mr. Bernanke shouldn't make them worse with a panicky, premature easing.

Economy Appears Headed For A Period Of Turbulence (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - Tuesday's stock market plunge shows the start of a "correction," the age-old euphemism for a steep drop in stock prices, but it may also signal worse news than that.

A steady stream of recent data shows mixed signals about where the U.S. economy is headed. The old sage himself, Alan Greenspan, suggests recession could be looming.

Fasten your seat belts - some economic chop could be coming.

The Dow Jones industrial index fell more than 416 points, or 3.29 percent, in trading Tuesday. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite was off by 3.86 percent, and the S&P 500 was off by 3.47 percent. It was the largest one-day drop for markets since Sept. 17, 2001, the first day trading resumed after the Sept. 11 terror attacks

Tuesday's drops mirrored a global decline in stock markets as the investor mood turned bearish. Investors, who have been murmuring about a coming "correction" for weeks, are concerned that the U.S. and Chinese economies may be entering a period of cooling.

The drop underscores how connected the U.S. economy is now with the broader global economy. U.S. exchanges sank following a nearly 9 percent drop Tuesday on China's Shanghai Composite Index. It was the Shanghai's biggest one-day drop in a decade, and investors worried that interest rates may soon rise to douse China's sizzling economic growth.

Higher lending rates in China matter to average Americans. Most large American corporations either manufacture there or purchase from Chinese contract manufacturers. Higher lending rates in China would slow economic activity there and raise the cost of doing business. The costs could be passed back to Americans as pricier imported goods.

Adding to the economic uncertainty, oil prices are climbing again, due in part to the Bush administration's escalating war of words with Iran. Just weeks ago, some analysts projected a return to $40-a-barrel oil, but it now trades around $60 a barrel. AAA reports that unleaded gasoline averaged $2.37 a gallon nationwide on Tuesday, compared with $2.14 a month ago.

Other economic data are sending, at best, mixed signals.

The Commerce Department reported on Tuesday a 7.8 percent decline for orders of durable goods in January. It was the biggest dip in demand for business equipment in three years. The Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI said the drop was felt across industries such as transportation, high tech and industrial metals.

"There is no escaping the observation ... that growth in the manufacturing sector ground to a halt in September 2006 and continues to struggle as consumers rethink big-ticket spending and businesses turn risk adverse in their capital spending," said Daniel J. Meckstroth, the trade association's chief economist.

But the Conference Board reported Tuesday that consumer confidence in January jumped unexpectedly to its highest level since August 2001. And in another surprising announcement, the National Association of Realtors reported that existing home sales in January rose by 3 percent, the largest monthly jump in two years.

That good housing news, however, was tempered by concern about delinquent mortgages. The Mortgage Bankers Association reports that 3.8 percent of all adjustable-rate sub-prime mortgages are in foreclosure proceedings, up from about 3 percent in 2005.

"It's not a great number, but it's enough to make a dent on the sales numbers, so we'll see (home) sales continue to drop through the end of this year," said Patrick Newport, an economist with consultancy Global Insight in Lexington, Mass. "So far what we've seen is a lot of this has been contained to the mortgage market and particularly to the sub-prime market (of riskier borrowers). No one has a sense of whether this will spread to other markets, like the prime mortgage market. So far it hasn't."

John Silvia sees the U.S. economy as being "on the edge of a knife." He's the chief economist for Wachovia, a large national bank based in Charlotte, N.C. He sees below-trend economic growth, corporate profits leveling off and short-term lending rates higher than longer-term rates. This phenomenon, called the inverted yield curve, historically has been a harbinger of recession.

"When you go into a fog, it's hard to make commitments as an investor," Silvia said. "It's not the time to make big bets."

That cautious view sounds remarkably like former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, who told businessmen in Hong Kong on Monday that a U.S. recession was possible late this year or early next year.

While the "r" word got the headlines, Greenspan also warned that risk premiums are unusually low, meaning that lenders aren't demanding higher returns for riskier investments as they should.

"Risk is no longer perceived as major risk, at least as it was in years past, and that, I must say, I find disturbing," Greenspan said, according to The Wall Street Journal. "We do not and cannot look into history without being very concerned when you see the absence of awareness and concern about risk that we see today."

The concern sounded remarkably like Greenspan's warning in the 1990s that stock market investors were suffering from "irrational exuberance," a warning of the bubble that eventually burst and brought recession in 2001.

A Recession That Arrived On Cats' Paws (NYT)

By David Leonhardt

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

The nation's manufacturing sector managed to slip into a recession with almost nobody seeming to notice. Well, until yesterday.

Wall Street was caught off guard when the Commerce Department reported yesterday morning that orders for durable goods — big items like home computers and factory machines — plunged almost 8 percent last month. That's a big number, but it really shouldn't have come as too much of a surprise. In two of the last three months, the manufacturing sector has shrunk, according to surveys by the Institute for Supply Management that have been out for weeks.

But the new report seemed to focus investors' attention on the problems in manufacturing and became one more reason for people to sell stocks. By the time the market opened in New York, stocks in almost every industrialized country had already fallen sharply.

The trouble began in Asia, where the Chinese stock market plummeted, before spreading to Europe and finally this country. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index ended up with a loss of 3.4 percent, its fifth straight daily decline and its worst since 2003.

All of which raises a question that would have sounded strange even a month ago. Is the entire United States economy in danger of going the way of the manufacturing sector? Is it possible that we're headed for a real recession?

For months now, the economy seemed to shrug off the forces weighing on it and just kept on growing. But those forces never went away. If anything, a number of them have gotten stronger. And that's the most worrisome part of the bad news from the nation's factories: it fits into a larger story.

As stocks were dropping yesterday morning, an economist named Ian Shepherdson wrote one of his regular e-mail messages to clients: "Manuf is in recession; Fed please take note." Mr. Shepherdson, it's important to mention, is not one of Wall Street's perma-bears. When manufacturing last shrank, back in 2003, he correctly insisted that it was a false harbinger.

But this time, the manufacturing downturn stems from a couple of larger economic problems. One, of course, is the housing slump, which has caused a big drop in new construction and much less demand for doors, windows, countertops and a lot of other things that kept factories busy in recent years.

In recent weeks, the troubles in housing have spilled into the financial sector. Big lenders like NovaStar Financial are paying the price for extending credit to people who couldn't actually afford the homes they bought during the real estate boom. With many of those homeowners falling behind on their mortgage payments, lenders are making it tougher to get loans.

That's a sensible, and overdue, move. But it will hurt economic growth in the months ahead. The second big problem for manufacturers is the series of interest rate increases that the Federal Reserve has imposed since 2004.

They may seem like old news, because the last of them came eight months ago, but it typically takes a year to a year and a half for a rate increase to have its full impact. A lot of the big decisions affected by interest rates, like whether to buy a new car or a new piece of factory equipment, aren't everyday decisions. Only now are some families and businesses starting to react to the higher rates.

The economic news certainly isn't all bad. The housing problems still haven't turned into a crisis, thanks in part to interest rates that are still not high by historical standards. So the most likely situation is not a full-blown recession (often defined as two consecutive quarters of a shrinking economy).

The forecasters at the Economic Cycle Research Institute in New York, who have accurately predicted each of the last three recessions, argue that the current slowdown won't amount to much more than a lull. By the middle of the year, they say, low interest rates and healthy corporate spending will have the economy growing nicely once again.

Lakshman Achuthan, the institute's managing director, told me yesterday that he thought the odds of a recession over the next year were less than 20 percent. Mr. Shepherdson — the chief United States economist at High Frequency Economics, who's more bearish than most forecasters right now — still puts the odds at only 30 percent.

But for all the attention that formal recessions get on Wall Street, they are not really the benchmark that matters to most people. A significant slowdown that falls short of a recession can do a lot of damage to stock prices, profits and wages.

Only in the last few months, for example, has the current expansion grown strong enough to give most American workers pay increases that outpace inflation. Those raises would be endangered if the economy were to slow from last year's growth rate of 3.4 percent to even 2 percent.

"This is going to get worse before it gets better," Mr. Shepherdson argues. "We're in danger of slipping into something very like a recession, if not necessarily hitting the technical definition. It would be big enough to hurt, that's for sure."

The main message of yesterday's worldwide stock sell-off — as well as the stealth manufacturing downturn — is that the economy is facing bigger risks than we imagined just a few weeks ago.

In mid-February, Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, told members of Congress that he was worried about inflation taking off. The clear implication was that the Fed's next move might be to raise rates yet again to keep the economy from overheating.

Until yesterday, that seemed plausible. It doesn't this morning. Like stocks, the price of a futures contract tied to Fed policy shifted sharply yesterday.

Before the day began, investors expected the Fed to hold its benchmark rate steady through the end of the summer. Now they are betting that the rate will be cut once before July and again by the end of the year. If that's all that is necessary to keep the economy healthy, it will be a relief.

Plunge Leads To Predictions (CHIT)

By Bill Barnhart

Chicago Tribune, February 28, 2007

After watching the biggest one-day plunge in U.S. stocks in nearly four years on Tuesday, investors face two scenarios.

One is that Tuesday's market action, including a critical error by Dow Jones & Co. in calculating the Dow Jones industrial average, represented a catharsis in market sentiment and mechanics unlikely to be repeated.

"This was a flash point, a reality check," said Pat O'Hare, manager of investor content at Briefing.com, an online investor information service.

Noting that the day's decline began in China, O'Hare said, "Does a 9 percent decline in the Shanghai stock market really disrupt the economic order? The answer is no. We still anticipate the Standard & Poor's 500 index to gain 5 percent this year."

The second is that Tuesday's trading exposed long-simmering vulnerabilities in world markets, arising from investor exuberance, especially in Asia, and a wave of debt-financed speculation. Working through those issues could mean days, weeks or months of weak stock markets.

"This market has been compressed like a spring, and when you get a combination of events, that spring will explode on you," said trader Fane Lozman of Scanshift. "If something really happens, the market will get spooked. At some point, the Dow will get back to 10,000."

The Dow closed at 12,216.24, down 416.02, or 3.3 percent, after falling as much as 543 points, the biggest drop since the first day of trading after the Sept. 11 attacks. The S&P 500 tumbled 50.33, or 3.5 percent, to 1399.04. It was the worst day for both indexes since March 2003.

Analysts on both sides agree on several points. Major economies are strong. Interest rates are low. Even with Tuesday's blow to the China outlook, oil prices closed higher in U.S. futures trading.

Moreover, Tuesday's market sell-off virtually wiped out fear of an interest-rate increase by the Federal Reserve anytime soon. Treasury securities rallied strongly, sending 10-year Treasury yields to their lowest level since early December. The decline in 10-year yields, to 4.5 percent from nearly 5 percent in late January, is a godsend to the embattled U.S. housing market.

Given the economic fundamentals, it's hard to make a case for a sustained and significant drop in stock market values, even though the pace of U.S. corporate profit growth is expected to slow.

"The economic outlook remains reasonable in the U.S. It's supported by stronger growth in Europe and Asia," said James MacDonald, director of equity research at Northern Trust. Tuesday's sell-off "is just a deflation of people's view that we can just keep marching on without interruption."

Indeed, until Tuesday the stock market had put on a bullish run not seen since the 1950s. There were 228 days without a 2 percent pullback in the benchmark S&P 500, the longest such streak since a 293-day run in 1953-54.

Investor optimism, especially in Asia, suffered a big hit. The Chinese government signaled that it wishes to curtail speculative stock buying that had prompted a 140 percent gain in the Shanghai stock market composite index in the past 12 months. It worked.

At the end of New York trading Tuesday, the question was not whether U.S. stock prices would ease but whether the correction would be orderly and not turn into a self-fulfilling cascade.

To see the crosscurrents influencing the outlook, you need to take a global view.

Stocks continued to swoon in early Asian trading Wednesday, reflecting the enormity of the surprise U.S. sell-off. Sustained declines in the stock markets of developing economies and Asia could sour U.S. investors on one of the most popular ideas of recent years: emerging-market stocks.

For example, the iShares exchange-traded fund that tracks an index of emerging-market stocks sank more than 8 percent, back to its level in late November. For months, U.S. investors have been turning away from domestic equity-mutual funds in favor of international funds. A shift in sentiment could bolster U.S. stocks.

Slightly higher interest rates in Japan, implemented earlier this month by the Bank of Japan, reflect optimism about Japan's economy after years of economic stagnation.

But the prospect of still-higher Japanese interest rates has disrupted the so-called carry trade, by which speculators borrow in Japan to make higher-returning investments elsewhere. Traders said Tuesday's rally in the yen meant this strategy was unwinding.

Many analysts fear that threats to this sort of debt-financed speculation could prompt a severe reversal of financial markets around the world.

The fact that the price of gold sank along with stocks supports the view that the market action was a speculative blow-off, not a fear of economic stress. Gold, which is viewed by many investors as a safe haven, had advanced steadily since early January, nearly reaching $700 an ounce, before falling 3 percent Tuesday.

Separately, so-called margin debt, representing loans to investors issued by brokers and secured by stock, rose last year to the highest level since the peak of the U.S. stock market in early 2000. A sudden collapse of stock prices could prompt a wave of margin calls, forcing investors to sell to raise cash.

SUDDEN RETREAT Markets' Slide Spotlights Risks (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning And Craig Karmin In New York, James T. Areddy In Shanghai, And Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Yesterday's plunge in stock prices around the world, including the steepest percentage decline in the Dow Jones Industrial Average in nearly four years, signals that investors may finally be re-evaluating their insatiable appetite for risky investments.

The catalyst was Tuesday's nearly 9% fall in stock prices in Shanghai, one of the hottest and most volatile markets in the world. That helped send U.S. stocks on a roller coaster that ended with the DJIA down 416.02 points, or 3.3%, to 12216.24.

For a moment yesterday it was even worse. Starting just before 3 p.m. Eastern time, the Dow plunged more than 200 points in minutes, to a low of 12086.86, after a technical glitch delayed the reporting of its true value. 1

For months, global stock markets had been pointing almost straight up, ignoring admonitions that investors were excessively complacent. The amount of compensation, in the form of higher yields, that investors usually demand for lending money to riskier companies or countries had been shrinking steadily. And with credit plentiful and cheap, private pools of capital have been borrowing to buy up bigger and bigger companies. Even prices of art and wine have soared.

The mood changed sharply yesterday. U.S. Treasury bonds rallied in a flight to safety by suddenly nervous investors. The 10-year Treasury note's yield -- which falls when the note's price rises -- sank to 4.47% at one point. The Treasury note's yield ended the day at a two-month closing low of 4.515%.

The atmosphere first began to shift Sunday night, New York time, when former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, speaking by satellite to a Hong Kong audience, used the word "recession" and appeared to question the widespread notion that the current expansion will last all decade. "We do not and cannot look into history without being very concerned when you see the absence of awareness and concern about risk that we see today," Mr. Greenspan said.

Stocks didn't flinch at first. But on Tuesday, a day after hitting a record high, the Shanghai Composite Index fell 8.8% for no obvious reason, its biggest drop since jitters in 1997 about the death of Communist Party elder Deng Xiaoping. Analysts suggested investors wanted to get out of the soaring market before Beijing made any moves to cool it, such as new trading taxes.

GLOBAL SPIN

· The News: A selloff in China stocks triggered market declines around the globe yesterday.

· What's Happening: Investors may finally be tempering their appetite for risky investments of all sorts.

Then in the U.S., the Commerce Department made Mr. Greenspan appear prophetic yesterday with its report that orders for big-ticket factory goods fell sharply in January. That raised questions about the strength of capital spending, a force that many have been counting on to offset housing-market weakness.

About the same time, mortgage lender Freddie Mac said it was tightening standards on subprime loans. It was one more sign the market for loans to the least creditworthy borrowers was deteriorating rapidly. Defaults are up. Lenders' shares are down. The prospect that lenders will grow increasingly tightfisted has raised concerns that the worst isn't yet over for the housing sector, which has been showing some signs of stabilizing.

A weaker-than-expected U.S. economy could undermine many assumptions that have been underlying investors' embrace of risk. It could lead to higher defaults among companies that have taken on large amounts of debt. And it could undermine the outlook for foreign markets, which tend to depend far more on the U.S. economy than the U.S. depends on theirs.

The remarkably low concern about risk has been the most striking feature of markets world-wide in recent years. Stocks have risen, and the riskiest markets have risen furthest. Yields on bonds from the riskiest countries, companies and mortgages have fallen the most. These trends have had powerful effects on businesses and economies. They have sparked a wave of private-equity buyouts of companies such as the big bid for utility TXU Corp. this week.

There are several reasons for investors' appetite for risk: Growth has been steady and inflation low world-wide for several years. China, oil-rich countries and other emerging economies are generating savings far in excess of their domestic needs, and need to invest it somewhere. The concern has been that investors have extrapolated such trends too far.

Despite yesterday's financial-market turmoil, there is little sign the prognosis for the U.S. economy has changed much. Strong readings on home sales in January and consumer confidence in February suggested that the U.S. economy may be growing at about a modest 2% annual rate. "The growth situation is not great, but I don't think it's much different from what the Fed has been anticipating for a while," said Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

Still, corporate-profit growth, in double digits for more than three years, is showing signs of falling back to single digits this year. In the fifth year of a bull market, money managers increasingly have been worrying that stocks are overdue for a significant pullback. So they've been poised to sell at the first sign of trouble.

Many central banks maintain relatively low interest rates. But the shift in market sentiment comes amid increasing signs central bankers are ready to tighten the credit spigot.

The Chinese central bank has been trying to cool lending. Japan's central bank recently raised interest rates -- albeit to just 0.5% from 0.25% -- in part to discourage speculative borrowing in its markets. The European Central Bank yesterday reported that money supply grew at its fastest rate in 17 years in January in countries that use the euro, a trend that could argue for higher European rates.

The major exception is the U.S. Fed, which appears to be on hold for the foreseeable future. Though it has a bias to raise rates again if inflation worsens, futures markets are betting the next rate move is a cut.

The market setbacks were broad yesterday. Major stock-market indexes in France and Germany fell 3% each, Britain's fell 2.3%, Turkey was down 4.5% and Brazil plunged 6.6%.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

18 · WSJ's David Wessel discusses19 Tuesday's big selloff and whether this is a reflection that something is amiss in the global economy.

· Barron's associate editor Michael Santoli says20 eight straight months of pent-up selling combined with China's volatility helped spur Tuesday's market drama.

Investors dumped bonds of developing countries, sharply widening their yields compared with safe U.S. Treasurys. This so-called "spread" widened by 0.14 percentage point -- a major increase -- as investors demanded higher returns for owning the riskier assets. Some investors in these emerging markets believe a correction is long overdue. "We need to be paid a lot more for the additional risk we are taking," said Andrew Feltus, a bond-fund manager at Pioneer Investments in Boston.

In another sign of risk aversion, the Japanese yen strengthened more than 2% against the U.S. dollar, its biggest jump in about a year. Global speculators have for years been borrowing yen, taking advantage of Japan's low interest rates, and then investing in markets that promised higher returns. The practice, known as the carry trade, has been an emblem of investors' seemingly limitless appetite for risky strategies.

Yesterday's tumult spurred some traders who used this strategy to begin reversing it. That meant closing out some of their riskier bets and putting the money back into yen -- thus giving the yen a boost. These sales by investors in the carry trade apparently contributed directly to the global stock declines.

Yesterday was the heaviest trading day ever for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange: 4.07 billion shares. One trader said he was unable to fill all his orders on the NYSE trading floor in the last 15 minutes of the trading day. Instead, he was rerouting orders to alternative electronic venues away from the Big Board. "We just hit a brick wall," said Stephen Porpora, an NYSE floor broker with William O'Neil. "These markets move faster than anyone can."

With increased electronic trading -- in which stocks are bought and sold by computer instead of on a traditional trading floor -- traders "can't slow things down" as they used to when a crush loomed, Mr. Porpora said. At around 3 p.m. he saw the Dow slip by more than 100 points in seconds as he tried to trade a large, volatile stock. One order entered around 3:58 p.m. took 10 minutes to process, even though the market officially closes at 4 p.m., he said. Usually, trades are processed in less than a minute.

Volatility, which has been tame for months, soared yesterday, as measured by the CBOE Volatility Index.

China's impact on the day's events is remarkable on several counts. Shanghai's so-called A-share market is largely closed to foreign investors, and local speculators who make up its primary investors typically pay little attention to factors outside of China.

Chinese share prices, after years in the doldrums, have soared for much of the past 20 months -- a rally that has prompted millions of Chinese to take up stock trading. Officials have expressed concern about the pace of the runup, after the benchmark index surged 130% in 2006.

Traders said the index's close above 3,000 earlier this week made them nervous that the government would have added reason to adopt new taxes or other measures to apply brakes to the market when China's legislature convenes next week for its annual session. The government yesterday denied rumors it was considering a 20% capital-gains tax on stock investments, the state-run Shanghai Securities News reported.

The long rally has made China's stock market more important globally. Many of the world's best-performing mutual funds last year targeted stocks of Chinese companies listed overseas. China's stock market long has been divorced from the underlying economy, with share prices undergoing several boom and bust cycles even as growth has hummed along with remarkable consistency. As China's economic boom made many of its citizens wealthier in recent years, most Chinese ignored stocks and instead spent money on apartments, new cars, and new businesses.

The market's rapid rise since mid-2005 has made stocks an increasingly important part of the lives of many Chinese. The gains have been fueled by millions of new investors -- from retirees to college students -- who have poured into street-level brokerage outlets to sign up for trading accounts. Online trading is gaining in popularity too. Since Chinese stocks rarely sell for more than a few pennies a piece, barriers to entry are low and as many as 90,000 accounts have been opened per day in recent weeks.

Chinese have plenty more money to invest. In total, individuals in China still sit on about $2 trillion in bank deposits -- far more than the $1.4 trillion in combined market capitalization for China's two stock exchanges, in Shanghai and Shenzhen.

In Chicago yesterday, at Harris Private Bank, chief investment officer Jack Ablin was sitting in the waiting room of his doctor's office waiting for a stress test when his trader sent an urgent email: "The market is down 500 points."

Mr. Ablin, who manages $50 billion, said he looked at the email and thought, "What am I missing?" The news from China "went from a blip to a tidal wave" in a matter of moments, catching Mr. Ablin by surprise. After receiving good news from his doctor after the test, Mr. Ablin returned to his office and began compiling a list of blue-chip stocks that he planned to begin buying today, he said.

In early trading Wednesday in Tokyo, the benchmark Nikkei 225 Stock Average was off 3.6%, and Hong Kong's Hang Seng Index dropped 3.8% shortly after opening. Shanghai also started with a fall in Wednesday trading, but began to rebound after about 10 minutes.

Stock Sell-Off In China Hits Wall Street (WP)

By David Cho And Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

A plunge in Chinese stocks rippled across global markets yesterday, triggering a massive wave of selling in the United States that sent the Dow Jones industrial average down 3.3 percent, or 416 points, its biggest decline since March 2003.

The news from Asia sparked the initial sell-off, but a confluence of other events, including news of rising real estate loan delinquencies, a surprisingly weak manufacturing report and a bombing near Vice President Cheney in Afghanistan, made an already difficult day worse.

For most of the morning the Dow declined steadily until it had fallen 300 points. Then, just before 3 p.m., it plummeted another 200 points before recovering slightly because of a trading glitch that led to a backlog of sell orders clearing at once. The Standard and Poor's 500-stock index, a broader measure of stock prices, also lost more than 3 percent by the close of the trading day, its biggest drop in 3 1/2 years.

By midday Wednesday, Japan's Nikkei 225-stock index was down 3.1 percent, to 17,557.65 and Hong Kong's Hang Seng index was down 3.1 percent, to 19,523.69. But the Shanghai Composite index, whose drop precipitated yesterday's sell-off on Wall Street, was up 0.15 percent, to 2775.82.

From currency markets to blue-chip companies to international stock exchanges, no sector was left unscathed yesterday. The day was reminiscent of when the Internet bubble burst several years ago -- traders and investors around the world stared at electronic boards and televisions showing markets falling deeper into the red.

Todd Leone, head of trading at Cowen & Co., said he saw "nothing but sellers. My whole screen is red. Every group is down."

Adding to the market's woes, former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan warned in a speech Monday that the U.S. economy might slip into recession by year's end. "It didn't help that Greenspan used the 'R-word,' " said Al Goldman, chief market strategist at A.G. Edwards. "People overreacted to that. He's still an icon."

Some analysts said, however, that it was about time for the market to cool after a breathless run-up in share prices.

"I don't think a one-day [sell-off] is going to do justice for what's been going on," said John O'Donoghue, co-head of equity trading at Cowen. "It wouldn't surprise me to see a total 5 percent correction and even more from here."

A major long-term concern among analysts is whether the heady days of "cheap debt" are coming to an end. The ability to borrow money at low rates and with favorable terms has fueled much of the world economy in the past few years, including the record-topping leveraged buyouts on Wall Street, the global run-up in real estate prices and the surge of investments in emerging markets overseas.

Signs surfaced yesterday that the easy availability of debt may be ending.

The mortgage company Freddie Mac announced tougher standards for its subprime mortgages, saying it would not buy such risky loans that are linked to a high number of delinquencies and defaults.

Moreover, investors fled emerging markets and took safe positions in the currencies of Japan and other countries where borrowing costs are among the lowest in the world. As emerging markets took it on the chin yesterday, the yen climbed 2.3 percent against the dollar, the most in nearly a year.

This occurred because investors sought to protect their money in case of a sustained downturn. In a growing global economy, these investors can take more risks and obtain higher returns by borrowing money and pouring it into emerging economies like China and India.

To many investors, yesterday's events were a stark demonstration of the vulnerabilities of the global economy, not just that of the United States. That a sell-off in China could have such serious reverberations around the world was noteworthy, said Joseph E. Stiglitz, a Nobel Prize winner and former chief economist at the World Bank.

"China has been the engine for global growth," Stiglitz said. "And a significant slowdown in China would have fundamental implications for commodity prices around the world. . . . Oil prices have been sustained by high Chinese demand. Just think of what would happen if there's a significant part of China that had a slowdown."

Analysts in China blamed yesterday's plunge, which at 9 percent was the largest single-day drop in a decade, on the news of a crackdown by the State Council, the Chinese cabinet, on illegal activities related to securities trading. According to a statement on the government's Web site, a special task force would be convened to provide recommendations for how to "repair" illegal securities activities.

On Wednesday morning, Chinese regulators denied rumors of plans for a 20 percent capital gains tax on stock investments, one factor that had sent markets lower.

China's stock markets began their surge upward in June 2006, after the government again allowed domestic initial public offerings after a long hiatus. There were a number of other securities milestones last year. The government took $200 billion of stock it owned and allowed it to be traded publicly. And several of the country's largest state-owned companies, including the Industrial and Commercial Bank of China, were dual-listed on the Shanghai and Hong Kong stock exchanges.

The Shanghai Stock Exchange rose 130 percent in 2006, and it was up 12 percent from Jan. 1 to mid-February. Just before the Chinese New Year holiday, the Shanghai Stock Exchange broke the 3,000-point mark for the first time.

Signs that China's two domestic stock markets, in Shanghai and Shenzhen, may be over-inflated began to show up in early February after Cheng Siwei, vice chairman of the Nation's People Congress, said publicly that he worried about a "bubble." The stock market fell 11 percent that week but quickly made up the losses and continued to hit new highs.

Then came China's Black Tuesday, which yesterday wiped out $100 billion of market value.

Feng Yu, a broker at China Galaxy Securities in the southeastern city of Ningbo, said he believed yesterday's drop was only a "technical correction" to make up for the unprecedented rise in recent months.

"At the beginning it was just banking stocks," Feng said. "Then it affected all shares," Feng said he believed the drop was precipitated by signals from the government that it wanted to slow down the explosive growth, which has prompted individual investors to line up for hours to open brokerage accounts.

Another piece of troubling news was released yesterday: The Commerce Department reported that durable-goods orders fell 7.8 percent in January, to a seasonally adjusted $204 billion. The decline, including in such large-order items as airplanes, semiconductors and appliances, surprised Wall Street, which had expected a 3.2 percent drop.

In Washington, the confluence of world economic events got the attention of the White House. "The president's economic advisers are paying attention to the markets," spokesman Tony Fratto said. "We continue to believe that the U.S. economy is sound."

The Federal Reserve, meanwhile, was silent, indicating that it did not view the market's drop as a threat to the abilities of U.S. financial firms to function.

This was in contrast to the Fed's response to the much sharper stock price declines of the October 1987 crash and after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, when the central bank issued statements reassuring the markets and investors that it would provide ample funds to the financial system to ensure transactions could be completed.

But analysts said Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke would probably be asked to comment on the global financial gyrations this morning when he is scheduled to testify before the House Budget Committee.

Biggest Loss Since Sept. 11 For Wall Street (LAT)

By Walter Hamilton

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

The Dow Jones industrial average suffered its worst loss in six years today as an overnight plunge in Chinese stocks and fears about slowing economic growth sent investors into a worldwide dash for the exits.

The Dow, which at one point was down more than 500 points, finished with a loss of 416.02 points to close at 12216.24. It was the Dow's biggest loss since September 2001, when it fell following the terrorist attacks in New York and at the Pentagon.

The decline stirred memories of the Dow's historic 508-point drop in October 1987. But with the market so much higher today, the drop was far lower in percentage terms than 20 years ago. While the 1987 slide was a 22.6% plunge, Tuesday's was a 3.3% fall.

"Not to make light of 400 or 500 points, but this is a natural market correction," said Robert W. Bissell, president of Wells Capital Management in Los Angeles.

At the heart of the sell-off were long-simmering fears that economic growth, particularly in the U.S., may be slowing from its torrid pace of the last year.

"The fear is that economic growth is slowing and, more important, that [corporate] profits are slowing," said Diane Swonk, chief economist at Mesirow Financial in Chicago.

The immediate catalyst was an almost 9% drop in the Chinese market, which was triggered by the Chinese government taking steps to rein in the rampant market speculation that had sent its shares soaring in recent months.

Selling pressure increased steadily throughout most of the day in the U.S. and was fed by several other factors, including disappointing economic news and comments from former Federal Reserve chief Alan Greenspan that it is possible the U.S. could slip into a recession this year.

All that came at a time when the U.S. had gone an unusually long period without a deep sell-off, and some market veterans said investors were looking for a reason to unload their stocks.

"At least for the last three years, everybody's been waiting for the other shoe to drop, or for both shoes to drop," said Brian Wesbury, chief economist at First Trust Advisors in Lisle, Ill.

Several experts said the sell-off was overdone, and that the U.S. economy remains on solid footing.

"I don't think the typical investor will look back and say, 'the Chinese sell-off was a major event in my investing life,'" said John Bollinger, head of Bollinger Capital Management in Manhattan Beach.

Doubts Trigger 416-point Dow Dive (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

The Dow Jones Industrial Average plunged 416 points yesterday, the most since the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, as worries about the U.S. economy suddenly surged and sent inflated stock markets tumbling around the world.

The chain reaction started in China, where a 9 percent drop in the main stock index, the worst in 10 years, was triggered by government moves to quell stock speculation and a speech by former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan pointing out that profits in the U.S. have peaked and the business cycle may be drawing to a close with a recession possible -- though not likely -- by year-end.

After reverberating in trading in Asia and Europe on Monday night, doubts about the U.S. economy were reinforced by fresh data yesterday raising fears that the U.S. housing and manufacturing sectors are headed back into recession as a result of sharply tighter credit conditions and the end of a capital spending boom.

"It's a mood swing to more concern about the economy," said Alexander P. Paris, analyst at Barrington Research Associates Inc. He noted that the darker outlook likely will be underscored by news today that economic growth slowed to 2.5 percent or less at the end of last year.

"Superimposed on that you have this China thing. That's the powder that ignited it," he said. Like many economists, Mr. Paris says the economy is fundamentally healthy and that the market is overreacting to the weak points.

In a frenzied day of trading, every stock sector posted big losses. The market started out the day with a mild downturn, but the sheer volume of trading caused a computer glitch that turned the downdraft into what looked like a free fall about 2:30 p.m., when the Dow dropped suddenly by about 300 points.

Dow Jones & Co. Inc. said it discovered its computers were not properly calculating trades and it had to switch to a backup computer, which caused the massive swoon in the index.

The Dow fell 546 points, or 4.3 percent, to 12,086 before recovering some ground in the last hour of trading to close down 3.29 percent to 12,216. Because the worst of the plunge on the Dow and the Standard & Poor's 500 Index did not exceed 5 percent, the New York Stock Exchange's trading limits, designed to halt the most precipitous moves, were not activated.

Nevertheless, in terms of points, the Dow's drop was the worst since Sept. 17, 2001, the first trading day after the terrorist attacks, when the blue chips closed down 685, or 7 percent. Just a week ago, the Dow had reached a new high of 12,796.

The broader S&P 500 lost 50 points, or 3.47 percent, to end at 1,399, while the tech-dominated Nasdaq Composite Index fell 97 points, or 3.86 percent, to 2,408.

Before the Wall Street drubbing, European markets fell from 1 percent to 3 percent on the Chinese news. Hong Kong's benchmark Hang Seng Index dropped a relatively mild 1.8 percent.

Traders expect Wall Street's losses to reverberate in markets overnight and possibly lead to more selling in the U.S. today.

Bryan Piskorowski, stock analyst at Wachovia Securities, said the market's "nasty little sell-off" was due to "good old-fashioned profit-taking" after seven straight months of market gains in the U.S. that had left most stocks at lofty price levels.

"The market was due for a pullback. We're getting it," he said. "The size and scale was somewhat surprising," he added, but he expects the market to resume its upward trend after reaching a bottom in the next few days.

Mr. Piskorowski noted that the drop was less than 5 percent on Wall Street, and even the 9 percent drop in the Shanghai Composite Index looked minor against the backdrop of a 130-percent gain in Chinese stocks in the past year and a 13 percent run-up in the previous six sessions.

Still, the economic outlook has dimmed in the past month. A Commerce Department report yesterday of a 7.8 percent drop in orders for big-ticket goods from U.S. factories in January showed that "growth in the manufacturing sector ground to a halt in September 2006 and continues to struggle as consumers rethink big-ticket spending and businesses turn risk averse in their capital spending," said Daniel J. Meckstroth, chief economist for the Manufacturers Alliance.

But the biggest change of fortunes has been the collapse in housing. After stabilizing somewhat at the end of last year, a plunge in home building resumed last month, and a potentially destabilizing fall in home prices got deeper. A report from the National Association of Realtors yesterday showed a 3.5 percent drop in the median home price nationwide -- and prices have fallen even further in big cities such as Boston and San Diego.

Economists expect the housing downturn to worsen before it gets better as increasing defaults on mortgages for the purchase of overpriced homes are starting to pinch home lenders and prompt them to close the spigot of easy money that fueled the housing boom.

Mortgage giant Freddie Mac announced yesterday it will no longer buy high-risk home mortgages prone to foreclosure, such as loans made with little or no documentation of a borrower's income and job status.

"The housing market is in the middle of a far-reaching adjustment," said Roger M. Kubarych, economist at Unicredit Markets. While consumer confidence and spending has been holding up well, the downturns in housing and manufacturing will slow growth in the first half of the year to the weakest pace since the 2001 recession, he said.

Markets Find It Hard To Break The Greenspan Habit (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As chairman of the Federal Reserve, Alan Greenspan had 200 Ph.D. economists at his disposal to help decipher economic and market trends. Now, in the year since retiring from the job he held for 18 years, he relies on less than a half-dozen staffers to analyze the same economic trends.

The last 48 hours have made clear, though, that investors can be just as devoted to what he has to say about those trends -- a devotion some say makes it harder to concentrate on what his successor, Ben Bernanke, has to say.

Mr. Greenspan told an audience via satellite early Monday, Hong Kong time, that a U.S. recession was possible. "When you get this far away from a recession, invariably forces build up for the next recession, and indeed we are beginning to see that sign," he said, according to Dow Jones Newswires. "For example, in the U.S., profit margins ... have begun to stabilize, which is an early sign we are in the later stages of a cycle."

Mr. Greenspan didn't say a recession was likely. Indeed, he said most forecasters don't see one, the global environment is "benign" and there has been no "significant spillover" from the contraction in housing activity. His comments appeared more aimed at questioning the conviction of many investors that because each of the last two expansions lasted a decade, this one, now five years old, will, too.

But the perceived pessimism of the remarks grew as headlines made their way around trading rooms and were blamed for helping contribute to a two-day, world-wide selloff in stocks, a plunge in bond yields as bond prices rallied, and increased market expectations of a cut in interest rates by the Fed.

In a widely distributed email yesterday, Stan Jonas of hedge fund Dutch Book Partners LLC wrote, "MR. GSPAN SAYS A RECESSION IS LIKELY."

The power of Mr. Greenspan's remarks both awed and frustrated some in the markets. "Somehow, he's still the maestro," said Thomas Joseph Marta, a fixed-income strategist at RBC Capital Markets. "Even though Bernanke is the one calling the shots, Greenspan's crystal ball is somehow given more weight."

He compared it with a retired general commenting on military matters on cable television. "They're loose cannons and can do a lot more damage than good, and I see Greenspan the same way."

Alan Blinder, who served as vice chairman of the Fed under Mr. Greenspan in the mid-1990s, said, "From the Fed's point of view, it's a little off message. What Greenspan said was noticeably more pessimistic than the Fed's outlook."

Keeping Quiet

There are no formal prohibitions on what a Fed official talks about after he leaves the Fed, other than confidential Fed deliberations. Upon retiring, though, Mr. Greenspan went further and said he would follow the example of his predecessor, Paul Volcker, and not comment on his successor's monetary policy. By most accounts he has stuck to that commitment.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Greenspan said, "I have been scrupulous not to respond to any questions which refer directly to monetary policy, what the Fed is doing, or what it should do."

He added: "What I do talk about are the global forces that are functioning, how the world is running and how the economy is developing in a manner that I used to do when I was an economic consultant. The only difference is back then I'd discuss what the Fed was going to do as a consequence of all this. Now, I just don't do that."

But Mr. Greenspan's observations on economic and market developments have been inevitably interpreted for their significance toward interest rates.

Barely a week after he left office a year ago, he appeared at a private event for fewer than a dozen clients of Lehman Brothers, mostly prominent hedge-fund managers. Reports of his remarks filtered out the next day, roiling markets.

At the time, some in the market and some of his former colleagues questioned his judgment for hitting the speech circuit so soon after leaving office.

Yesterday, that criticism was largely absent, in part because Mr. Bernanke is widely considered to have established himself as a credible Fed chairman in his own right. "You can't expect him to be quiet forever," said Mr. Blinder, who now teaches at Princeton University but also analyzes Fed policy for fee-paying clients.

Market Overreaction?

Adds Robert Parry, former president of the San Francisco Fed: "It's hard for me to blame him for what could turn out to be an overreaction by markets."

Yesterday, Mr. Greenspan said, "I recognize there is no way I can fully insulate myself, but I do my best."

As chairman from 1987 to 2006, Mr. Greenspan became famous for his carefully crafted, often opaque remarks.

When he spoke clearly, it often took markets by surprise -- triggering an outsize reaction, and, often, a later re-examination of what he really said.

'Irrational Exuberance'

In 1996, he asked if stock investors were seized with "irrational exuberance," triggering a brief stock selloff.

In 2003, he said the Fed needed a "firebreak" against deflation, triggering a plunge in bond yields on expectations of steep rate cuts that ultimately didn't come.

Since leaving office he has become a more relaxed speaker, willing to say things in language that a Fed chairman usually avoids, such as the possibility of recession.

"An entire niche within the market was dedicated over the period of two decades to interpreting the musings of the oracle," said Joseph Brusuelas, chief U.S. economist for IDEAglobal, a financial advisory service.

Since leaving the Fed, Mr. Greenspan has set up shop in a plush, sun-drenched office in downtown Washington with a Bloomberg terminal and a handful of staffers, including two research associates.

That, along with the Internet, gives him the ability to study most economic data with the same intensity he did at the Fed.

He is also continuing to work, with Fed economist James Kennedy, on a project the two began at the Fed: building a database to examine the flows of money through the housing and mortgage market.

The two have published one paper on the subject and another is forthcoming. Other than that, he has little contact with his former colleagues except at social occasions.

Book Release

Other than his speaking engagements, for which media reports and clients say Mr. Greenspan is usually paid $150,000, his main activity is completing his book, with some fact-checking help from a few retired Fed economists. Titled "The Age of Turbulence," it is due to be released by Penguin Group on Sept. 17.

A central theme of the book, according to people with whom he has spoken, is a theme he addressed Monday: The U.S. and global economies are far more resilient now to economic and financial shocks.

But, in a telling note, he also warned his audience,

"We do not and cannot look into history without being very concerned when you see the absence of awareness and concern about risk that we see today."

As for how Mr. Bernanke feels about Mr. Greenspan's comments, Al Broaddus, who served with Mr. Bernanke on the Fed, says he can't imagine the chairman being ruffled by his predecessor's remarks or their impact on markets.

"He's just going to do what he feels he needs to do. The first year of his tenure has shown that ... he keeps his eye on the ball. Recently, the perceptions of [the Fed] in markets seem very favorable."

Greenspan Comments Helped Grease Markets' Skid (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - He's baaaack.

More than a year after leaving the Federal Reserve, former chairman Alan Greenspan is again grabbing headlines, this time for saying the U.S. economy could fall into recession later this year.

DOJ_NMG_0138023

Greenspan's comments, made via satellite to a group in Hong Kong on Monday, were partly blamed for a sell-off in world financial markets Tuesday. That suggests the former Fed chief, whose every utterance was parsed by investors during his more than 18 years at the Fed, still holds sway over markets.

"Greenspan is probably feeling awful today. He's probably thinking, 'How do I get out there and clarify things without making it worse,' " Wachovia senior economist Mark Vitner says.

The Associated Press quoted Greenspan as saying it is "possible" the USA could slide into recession in 2007. But he noted most forecasters are predicting the economy will expand into 2008.

"When you get this far away from a recession, invariably forces build up for the next recession, and indeed we are beginning to see that sign," Greenspan said, according to the AP.

Vitner and others say Greenspan's words were not that extreme. He didn't predict an imminent recession. In fact, he said it was "very precarious" to make forecasts months ahead.

Investors were already on edge and used Greenspan's comments as one excuse to sell, Putnam chief economist David Kelly says. "If it wasn't Alan Greenspan who upset the markets, something else would have," Kelly says.

A spokeswoman for Greenspan said he would have no comment Tuesday.

But Greenspan should be a bit more careful, knowing investors continue to follow his every word, says Global Insight chief economist Nariman Behravesh. "Ex-Fed chairmen should exercise more circumspection," he says.

Greenspan, 80, began making public and private speeches almost immediately after he left the Fed in January 2006. That drew criticism from some, including Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., who expressed his concern when Greenspan's successor, Ben Bernanke, testified before Congress in February 2006.

Bernanke is scheduled to testify before Congress today on budget issues.

Recently Greenspan drew attention after saying the downturn in the U.S. housing market was likely over.

Greenspan started an economic consulting firm and has a book coming out in September, The Age of Turbulence: Adventures in a New World, according to BookExpo America. The group says Greenspan will be interviewed by his wife, NBC correspondent Andrea Mitchell, at their conference on June 1.

As Ethics Panels Expand Grip, No Field Is Off Limits (NYT)

By Patricia Cohen

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

Ever since the gross mistreatment of poor black men in the Tuskegee Syphilis Study came to light three decades ago, the federal government has required ethics panels to protect people from being used as human lab rats in biomedical studies. Yet now, faculty and graduate students across the country increasingly complain that these panels have spun out of control, curtailing academic freedom and interfering with research in history, English and other subjects that poses virtually no danger to anyone.

The panels, known as Institutional Review Boards, are required at all institutions that receive research money from any one of 17 federal agencies and are charged with signing off in advance on almost all studies that involve a living person, whether a former president of the United States or your own grandmother. This results, critics say, in unnecessary and sometimes absurd demands.

Among the incidents cited in recent report by the American Association of University Professors are a review board asking a linguist studying a preliterate tribe to “have the subjects read and sign a consent form,” and a board forbidding a white student studying ethnicity to interview African-American Ph.D. students “because it might be traumatic for them.”

“It drives historians crazy,” said Joshua Freeman, the director of the City University’s graduate history program. “It’s a medical model, it’s inappropriate and ignorant.” One student currently waiting for a board to approve his study of a strike in the 1970s, Mr. Freeman said, had to submit a list of questions he was going to ask workers and union officials, file signed consent forms, describe the locked location where he would keep all his notes, take a test to certify he understood the standards.

Review boards, first created in 1974, were initially restricted to biomedical research. In 1981 the regulations were revised to cover all research that involves “human subjects” and is designed to contribute to “generalizable knowledge.”

Yet precisely how to interpret these rules has largely been left to each review board — 5,564 in all. And while the regulations apply specifically to research that gets federal dollars, many colleges use Institutional Review Boards to monitor all research, no matter where the funds come from. This system of helter-skelter enforcement, critics say, has no meaningful oversight and no appeal process.

Debbie S. Dougherty and Michael W. Kramer, two former members of a review board at the University of Missouri, Columbia, who wanted to study review boards, had to first get their own board’s O.K. Although they thought their project was exempt from board approval, the only entity authorized to make that decision is the board itself, and the only appeal if the researchers had rejected the ruling is also the board.

Bernard A. Schwetz, director of the federal Office for Human Research Protections, which administers the regulations, acknowledges that the guidelines covering the boards' actions have not been clear enough and says he intends to make public new proposed guidelines before the end of the year. Still, he said the priority is to protect human subjects and dismissed the notion that most nonmedical research carries few dangers. "Obviously the balance is very subtle," he said. "I think it's naïve to say there isn't any risk."

But to many faculty and graduate students, review boards are like a blister that gets worse with every step. Those outside of the hard sciences say the legitimate concerns over ethics and safety are largely irrelevant to most of their research.

According to a stack of reports, symposiums and studies by academic associations and scholars, the system's "mission creep" is having a pernicious and widespread effect on humanities and social science research. Legal scholars also argue the boards violate the First Amendment.

The growing number of complaints in recent years apparently stems from an overall crackdown after a series of medical-research blunders beginning with the death of an 18-year-old in a gene-therapy trial at the University of Pennsylvania in 1999.

A board is required to have a minimum of five members, including one nonscientist and one person unaffiliated with the institution, said Pat El-Hinnawy, spokeswoman for the Office for Human Research Protections. Larger universities often have several boards. Members are generally appointed for limited terms.

When Robert L. Johnson, the review board administrator for Appalachian State University, talks to students, he said he starts off by asking, "If you were going to participate in a study, what are the things you would like to know?"

The usual responses, he said, are: What are you doing? Will you use my name? Who's responsible if I get hurt? What's in it for me? Making sure those questions get answered, said Mr. Johnson, "that's the purpose of the I.R.B."

Mr. Johnson said his board met monthly and reviewed approximately 200 projects a year; most are routine, require what he called minor changes and get approved within two weeks. About 30 to 40 require full board review, which takes at least six weeks.

Timothy Wilson, a social psychologist at the University of Virginia, now in his second term as a member of Virginia's nonmedical review board, said that "I.R.B.'s naturally become cautious," but that given the constraints, "I think our board works extremely well."

In the past year, discussions about what some call the "I.R.B. wars" have sprung up in specialty publications like The Chronicle of Higher Education, conferences, scholarly journals and blogs. Although research proposals are rarely rejected, scholars argue that the requested changes in the wording of questions and consent forms can alter the nature of the study and scare off participants.

Bernadette McCauley, a historian at Hunter College, said she ran into trouble a couple of years ago when she tried to help students working with the Museum of the City of New York on an exhibition about Washington Heights. She asked if a few nuns who had grown up in that neighborhood and whom she knew from her research would talk to the students. And that, Ms. McCauley said, was "when things went haywire."

The review board discovered the request and lambasted Ms. McCauley for failing to consult with it, she said. The board also demanded proof that previous research for a completed book did not use any archival material involving living people and banned her from doing any research.

Michael Arena, the director of communications at City University, said in an e-mail message that Ms. McCauley initially refused to send in a "brief description" of her research so that board members could determine whether federal regulations covered her work. Ms. McCauley hired a lawyer and after six months of negotiations, the board agreed that her research was exempt.

Ms. Dougherty, an associate professor of communications at Missouri, said review boards were needed because "historically, social science has done things abhorrent to human subjects." Unfortunately the current process "obliterates a lot of research," she said, because untenured faculty and graduate students on a timetable cannot afford to spend months waiting for approval. So, for example, "instead of talking to people who are victims of violence, you might look at newspaper articles," she said, echoing a common complaint that the requirements cause academics to steer clear of controversial topics. Research decisions "should be guided by science," she said, "not whether or not it's going to get through the board."

Ms. Dougherty said she was willing to speak openly, unlike many graduate students and faculty, because she had tenure.

Professors also say that some board directives, like destroying interview recordings and notes after publication to ensure confidentiality, violate accepted scholarly practices. "There probably will be litigation," predicted Philip Hamburger, a professor at Columbia Law School who argues that prior approval violates the First Amendment. "There are potentially hundreds of thousands of plaintiffs."

Mr. Schwetz said there was no chance that some subjects like oral history and journalism would be altogether excluded from review, as some academic organizations have urged. “If we were just to say, ‘Assume you don’t have to take them before an I.R.B.,’ I think we would regret that,” he said. But he said the new guidelines “will give a lot of examples and will give more guidance on how to make the decision on what is research and what is not.”

Some critics fault the universities, placing blame either with overzealous panels or with university administrations that have not done enough to differentiate between research that receives federal money and research that does not.

Mr. Freeman of City University said that within the humanities “most faculty members don’t know these rules exist.” He added, “If they in fact followed these rules, the whole I.R.B. system would grind to a halt.”

Panel Finds Flawed Data In A Major Stem Cell Report (NYT)

By Nicholas Wade

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

An inquiry panel has found what it called “significantly flawed” data in a major stem cell paper published in Nature in 2002.

The article, which claimed stem cells isolated from an adult could change into all the major tissue types of the body, was seized on by opponents of abortion as showing that embryonic stem cell research was unnecessary since adult stem cells could provide all the predicted benefits.

The lead author of the article, Catherine Verfaillie, said yesterday that she had sent a letter to Nature stating that the flawed data should not be relied on but that they did not affect the article’s conclusions. She said the journal was resubmitting the article to the original referees for them to make their own assessment.

Problems with the article were first reported this month by New Scientist. Two writers for that magazine, Peter Aldhous and Eugenie Samuel Reich, noticed last year that a set of graphs in the Nature article was the same as that in an article by Dr. Verfaillie published in a different journal but ascribed to different mice.

Timothy Mulcahy, vice president for research at the University of Minnesota, where Dr. Verfaillie had led the stem cell institute, said an inquiry panel was set up after Dr. Verfaillie asked the university to look into the issue of the duplicated graphs, which she attributed that to a mix-up when preparing two papers for publication at the same time.

The panel confirmed Dr. Verfaillie’s account, Dr. Mulcahy said, and concluded that there was no issue of scientific misconduct. But it found another problem besides the duplication, involving inconsistencies in the data describing the proteins on the cells’ surface.

The university then sent both articles to stem cell experts to assess whether the conclusions would still hold if the inconsistent data were to be eliminated. Three experts said that conclusions would still stand, one that they would be weakened. Because of this lack of complete agreement, the university believed that the scientific community should be informed of the situation, through Dr. Verfaillie’s letter to the journal editors, and make its own evaluation, Dr. Mulcahy said.

Dr. Verfaillie is now at the Catholic University of Leuven in Belgium but still holds a part-time appointment at Minnesota. “I have no idea how this could have happened or why it happened,” she said, referring to the inconsistencies described by the panel.

Other laboratories have had difficulty repeating Dr. Verfaillie’s results, but recently some have succeeded, Dr. Verfaillie said, although they often gave the cells different names.

Recently she wrote an article with Irving Weissman of Stanford University, a stem cell expert renowned for his rigorous methods. But that article confirmed only that her cells could make blood, not that they would transform into other tissue types.

“I think he is still not totally convinced they can make all the other cell types,” Dr. Verfaillie said.

Dr. Weissman did not respond to e-mail messages asking for his assessment.

This is the second time that a major stem cell paper has come under criticism, the previous episode involving the collapse last year of Hwang Woo-suk’s claims to have generated embryonic stem cell lines from adults. Although Dr. Hwang’s case involved fraud and belongs in a different category, the problems with the two papers underline the difficulty of working with stem cells and the immaturity of the field, despite the large sums of money being invested in it.

“Working with stem cells is pretty tricky,” Dr. Mulcahy said.

Document Shows Romney's Strategies (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, February 28, 2007

Here are some views of Mitt Romney causing concern inside his campaign: His hair looks too perfect, he's not a tough war time leader, and he has earned a reputation as "Slick Dancing Mitt" or "Flip-Flop Mitt."

DOJ_NMG_0138026

Romney and his advisers have identified those perceptions as threats to his bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, according to an exhaustive internal campaign document obtained by the Globe.

The 77-slide PowerPoint presentation offers a revealing look at Romney's pursuit of the White House, outlining a plan for branding himself, framing his competitors, and allaying voter concerns about his record, his Mormon faith, and his shifts on key issues like abortion.

Dated Dec. 11, the blueprint is wide-ranging and analyzes in detail the strengths and weaknesses of Romney and his two main Republican rivals, Senator John McCain of Arizona and Rudolph W. Giuliani, former mayor of New York. The plan, which top Romney strategist Alex Castellanos helped to draft, charts a course for Romney to emerge as the nominee, but acknowledges that the "electorate is not where it needs to be for us to succeed."

It is unclear how the campaign is using the document. However, its expansiveness, level of detail and the involvement of Castellanos suggest that it is a significant strategic blueprint. On the campaign trail, Romney is sounding some of the themes outlined in it.

Romney spokesman Kevin Madden would not confirm or deny the plan's authenticity, saying only that the former governor has received an "overly abundant" amount of input on how to run his campaign. Asked specifically about the contents, Madden said: "If anything, it's a compilation of political conventional wisdom."

"We're obviously very, very focused on introducing Mitt Romney and his vision for leading the country into the future," Madden said. "And everybody recognizes that he's somebody with a lot of energy and a lot of ideas."

Campaign blueprints analyzing a candidate and the competition are not unusual; earlier this year, the New York Daily News obtained and wrote about a similar dossier from Giuliani's campaign. And the Romney presentation lacks any big bombshells. Still, it provides a window into the challenges and opportunities Romney and his advisors envision as he tries to win the Republican primary.

The plan, for instance, indicates that Romney will define himself in part by focusing on and highlighting enemies and adversaries, such common political targets as "jihadism," the "Washington establishment," and taxes, but also Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, "European-style socialism," and, specifically, France. Even Massachusetts, where Romney has lived for almost 40 years, is listed as one of those "bogeymen," alongside liberalism and Hollywood values.

Indeed, a page titled "Primal Code for Brand Romney" said that Romney should define himself as a foil to Bay State Democrats such as Senators Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry and former governor Michael Dukakis. Romney should position himself as "the anti-Kerry," the presentation says. But elsewhere in the plan, it's clear that Romney and his aides are aware he's open to the same charge that helped derail Kerry's presidential campaign in 2004: that he is a flip-flopper who has changed positions out of political expediency.

Because he is attempting to capture the conservative vote, Romney is facing persistent questions about his relatively recent shifts to more conservative positions on issues such as abortion, gay rights, and gun control. One page of the plan cites Kerry and says Romney doesn't want to spend 2007 facing skepticism about his conservative message.

The blueprint also describes political assets and vulnerabilities of McCain and Giuliani, who lead Romney in the polls.

McCain is described as a war hero and maverick with a compelling narrative and a reputation for wit, authenticity, and straight talk. But he's also seen as "too Washington," "too close to [Democratic] Left," an "uncertain, erratic, unreliable leader in uncertain times." "Does he fit The Big Chair?" the document asks. The plan calls McCain, 70, a "mature brand" and raises questions about whether he could handle the rigors of leading the free world.

Giuliani is called an outside-the-Beltway rock star and truth teller who earned the nation's trust for his leadership of New York City's response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But he is described as a one-dimensional Lone Ranger whose social views -- he supports abortion rights and civil unions for gay couples -- could destroy the "GOP brand." "We can't disqualify Dems like Hillary on social issues ever again" if Giuliani is the nominee, the document states.

The plan also touches on what it calls Giuliani's ethical issues, including his relationship with Bernard Kerik , former New York police commissioner who withdrew from consideration to become US homeland security secretary amid allegations of improprieties. It raises Giuliani's "personal political liabilities," an apparent reference to his three marriages and bitter public divorce from his second wife, Donna Hanover.

It is clear that Romney's campaign operatives plan to make sure that voters are familiar with the perceived weaknesses of McCain and Giuliani and conduct opposition research on the candidates. But the campaign, according to the blueprint, also wants to avoid attacking either man too directly or harshly, in part because Romney wants their supporters to ultimately shift to him. At a campaign stop in New Hampshire last week, he called McCain and Giuliani friends and national heroes.

The plan concedes that, with McCain and Giuliani in the race, Romney is unlikely to be the top pick for those voters looking for a "war/strong leader." His goal appears to be establishing himself as a credible second choice for those voters, but the first pick for voters looking for an energetic, optimistic, and innovative chief executive. (A page titled "Own the future" dubs McCain the past, Giuliani the present, and Romney the future.)

The case for Romney, according to the plan, is this: "Mitt Romney, tested, intelligent, get-it-done, turnaround CEO Governor and strong leader from outside Washington, is a better candidate than McCain & Giuliani to ensure that America's strength is maintained so we can meet a new generation of global challenges."

The document underscores Romney's aim to become the "only electable choice" for socially conservative voters. But the plan anticipates that Romney could face a serious threat if Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker who is considered one of the GOP's leading conservative intellectuals, decides to enter the race.

Romney's sensitivity to his Mormon faith as a campaign issue is apparent throughout the plan.

It acknowledges that some view Mormonism as weird and lists ways Romney should defend his faith, from highlighting the way he has lived his life, rather than which church he attends, to acknowledging theological differences with mainline Christian denominations while refusing to be drawn into an extensive discussion of Mormon doctrine and practices. It also suggests Romney might soon need to address the issue head-on, perhaps as John F. Kennedy did in a 1960 speech amid concerns about his relationship to the Catholic Church.

The document appears to raise the possibility of Romney delivering such an address at George H.W. Bush's presidential library outside Houston, the same city where Kennedy gave his.

Enmity toward France, where Romney did his Mormon mission during college, is a recurring theme of the document. The European Union, it says at one point, wants to "drag America down to Europe's standards," adding: "That's where Hillary and Dems would take us. Hillary = France." The plan even envisions "First, not France" bumper stickers.

In addition, the document provides a Romney roadmap for the early primaries, suggesting that he hopes to emerge as a credible "alternative to frontrunner" in Iowa, win New Hampshire, show strength in South Carolina, and be dominant in states, such as Michigan, that are eyeing early primary dates. The plan suggests Romney make full use of new media to reach voters, from feeding videos to YouTube to perhaps creating his own radio programming.

Like every Republican in the race, Romney faces the delicate task of how to talk about President Bush, whom the country gives low job-approval ratings .

But the plan lists two ways Romney can set himself apart from Bush. The first says, simply, "Intelligence."

Internal Romney Document Airs Concerns (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

An internal document shows Mitt Romney's presidential campaign is concerned about his vulnerability to charges of flip-flopping, while suggesting he can differentiate from President Bush with a single word: "intelligence."

Campaign advisers even fret that the former Massachusetts governor has too perfect hair, according to the 77-slide PowerPoint presentation, a copy of which was obtained by The Boston Globe.

The document also outlines plans for positively branding the Republican contender, negatively framing rivals John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, and allaying voter concerns about his record and Mormon faith.

One idea for dealing with the religious question is to address it head-on, perhaps as John F. Kennedy did in a 1960 speech amid concerns about his relationship to the Catholic Church.

The document appears to raise the possibility of Romney speaking at the presidential library of Bush's father, George H.W. Bush. It is located outside Houston, the same city where Kennedy delivered his speech.

The blueprint, dated Dec. 11, was drafted in part by Alex Castellanos, Romney's media adviser. It is similar to one for GOP rival Rudy Giuliani that was recently obtained and published by the New York Daily News.

McCain is described as a war hero and maverick with a compelling narrative and a reputation for wit, authenticity, and straight talk. But he's also seen as "too Washington," "too close to (Democratic) Left," an "uncertain, erratic, unreliable leader in uncertain times." "Does he fit The Big Chair?" the document asks.

Giuliani is called an outside-the-Beltway rock star and truth teller who earned the nation's trust for his leadership of New York City's response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But he is also described as a one-dimensional Lone Ranger whose social views — he supports abortion rights and civil unions for gay couples — could destroy the "GOP brand."

"We can't disqualify Dems like Hillary (Rodham Clinton) on social issues ever again" if Giuliani is the nominee, the document states.

Romney spokesman Kevin Madden declined to verify the document's authenticity in response to a request from The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0138028

"Outside consultants routinely offer input and analysis — both solicited and unsolicited — on the dynamics of a political campaign all the time," Madden said. "But we cannot and will not verify any documents that are not marked Romney for President, Inc."

Romney Latest To See Internal Critique Leaked (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Former Massachusetts governor and Republican presidential hopeful Mitt Romney has hair that is too perfect, a flip-flop reputation and a particular antagonism toward France.

That information comes not from an adversary but from a 77-page internal PowerPoint presentation about Romney's strategy obtained by the Boston Globe and published yesterday. Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani experienced a similar leak last month when his self-critical strategy briefing ended up in the hands of the New York Daily News.

In the Romney document, which his campaign declined to confirm as authentic, advisers confront the challenges that the former governor faces as he seeks the Republican nomination. Among them, the document says, are his newly conservative positions on social issues and his belief in the Mormon faith, which is viewed skeptically by many members of other Christian denominations.

The document notes that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is seen as a war hero but also as an inside-the-Beltway politician, the Globe reported. It sees Giuliani's political strength emanating from his post-Sept. 11, 2001, actions as mayor, but touches on his "personal political liabilities" -- a reference, perhaps, to his nasty and public divorce from his second wife, Donna Hanover.

It also contemplates using antipathy toward France as a campaign tool, suggesting that comparing Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) to that country might earn Romney votes.Date Set to Fill Ga. House Seat

Mark June 19 on your calendars. That is the day that Gov. Sonny Perdue (R-Ga.) has chosen for the special election to fill the vacancy created when Rep. Charlie Norwood (R) died on Feb. 13.

The two leading Republican candidates to replace him are state senators. Ralph Hudgens is making his second try at the seat after losing to Norwood in a 1994 primary. In that race, Hudgens led on the initial ballot but lost 51 percent to 49 percent to Norwood in a runoff.

Hudgens's primary challenge will come from Jim Whitehead, who is seeking to tie himself to Norwood's legacy.

Several other Republicans are either running or contemplating the race, raising the possibility that no one will claim a majority in the primary. In that case, the two top vote-getters would advance to a July 17 runoff.

Democrats are not expected to seriously contest the northeastern Georgia district, where President Bush won 65 percent of the vote in 2004.

Edwards Apologizes For 2002 War Vote (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, February 28, 2007

Democrat John Edwards said Tuesday that honesty and openness were essential qualities for a president, and that he was proud to acknowledge his 2002 vote authorizing the invasion of Iraq was a mistake.

Trolling for campaign cash on a three-day visit to New York — home of his chief Democratic rival, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton — Edwards spoke to reporters after attending a union-sponsored workshop on eradicating poverty.

Asked whether his repeated apologies for his vote would be a turnoff to voters over time, the 2004 vice presidential nominee said that after six years of President Bush, voters craved a president willing to acknowledge errors and change course if necessary.

"If you asked me what I think the most important personal characteristics of the next president are, I would say honesty, openness and decency," he said. "There's not a single voter in America who doesn't understand that their president is human, and their president will sometimes makes mistakes."

At a voter forum in Carson City, Nev., last week, Edwards said Clinton's decision not to disavow her vote was "between her and her conscience." He didn't mention her Wednesday, taking a swipe at President Bush instead.

Voters, the former North Carolina senator said, "want you to be willing to change course when something's not working. We've had six-plus years now of a president who is completely unwilling to do that."

For her part, Clinton's also had a busy fundraising week — thanks in part to an online effort by her husband, Bill Clinton.

In an e-mail to his wife's supporters last Wednesday, the former president launched a fundraising drive aimed at raising $1 million in a week. As of Tuesday afternoon, the campaign said it had brought in nearly $890,000.

Blacks Shift To Obama, Poll Finds (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jon Cohen

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The opening stages of the campaign for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination have produced a noticeable shift in sentiment among African American voters, who little more than a month ago heavily supported Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton but now favor the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama.

Clinton, of New York, continues to lead Obama and other rivals in the Democratic contest, according to the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll. But her once-sizable margin over the freshman senator from Illinois was sliced in half during the past month largely because of Obama's growing support among black voters.

In the Republican race, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who recently made clear his intentions to seek the presidency, has expanded his lead over Sen. John McCain of Arizona. Giuliani holds a 2 to 1 advantage over McCain among Republicans, according to the poll, more than tripling his margin of a month ago.

The principal reason was a shift among white evangelical Protestants, who now clearly favor Giuliani over McCain. Giuliani is doing well among this group of Americans despite his support of abortion rights and gay rights, two issues of great importance to religious conservatives. McCain opposes abortion rights.

Among Democrats, Clinton still enjoys many of the advantages of a traditional front-runner. Pitted against Obama and former senator John Edwards of North Carolina, she was seen by Democrats as the candidate with the best experience to be president, as the strongest leader, as having the best chance to get elected, as the closest to voters on the issues and as the candidate who best understands the problems "of people like you." Obama was seen as the most inspirational.

The Post-ABC News poll was completed days after aides to the two leading Democrats engaged in a testy exchange over comments critical of Clinton and her husband, former president Bill Clinton, by Hollywood mogul David Geffen, a former friend and financial backer of the Clintons who held a fundraiser for Obama last week in Los Angeles.

Early national polls are not always good predictors for presidential campaigns, but the Post-ABC poll offers clues to the competition ahead.

On the January weekend when she announced her candidacy, Clinton led the Democratic field with 41 percent. Obama was second at 17 percent, Edwards was third at 11 percent and former vice president Al Gore, who has said he has no plans to run, was fourth at 10 percent.

The latest poll put Clinton at 36 percent, Obama at 24 percent, Gore at 14 percent and Edwards at 12 percent. None of the other Democrats running received more than 3 percent. With Gore removed from the field, Clinton would gain ground on Obama, leading the Illinois senator 43 percent to 27 percent. Edwards ran third at 14 percent. The poll was completed the night Gore's documentary film "An Inconvenient Truth" won an Academy Award.

Clinton's and Obama's support among white voters changed little since December, but the shifts among black Democrats were dramatic. In December and January Post-ABC News polls, Clinton led Obama among African Americans by 60 percent to 20 percent. In the new poll, Obama held a narrow advantage among blacks, 44 percent to 33 percent. The shift came despite four in five blacks having a favorable impression of the New York senator.

African Americans view Clinton even more positively than they see Obama, but in the time since he began his campaign, his favorability rating rose significantly among blacks. In the latest poll, 70 percent of African Americans said they had a favorable impression of Obama, compared with 54 percent in December and January.

Overall, Clinton's favorability ratings dipped slightly from January, with 49 percent of Americans having a favorable impression and 48 percent an unfavorable impression. Obama's ratings among all Americans improved over the past month, with 53 percent saying they have a favorable impression and 30 percent saying they have an unfavorable impression.

Her position on the war in Iraq does not appear to be hurting Clinton among Democrats, even though she has faced hostile questioning from some voters about her 2002 vote authorizing President Bush to go to war. Some Democrats have demanded that she apologize for the vote, which she has declined to do.

The Post-ABC News poll found that 52 percent of Democrats said her vote was the right thing to do at the time, while 47 percent said it was a mistake. Of those who called it a mistake, however, 31 percent said she should apologize. Among Democrats who called the war the most important issue in deciding their 2008 candidate preference, Clinton led Obama 40 to 26 percent.

In the Republican contest, McCain was once seen as the early, if fragile, front-runner for his party's nomination, but Giuliani's surge adds a new dimension to the race. In the latest poll, the former New York mayor led among Republicans with 44 percent to McCain's 21 percent. Last month, Giuliani led with 34 percent to McCain's 27 percent.

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia ran third in the latest poll with 15 percent, while former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney was fourth with 4 percent. Gingrich has not said he definitely plans to run, and without him, Giuliani's lead would increase even more, to 53 percent compared with McCain's 23 percent.

When Republicans were asked to rate Giuliani, McCain and Romney on a series of attributes, Giuliani was seen as the strongest leader, the most inspiring, the candidate with the best chance of winning the general election, the most honest and trustworthy and the one closest to them on the issues. McCain was seen as having the best experience to be president, but only by a narrow margin.

Giuliani faces potential problems because of his views on abortion and gay rights. More than four in 10 Republicans said they were less likely to support him because of those views. More than two in 10 Republicans said there was "no chance" they would vote for him.

With Clinton and Obama as possible barrier-breakers in this presidential campaign, Americans were asked how a candidate's race or sex would affect their vote. What the poll showed is that Americans indicated they were less likely to support a candidate older than 72 or a candidate who is a Mormon than a female or black candidate.

Those findings could affect McCain, who is 70, and Romney, who is a Mormon. Nearly six in 10 said they would be less likely to vote for someone older than 72, while three in 10 said they would be less likely to support a Mormon.

The Post-ABC News poll was conducted by telephone Feb. 22-25 among a random sample of 1,082 adults, including an oversample of 86 black respondents. The margin of sampling error for the poll was plus or minus three percentage points; it is higher for the sub-samples.

Pardons Reemerge As Issue In Clinton Run (BOS)

By Michael Kranish

The Boston Globe, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Six years ago, the launch of Hillary Clinton's career in the US Senate was marred by allegations that her brothers had received payments from people pardoned by President Bill Clinton in the waning months of his presidency.

Now, in the wake of the launch of her presidential campaign, the pardon controversy has reemerged in an obscure court case in which Senator Clinton's brother Tony is battling an order to repay more than $100,000 he received from a couple pardoned by President Clinton.

Tony Rodham, who acknowledged approaching the president about a pardon for the couple, is the second of Hillary Clinton's brothers to receive money from people who were eventually pardoned by President Clinton. Hugh Rodham received $400,000 from two people, one of whom was pardoned and one whose sentence was commuted.

But while Hillary Clinton immediately expressed chagrin over the news in 2001 that Hugh received the money -- and asked him to return it -- she said Tony was "not paid," according to a congressional report. The Clinton campaign yesterday declined to comment on the case involving Tony Rodham.

Clinton critics have been seeking to revive an array of controversies, from the Whitewater land deal to the Monica Lewinsky case. The Clinton campaign has sought to depict them as old or moot cases. But the Tony Rodham case could be different because it is in court just as Senator Clinton's campaign reaches full speed.

Yesterday, US Bankruptcy Court Judge Marian Harrison of Nashville ordered Tony Rodham to respond by March 16 to the allegation that he failed to repay a loan of $107,000 from the couple pardoned by Clinton, according to attorneys involved in the case.

President Clinton's pardons have been a political issue for Hillary Clinton because of her ties to a number of the cases. In addition to the people who paid her brothers, those receiving pardons included commodities trader Marc Rich, a fugitive who was prosecuted for tax evasion by then-US Attorney Rudolph Giuliani and fled to Switzerland. Rich was pardoned after his former wife, Denise Rich, contributed heavily to Hillary Clinton's Senate campaign.

Controversy over the pardons was reignited last week after Hollywood mogul and former Clinton supporter David Geffen criticized the Clintons for the Rich pardon.

"It is a legitimate campaign issue," said Stephen Gillers, professor of legal ethics at New York University School of Law. He said that Hillary Clinton should answer questions about her brothers' and her own involvement in the pardons because "the stench of the Marc Rich pardon still stinks and it has never been adequately explained. "

The Tony Rodham lawsuit revolves around his work for a carnival company, United Shows of America, which was owned by Edgar and Vonna Jo Gregory. The couple, who had been convicted of bank fraud, hired Tony Rodham as a business consultant and paid him $244,769 in salary over 2 1/2 years, according to a congressional report.

President Clinton pardoned the couple in March 2000. The Republican-controlled House Government Reform Committee issued a 2002 report that said Rodham had helped the couple obtain the pardon.

Edgar Gregory has since died, and his company is now bankrupt. The lawsuit against Tony Rodham, brought by the bankruptcy trustee, revolves around whether the Gregorys loaned Rodham $107,000, or whether that money was part of his salary. The trustee for the bankrupt estate says it was a loan that was never repaid and that, with interest, it would now be $153,000.

When Tony Rodham's involvement with the Gregorys first became public in early 2001, Hillary Clinton said that her brother had known the couple "for some time . . . he has a personal relationship with them. He was not paid."

The House Government Reform Committee report the next year, noting that Rodham had worked as a consultant to the Gregorys, said a further review should be conducted to determine whether Hillary Clinton "knew of the financial relationship between Tony Rodham and the Gregorys when Rodham was lobbying the President for pardons." The report said Hillary Clinton's "statement that Tony Rodham 'was not paid' is not accurate."

Rodham yesterday did not respond to a request for comment. In 2001, he said on CNN that he had worked as a consultant for the Gregorys but that "on the pardon issue, I never received a dime from them."

Rodham also said that he mentioned the pardon application to then-President Clinton. "Yes, I did," Rodham said. "And I have no problem saying I mentioned it to the president."

Attorneys for Rodham and the bankrupt estate said they have no plans to involve the Clintons in the case and declined to comment on the pardon.

"We are dealing with a bankrupt estate, so we are not going to be spending a lot of money to flesh out the pardon issues that are related to this," Michael Collins, the attorney for the bankrupt estate, said.

Rodham's attorney, Samuel Crocker, said in an interview yesterday that he believed the case would be settled. Crocker said he had "no interest" in involving the Clintons in the proceeding or delving into the pardon.

Groups critical of the Clintons have tied the case to questions about the pardons. Judicial Watch, a group that has targeted the Clintons for years, said the bankruptcy proceeding should prompt the Justice Department to review the circumstances of the pardon.

But a Justice Department official wrote to Judicial Watch on Jan. 16 that "it is likely that any new allegations would be outside of the five-year statute of limitations period."

Judicial Watch last year tried to obtain unredacted documents related to the pardon of the Gregorys but were rebuffed by the Bush administration, which said releasing them would violate executive privilege.

The Clinton pardons were a major scandal in early 2001, as Hillary was beginning her term. She said she and the president did not know her brother Hugh had received $400,000 in fees from two people, one of whom received a commutation and one a pardon. Hugh Rodham has said he returned the money.

The Rich pardon received the most attention. Rich had been indicted in 1983 on charges of tax evasion and illegal trading with Iran. Rich fled to Switzerland and never stood trial.

Before Rich received the pardon in January 2001, his former wife, Denise Rich, contributed $70,000 to a fund supporting Hillary Clinton's Senate bid, and also made a large contribution to the Clinton presidential library.

President Clinton has said he pardoned Rich at the behest of Israeli officials, and has denied any wrongdoing.

Clinton Foundation Not Listed On Senator's Disclosure Reports (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

The charitable family foundation that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and former President Bill Clinton have operated since 2001 has not been listed on Mrs. Clinton's annual Senate financial disclosure reports for five years.

Aides to the Clintons said that the omission was a clerical error and that it was corrected immediately after The Washington Post brought it to their attention on Monday. The Post published an article on the foundation on Tuesday.

"It was inadvertently omitted from her Senate filing, an oversight that has since been corrected," said Philippe Reines, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton.

Details about the foundation have been on an Internal Revenue Service Web site for years.

According to the I.R.S. filings, the Clintons have contributed $5 million to the charity, the Clinton Family Foundation, and it has made grants to Yale University, where they both attended law school, and to other charities that have personal meaning for the Clintons. They and their daughter, Chelsea, are officers of the charity, but they do not receive compensation. All the money goes to other charities, the advisers said.

As a result of the foundation, Clinton advisers say, the couple receive the standard tax benefits for philanthropy.

"The Clinton Family Foundation was created solely for their personal charitable giving, and it represents only a fraction of their overall charitable giving," said Jay Carson, a spokesman for the former president.

Mr. Clinton's personal foundation directs millions of dollars to charities each year, and he has raised billions in corporate funds to fight AIDS, disease and poverty through his annual Clinton Global Initiative conference.

Feb. 5 National Primary (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 28, 2007

Pressure from the leading presidential candidates has set the stage for a Feb. 5 national primary that will likely include 20 states, possibly more.

Working behind the scenes and mostly through surrogates, Democratic Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), and Republicans Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), former Gov. Mitt Romney (Mass.) and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani have fueled a rush of states to hold primary elections on Feb. 5 next year, or earlier. As many as 23 states are in the frame to hold primary elections on that date.

Delaware, Missouri, New Mexico and Oklahoma in 2004 held their nominating contests on the first Tuesday of February, and are likely be joined this time by such big states as California, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, New York and Texas. They may be joined also by smaller states including Tennessee, Arkansas, Arizona, Alabama, Georgia, North Dakota, Utah, Kansas, Colorado and (for the GOP only) West Virginia and Nevada. The legislatures of Pennsylvania and North Carolina are holding hearings on the issue but the outcomes of these are uncertain.

Allies of candidates who expect to do well in these states are taking lead roles in moving primaries there to early February. By holding primaries soon after the Iowa caucuses, the first contest of the year, such states will have a bigger impact than before on who becomes the Republican and Democratic presidential nominees.

Clinton's allies in New York and New Jersey will be instrumental should those states move their primary dates to Feb. 5.

In recent weeks, buzz over a Feb. 5 primary date has picked up noticeably in New York. Those who could make it happen are Democratic state assembly speaker Sheldon Silver, who supports Clinton, and state senate majority leader Joseph Bruno, who says he is neutral at this point.

In New Jersey, legislators are moving ahead with a bill to create a Feb. 5 primary with the approval of Gov. Jon Corzine (D), who has signaled to state Clinton supporters that he will soon endorse her.

Clinton's advantage in New York, where she recently won re-election with 67 percent of the vote, is obvious. But she is also expected to have a significant advantage over her rivals in New Jersey, where much of the population is part of New York City's media market.

In Illinois, Obama's allies have been outspoken about helping their favorite by establishing an early primary date.

"Sen. Obama offers real hope for the American people and I am proud to give him my support," said Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich on the day of Obama's official presidential announcement, "I want to take this opportunity on this historic day to urge the legislature to immediately send me a bill to move our state's primary from March 18, 2008 to February 5, 2008. That will give Illinois voters an opportunity to send an early message in support of Sen. Obama and send him to victory."

Obama is expected to win the state because he represents it in Congress, even though Clinton was born in Chicago.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson has also been active. He has worked personally to move Nevada and Utah, Western states where he is expected to have an advantage, up in the process.

"There was certainly cooperation between Gov. Richardson and Sen. [Harry] Reid [D-Nev.] to move Nevada up, in the overall belief that Nevada is the makeweight of the 2008 presidential race," said Mike Stratton, who formerly served on the Democratic National Committee's (DNC) scheduling and nominating commission.

Stratton, who advocated for a Western regional primary while on the commission, said Richardson also worked with Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman (R) to advance the Utah primary to Feb. 5.

Richardson is expected to do well in both states because issues important to New Mexico, such as water rights and federal land management, are also important in Utah. Being Hispanic could also help him in Nevada because perhaps 20 percent of its population is Hispanic. Supporters of Romney, a Mormon, and McCain, a westerner, have also pushed for an early Utah primary, a state GOP official said.

Richardson has also pressed to move California's primary to Feb. 5. During a speech in Washington yesterday, Richardson joked that he would like to see the California primary "with all those Latino voters" take place earlier, adding that he had spoken with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R-Calif.) about it during this week's National Governors Association conference.

The candidates' influence over the state primary calendars has drawn criticism.

"On the one hand, the Republican Party supports any effort to make it more relevant [in the presidential nomination process]," said Jason Heffley, deputy executive director of the Illinois Republican Party, in reference to efforts by Blagojevich and

House Speaker Michael Madigan to move the primary up, "but it's very unfortunate that the Democratic leadership in the state is doing it to help the political ambitions of one person."

Republican White House hopefuls and their allies have also worked to move up primary dates in states where they have an advantage.

McCain won the Michigan presidential primary in 2000 and has a well-coordinated campaign there. His supporters pressed for an early February primary, which is in the process of being made official.

"McCain won here and it's thought he has good chances," said Michigan GOP party chairman Saul Anuzis, who has pledged to stay neutral.

"Last year the McCain folks were all in favor of" an early primary, said Anuzis. "They were the only ones organized. I think they were the ones last year who were most up front and center in pushing for an open primary system and having it early. His partisans were key players on the process committees and the ones pushing for the current proposal in front of the legislature."

A strategist with a rival Republican campaign said Romney's people were pushing for a Jan. 29, 2008 primary for Florida, where the former governor has invested much time and effort.

In Florida, one of the first and most influential advocates of an earlier primary was former state Republican chairman Al Cardenas, now a member of Romney's Florida statewide steering committee.

Cardenas noted that when he began pushing for an earlier primary, he was not yet committed to Romney.

Republican leaders in the state House are pushing for an earlier primary, and Cardenas said that while they are neutral right now, there is a good chance they will side with Romney. Three former Florida House speakers are on Romney's steering committee: Allan Bense, John Thrasher, and Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.).

Cardenas said Romney's advantage in Florida is revealed by the fact that "more than half of the Republican major donors and fundraisers" have committed to Romney. But one GOP strategist countered that an early Florida primary may not be in Romney's interest because Giuliani is far better known in the state.

Giuliani's allies have been active in trying to move up the GOP primaries in California and New Jersey, according to a source close to his campaign. The source said former California gubernatorial candidate Bill Simon has worked behind the scenes to build support for a Feb. 5 primary. Simon did not respond to a request for an interview.

The source said Giuliani's allies are also part of the effort to advance the New Jersey primary. A strategist with a rival campaign made the same assertion.

Giuliani is expected to do well in California because his relatively liberal record on social issues is likely to be more palatable to GOP voters there. And many voters in New Jersey in the New York media market followed his exploits while he was mayor of the Big Apple, including his heroics on Sept. 11, 2001.

Only Strong Will Survive This Big Bang (HILL)

Nineteen states or more, with half of America's population, are moving to hold their presidential nominating primaries on Feb. 5, 2008, a mere three weeks after the Iowa caucuses and two weeks after the New Hampshire primary. In effect, we will now have a national primary and the presidential nominating season will last only three weeks from start to finish.

The effect of this gigantic sea change will be that whoever is the frontrunner in each party by the fall of 2007 will be virtually certain to win the nomination because only the frontrunner can possibly hope to amass enough money to compete in half the country at once. Nobody but the likely winner in each party will be able to compete at that level on Feb. 5.

Money will now be king. Nothing else will count very much. If you can afford to run a national campaign three weeks after the first caucus, you will win. If you can't, you're doomed. And the polling that designates a frontrunner now will do much to determine the nominee.

Big states, including California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, and North Carolina, are moving their primaries up to Feb. 5. They are going to be joined by a dozen smaller states: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Delaware, Kansas, Missouri, Nevada (GOP only), New Mexico, Oklahoma, Tennessee, and Utah. With half of the country — these states have a combined population of 145 million — voting on Feb. 5, many other states are sure to join the move and vote on that early date. After all, which state legislature wants to consign its voters to political irrelevance by voting in April or May? Before we are done, we will have America's first national primary on Feb. 5.

The financial demands of competing in each of these states are so onerous that only the richest of candidates can hope to win. That kind of money only goes to frontrunners. As a result, the process will be sufficiently top-heavy that the candidates who enjoy clear leads in the polls after the summer of 2007 will have a virtual lock on the nomination before anybody has cast a vote on anything in any state!

The danger, of course, is that the frontrunner will have been anointed without ever actually holding a primary. The effect will be to strip the primary process of its power — for the first time since it became the central way of selecting candidates in the aftermath of the 1972 reforms — and give the power to designate candidates to national public-opinion polls conducted among random representative samples of the voters. It is the triumph of the pollsters and fundraisers.

So how will we choose who are the frontrunners before anyone has voted? How will candidates impact the polls in order to swell their coffers? The early primary date means that the virtual primaries that will designate the frontrunners will be held on cable television, the Internet, and talk radio. The Republican Virtual Primary will be held on Fox News, the Limbaugh, Hannity, and other conservative talk radio shows, and the right-wing websites. The Democratic Virtual Primary will be held on National Public Radio, PBS, a handful of liberal talk shows, the network news programs, and websites like MoveOn.org where liberals congregate.

But what happens if the candidate chosen by this instant virtual lottery has feet of clay that only become evident when he or she actually runs for office in a real election? The testing, seasoning, vetting, and whittling-down of the field, which used to take five or six months, cannot now take place at all. We will never know how the candidates of each party will perform in an actual election. Voters in each party will be buying a car without being able to take it for a drive.

In 2004, when the process was so truncated that Kerry was chosen as the nominee in March, the Democratic Party found itself saddled with a deeply flawed candidate whose shortcomings were not evident until after the Democratic Convention had nominated him. Throughout the fall of 2004, Kerry's inability as a candidate became so glaringly obvious that Democrats didn't give him a second look when he sought their nomination again this year.

The early primary dates would seem, at the moment, to confer an enormous advantage on the frontrunners in each party: Hillary Clinton and Rudy Giuliani. Their current leads in the polls and their consequent fundraising advantage make them stronger favorites than they might be if they had to run in a succession of primaries week after week.

So the new process, bequeathed to us by the advancing of the primary dates, will reward the rich, the pollsters, and the talk shows. And politics will never be the same again.

Competing In The Money Marathon (NYT)

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

If nothing else, the disheartening frenzy to raise huge campaign donations in this front-loaded presidential race is making money — lots and lots of money — a public issue. In the cross-fire, federal election regulators are expected to approve Senator Barack Obama's clever but cagey attempt to claim a reformer's mantle: he wants to let the nominees keep bagging unlimited private donations in the run-up to the primaries, then have the choice of returning a chunk of it after the conventions and accepting limited public financing for the general election.

Of course, Mr. Obama is proposing to adopt the even-money truce — should he win the nomination — only if the Republican nominee does the same.

Behind this shadowboxing is the fact that the post-Watergate public financing of presidential elections has not kept pace with inflation. This failure, which a conscientious Congress would repair in time for the 2012 election, has put private fund-raisers back at the wheel. All major candidates, including Mr. Obama, are rejecting the $65 million possible through the public money route for the primaries as a trifle.

Mr. Obama may be scoring political points in the reformers' image race with Senator Hillary Clinton, who lately yielded and agreed to disclose who her fund-raising megabrokers are. But voters should not get their hopes too high. The Obama and Clinton campaigns did not hesitate to upstage the Oscars with a hissy fit over who can best beg before Hollywood's deep-pocketed political sages. The candidates' mix of furious money-seeking and ritual umbrage at its excesses evokes St. Augustine's self-reform: "Make me chaste, oh Lord, but not yet."

Group Says Gore's Home Overuses Electricity (USAT/AP)

NASHVILLE (AP) — Al Gore, a leading voice in the fight against global warming, is being called a hypocrite by a conservative group that claims his Nashville mansion uses too much electricity.

A spokeswoman for Gore said the former vice president invests in enough renewable energy to make up for the home's power consumption.

Gore's documentary filmAn Inconvenient Truth, which chronicled his campaign against global warming, won an Academy Award on Sunday.

The next day, the Tennessee Center for Policy Research put out a news release saying Gore was not doing enough to reduce his own consumption of electricity. The group disputes whether global warming is a serious problem.

"We wanted to see if he was living by his own recommendations and walking the walk," said Drew Johnson, president of the think tank, which pushes for conservative economic issues.

Utility records show the Gore family paid an average monthly electric bill of about $1,200 last year for its 10,000-square-foot home.

The Gores used about 191,000 kilowatt hours in 2006, according to bills reviewed by The Associated Press spanning the period from Feb. 3, 2006, to Jan. 5. That is far more than the typical Nashville household, which uses about 15,600 kilowatt-hours per year.

His Nashville home is more than four times larger than the average new American home built last year — about 2,400 square feet, according to the National Association of Home Builders.

A spokeswoman for Gore said he purchases enough "green power" — renewable energy sources such as solar, wind and methane gas — to balance 100% of his electricity costs.

"Sometimes when people don't like the message, in this case that global warming is real, it's convenient to attack the messenger," Gore spokeswoman Kalee Kreider said.

Gore participates in a utility program that sells blocks of "green power" for an extra $4 a month. Gore purchases 108 such blocks every month, covering 16,200 kilowatt-hours and helping subsidize renewable energy sources.

Johnson said it's unclear whether global warming is caused by humans, and he said the threat outlined in Gore's documentary is exaggerated.

The think tank said that Gore used nearly 221,000 kilowatt hours last year and that his average monthly electric bill was $1,359. Johnson said his group got its figures from Nashville Electric Service.

But electric company spokeswoman Laurie Parker said the utility never got a request from the policy center and never provided them with any information.

Parker said Gore has been purchasing the "green power" for $432 a month since November. The Gore home is also under renovation to add solar panels, Kreider said.

Gore also owns homes in Carthage, Tenn., and in the Washington area.

Gore has said he leads a "carbon-neutral lifestyle." To balance out other carbon emissions, the Gores invest money in projects to reduce energy consumption around the globe, Kreider said.

"For every ton of carbon they emit, he offsets that by doing investments in renewable energy sources," Kreider said.

Johnson said those efforts were unconvincing.

"In general, I applaud his efforts to reduce energy consumption, but if he is going to be a spokesman for global warming, he has to be willing to make the same sacrifices," Johnson said.

Johnson said Gore's home has gas lamps lining the driveway, a heated pool and an electric gate, all of which would be easy to do without.

Kreider confirmed that Gore's home has a heated pool and an electric gate, but noted that the gate is important for security and that the driveway has only one gas lamp.

Focusing on Gore's personal electricity consumption misses the point of An Inconvenient Truth, Kreider said, which is that governments and the public can work together to reduce emissions.

Politicians' Flights Called Wasteful (LAT)

By Paul Pringle

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

Sen. Dianne Feinstein offers plenty of tips on how California households can combat global warming, such as carpooling and running only a full dishwasher.

But one bit of information Feinstein declines to share is the number of times that she flew last year on her husband's Gulfstream jet, which burns much more fuel per passenger-mile than commercial airliners.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger also has asked constituents to do their part to conserve energy — including cutting summertime power consumption — even though he takes to the skies on leased executive jets.

Aides say there is nothing contradictory between the pro-green pronouncements and the flying habits of the Democratic senator and Republican governor.

Some environmentalists aren't so sure.

DOJ_NMG_0138036

"There appears to be a discrepancy between calling on people to make personal reductions and using a private jet that exacerbates the problem," Clean Air Watch President Frank O'Donnell said.

Flying on a Gulfstream rather than an airliner is like driving a sport utility vehicle instead of riding a bus, O'Donnell and others say.

A single cross-country round trip on a Gulfstream IV, or GIV, the model owned by Feinstein's husband, churns out about 83,000 to 90,000 pounds of carbon dioxide, experts say. By contrast, on a per capita basis, the average American produces 50,000 pounds from all activities in an entire year.

Nonetheless, Feinstein and Schwarzenegger intend to continue their noncommercial flying ways because their jobs demand a flexibility the airlines can't match, spokesmen say.

Schwarzenegger's office said he and a jet-leasing company are establishing a "carbon offset" program for the governor and fellow customers, retroactive to Jan. 1. Carbon offsets are bought from organizations that plant trees and support renewable energy enterprises, among other measures, to offset greenhouse gases produced by the buyers.

"This is big news," Schwarzenegger spokesman Bill Maile said of the governor's undertaking with NetJets, the leasing firm.

Feinstein, however, got the jump on Schwarzenegger. She began buying carbon offsets last year to partially cover the travel on the GIV, and will purchase enough offsets this year to compensate for all the trips, spokesman Scott Gerber said.

He added that Feinstein took "numerous" commercial flights in 2006, but flew mostly on the GIV. He balked at disclosing the tally of her Gulfstream journeys.

"We're not going to get into specifics," he said.

Noncommercial aircraft and other carbon-related indulgences have caused politicians considerable turbulence recently.

A conservative group has condemned Al Gore for racking up an average monthly electricity bill of $1,200 at his Nashville mansion last year while championing the anti-global warming cause. A Gore spokeswoman said the former vice president invests in renewable energy to offset his electricity use.

As part of an ethics push, the House and Senate are toughening restrictions on lawmakers who fly private jets, though exceptions for members and spouses who own planes are under consideration.

Earlier this month, Republicans accused House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of requesting a large military jet to fly her and family members between the capital and her San Francisco district.

Security protocols grant Pelosi occasional military flights because she is second in line to the presidency. Her office said she had only inquired about an aircraft with enough fuel capacity to make the trip nonstop, and would fly commercial if necessary.

Pelosi flew on private jets seven times in 2006, her spokesman said. "She made every effort to travel commercially whenever possible," Drew Hammill said.

Sen. Barbara Boxer says she took four trips on private aircraft last year, one with multiple stops over 2 1/2 days.

"If you can take a commercial plane to get where you need to go at the time you need to be there, you should do it," she said in an e-mail. "If not, you have to look at alternatives such as trains, fuel-efficient vehicles, buses, and in some cases, private planes."

For that last option, Feinstein reimburses her husband, Richard Blum, for use of the jet, Gerber said. Blum bought the GIV for about $23 million in 1999. The reimbursements are based on a first-class commercial fare, with more than 90% of the money coming from Feinstein's personal funds and the rest from campaign coffers, the spokesman said. Last year, the reimbursements to Blum totaled about $73,000, he said.

But a GIV's operating expenses are much higher than a first-class booking. A round-trip Los Angeles-Washington flight on the Gulfstream burns about 4,500 to 5,000 gallons of fuel at a cost of roughly $20,000, depending on local pump prices, said Jeff Beck, a veteran corporate pilot. And that doesn't include pilot fees, maintenance and parking bills.

"It's the least environmental thing that politicians can do," Beck said. He said Gulfstreams devour so much fossil fuel per passenger that "it's like they're throwing dinosaur bones out of the tailpipe."

A coast-to-coast, first-class ticket on a major airline goes for about $1,200 to $2,500, round trip, according to a sampling of three airlines' prices Tuesday.

A Boeing 767-200 airliner burns about 1,550 gallons an hour — three times as much as a GIV. But the larger plane typically can seat about 180 passengers, as opposed to a GIV's 12 to 14.

Eric Carlson, executive director of Carbonfund.org, a nonprofit that sells offsets, said it would charge $229 to cover the emissions from the GIV round trip.

Schwarzenegger flies a variety of leased jets, which cost his campaign $733,000 during the three months ending last September. Maile said the governor digs into his own pockets for some flights.

He also said Schwarzenegger has converted one of his Hummers to biodiesel fuel, and plans to install solar panels on his house. His other three Hummers remain gas hogs.

For her part, Feinstein drives a hybrid Lexus sport utility vehicle when she is home in San Francisco, Gerber said. But she drives a Lincoln Town Car in Washington.

Not that the eco-crowd is eager to criticize Feinstein and Schwarzenegger, who are generally viewed as key supporters of the growing movement to curb emissions.

Representatives of some environmental groups either would not comment on the two politicians' penchant for private jets, or suggested that allowances could be made in their circumstances.

"Given the exigencies of the campaign trail, if not the demands of governing of a large state, it may not be realistic to expect elective officials to fly commercial all the time," said Jon Coifman, spokesman for the Natural Resources Defense Council.

But O'Donnell, of Clean Air Watch, invoked a loftier ideal:

"It is fair to hope that our political leaders will lead by example."

Ozone Man Sequel (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

HOLLYWOOD

Al Gore now has a movie with an Oscar and a grandson named Oscar.

Who could ask for anything more?

Al Gore could.

The best ex-president who was never president could make one of the most interesting campaigns in American history even more interesting. Will he use his green moment on the red carpet in black tie to snag blue states and win the White House?

Only the Goracle knows the answer.

The man who was prescient on climate change, the Internet, terrorism and Iraq admitted that maybe his problem had been that he was too far ahead of the curve. He realized at a conference that “there’re ideas that are mature, ideas that are maturing, ideas that are past their prime ... and a category called ‘predawn.’

“And all of a sudden it hit me,” he told John Heilemann of New York magazine last year. “Most of my political career was spent investing in predawn ideas! I thought, Oh, that’s where I went wrong.”

As Mr. Gore basked Sunday night in the adoration of Leo, Laurie David and the rest of the Hollywood hybrid-drivers, Democrats wondered: Is this chubby guy filling out the Ralph Lauren three-piece tuxedo a mature idea or an idea that’s past its prime?

With Hillary overproduced and Barack Obama an unfinished script, maybe it’s time to bring the former vice president out of turnaround.

Hillary’s henchmen try to prognosticate the Goracle’s future by looking at his waistline, according to Newsday; they think if he’s going to run, he’ll get back to fighting weight.

With her own talent for checking the weathervane, Hillary co-opted Mr. Gore’s eco-speak right after the Oscars, talking environment throughout upstate New York. Given his past competition with Hillary, Mr. Gore must have delighted in seeing his star rise in Hollywood as hers dimmed.

If he waits long enough to get into the race, all the usual-suspect-consultants will be booked — which would be a boon for Mr. Gore, since his Hessian strategists in 2000 made him soft-pedal the environment, the very issue that makes him seem most passionate and authentic. The same slides about feedback loops and the interconnectedness of weather patterns that made his image-makers yawn just won his movie an Academy Award.

But what’s going on in his head? Like Jeb Bush, Al Gore was the good son groomed by a famous pol to be president, only to have it snatched away by a black sheep who didn’t even know the name of the general running Pakistan (the same one he just sent Vice to try to push into line.) It must be excruciating not only to lose a presidency you’ve won because the Supreme Court turned partisan and stopped the vote, but to then watch the madness of King George and Tricky Dick II as they misled their way into serial catastrophes.

Even though Chickenhawk Cheney finally got close to combat in Afghanistan, his explosive brush with a suicide bomber has not served as a wake-up call about the danger of Osama bin Laden’s staying on the lam, and Afghanistan’s slipping back into the claws of the Taliban and Al Qaeda while we are shackled to Iraq.

A reporter asked Tony Snow yesterday what the attack on the Bagram Air Base that targeted the vice president and killed at least 23 people said about the Taliban’s strength. “I’m not sure it says anything,” he replied.

Mr. Gore must be pleased that he's been vindicated on so many fronts, yet it still must rankle the Nobel Peace Prize nominee to hear the White House spouting such dangerous nonsense. He must sometimes imagine how much safer the world would be if he were president.

The Bush-Cheney years have been all about dragging the country into the past, getting back the presidential powers yanked away after Watergate, settling scores from Poppy Bush's old war, and suppressing scientific and environmental advances. Instead of aiming for the stars, the greatest power on earth is bogged down in poorly navigated conflicts with ancient tribes and brutes in caves.

Surely the Goracle, an aficionado of futurism, must stew about all the time and money and good will that has been wasted with a Vietnam replay and a scolding social policy designed to expunge the Age of Aquarius.

When he's finished Web surfing, tweaking his PowerPoint and BlackBerrying, what goes through his head? Does he blame himself? Does he blame the voting machines? Ralph Nader? Robert Shrum? Naomi Wolf? How about Bush Inc. and Clinton Inc.?

With the red carpet rolled up, the tux at the cleaner's, and the gold statuette on the director's mantle, not his, the Goracle is at his Nashville mansion, contemplating how to broker his next deal. Will he cast himself as the savior of the post-Bush era, or will the first Gore in the Oval Office be Karenna, mother of Oscar?

Spoons kill people

Thanks to the Gun Owners of America for sending us their nifty new T-Shirt, bearing the message:

"If guns kill people, then ...

— Pencils miss spel words

— Cars make people drive drunk

— Spoons make Rosie O'Donnell fat

Too much popcorn

Who isn't talking about the exhibit of obesity that Al Gore unveiled at his Oscar-winning appearance this week?

Now, Inside the Beltway may have discovered why Mr. Gore is so suddenly rotund: "An Inconvenient Truth."

Iain Murray, senior fellow for global climate change and environmental science at the Competitive Enterprise Institute, forwards speculation that Mr. Gore's Oscar-winning movie could be hazardous to the former vice president's health, and everybody else's for that matter.

The Scotsman, Scotland's national newspaper, is claiming that half of the children between the ages of 7 and 11 in that country are now so anxious about global warming that they're losing sleep over it.

"A quarter of them blame politicians for the problem, and 1 in 7 believes their parents aren't doing enough to save the earth," Mr. Murray notes. Furthermore, Science Daily is reporting that children who don't get enough sleep are more prone to obesity.

"And this article points out that kids who sleep better learn better," he adds. "One has to wonder just how much damage to civilization that Gore and company will do to impose their climate-control regime on the world."

Eye on Freedom

What's with the telescope in the 10th floor office of Christopher Cox, the former congressman-turned-chairman of the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, overlooking the U.S. Capitol dome?

"Sometimes I jokingly refer to this as my legislative affairs operation — using the telescope I can just read the memos on their desks," the chairman noted in recent remarks. "But I don't have the telescope focused on the offices, but rather on the Statue of Freedom on top of the dome."

Mr. Cox observed that the statue was placed on its prestigious perch in 1863, during the height of the Civil War.

"She stands on a globe encircled with our national motto, E Pluribus Unum: Out of Many, One," he said. "And she was cast in bronze by a former slave, Philip Reid, who along with other D.C. residents gained his freedom ahead of the Emancipation Proclamation by act of Congress."

Man on the moon

NASA says it plans for astronauts to be "camping" on the moon as early as 2020.

A future lunar outpost, says a new NASA posting, would be used to make preparations for a journey to Mars. Initial missions to the pressurized camp — inflatable habitats, with connecting tunnels to crew quarters and the lunar surface — would last several days for the initial construction period, then be extended to two weeks, then two months and ultimately to 180 days.

Puffs of pink

Yes, Virginia, there will be cherry blossoms this spring.

Barely a month ago everybody from Washington to Tokyo was worried because cherry blossoms were blooming in the unseasonably warm weather. Not to worry, says the National Cherry Blossom Festival, which quotes Rob DeFeo, chief horticulturist of the National Park Service, as saying that the variety of trees that were in bloom in January are sometimes referred to as the "winter-blossoming cherry."

They will often bloom during a warm spell, even if spring is still months away. Mr. DeFeo says the famous cherry trees around the Tidal Basin are of a different variety — the Yoshino — and they will blossom as usual come spring.

The National Cherry Blossom Festival's 95th Anniversary Dinner & Silent Auction will be held this evening.

Up In The Air (RC)

By Tory Newmyer And Kate Ackley

Roll Call, February 28, 2007

Experiencing some professional turbulence? At least you're not Robert Land.

As JetBlue's only man inside the Beltway, Land has had the unenviable task of single-handedly explaining the discount flier's recent meltdowns to lawmakers while trying to beat back their attempts to impose new regulations on the industry.

The trouble started Feb. 14, when an ice storm in the Northeast scrambled travel schedules. At New York's JFK International Airport, JetBlue's hub, nine of the carrier's planes got pinned down on the tarmac, forcing some passengers to sit on the runway for more than 10 hours. The trouble spilled into the following week, with JetBlue forced to cancel more than 1,000 flights to get back on schedule.

Land went to work Feb. 15, the morning after the crisis erupted, paying visits to the Transportation committees and also calling on officials at the Department of Transportation. He walked staffers through a chronology of what had happened the day before — explaining how JetBlue, relying on what proved to be erroneous weather reports that showed the storm clearing, kept planes queued in the hopes of getting them off the ground. And, like other executives at the airline, he piled on the apologies.

"Looking back, we were a little too aggressive trying to get our customers where they wanted to go," said Land, who served as assistant Transportation secretary under former President Bill Clinton before joining JetBlue at its outset eight years ago.

JetBlue has pledged to spend $30 million in vouchers, refunds and other costs to recover from the events and has issued its own passenger bill of rights to guarantee there will not be a repeat performance.

But the controversy already has prompted lawmakers to action, with Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) introducing a measure setting mandatory guidelines for airlines and Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.) to follow suit this week. Industry sources said some version is likely to be included in the Federal Aviation Administration reauthorization set to move this year.

Land, like others hoping to head off the legislation, stressed the airline already has taken corrective steps and is best equipped to handle future problems on its own.

"We think we know how best to make up for our mistakes," he said. "That's the message we've been sending to the Hill: No one has more to lose than we do, because regardless of what Congress does or doesn't do, people have a choice to make when they fly."

Several airline lobbyists said K Streeters, smelling blood, have been hurling themselves at JetBlue since its problems erupted. Land, officially the company's senior vice president for government affairs, said that while JetBlue "has been looking for key people to join our team in different positions on an ongoing basis," it has not made any moves yet to add lobbying muscle, either internally or externally.

Lift Off? Speaking of canceled flights, lobbyists and other supporters of Rep. Nick Lampson (D-Texas) who had hoped to join the freshman for a viewing of a space shuttle launch in Florida will have to rearrange their schedules.

A hail storm earlier this week damaged an external tank on the shuttle Atlantis and NASA officials are expected to delay the planned March 15 launch as a result.

For $2,300 for an individual, or $5,000 from a political action committee, trip participants were set to fly to the Sunshine State in two weeks for a three-day jaunt that included the launch. For the occasion, Lampson's team had rented the Indian River Queen, a paddle-wheel boat that was set to cruise up the Banana River to within about five miles of the launch site.

(Aside from the novel view, the boat placed the event within the law. The official viewing area for Kennedy Space Center launches is on federal land, making it off-limits for political fundraisers).

In case of any last-minute problems with the launch, the crew had the boat reserved for two more morning cruises.

For those less enthusiastic about space flight, or paddle boats, trip organizers bought a package of tickets for a spring training game between the Houston Astros and the New York Yankees.

"It's a relatively portable event," said a source close to the event who spoke on condition of anonymity. "Everybody knows not to plan too far ahead for it."

The source said final decisions on the trip will be made once NASA announces its plan for the launch.

Coming Out. Add one more name to the long list of politicians that want some K Street cash. Former Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson, who is mulling whether he wants to give up his plush office at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld for the Oval Office, is having his first Washington, D.C., fundraiser next week. The money goes to his coffers at the Thompson Presidential Exploratory Committee — 2008.

The event is sponsored by Barbour Griffith & Rogers lobbyist Robert Wood, who was Thompson's chief of staff at HHS, and others around town, said Darrin Schmitz of the committee, known as "Tommy 2008."

"This is really a way for friends, colleagues and former staff to show their support," Schmitz said, adding that the former Wisconsin governor expects to raise about $50,000 from 75 attendees.

Thompson, a Republican, will hold court at The Caucus Room on March 8. "Gold level" contributions cost $500, while joining the "green level" will set you back $1,000, according to an invitation.

K Street Moves. The Livingston Group, the firm founded by former Rep. Robert Livingston (R-La.), has followed the trend of hiring Democrats. Stacie Walters, a former legislative aide to Rep. Vic Snyder (D-Ark.), has joined the firm as a principal. "At a time when there are new Democrat members of Congress, who are dealing with multiple issues, her expertise on several matters, along with her relationships on the Hill, will be a tremendous asset to our clients," Livingston said in a statement.

· Another Democrat has landed at Artemis Strategies: Ryan Modlin, a one-time staffer for House Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.), has signed on as vice president. Modlin also has worked in the government affairs division for Chrysler and with the American Automotive Manufacturers Association.

Some Push For Huckabee To Run For Senate, Not President (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, February 28, 2007

Though his long-shot presidential campaign is still in its early stages, some wish former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee would drop his national aspirations and return home to wage what they see as a vital campaign against Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) in 2008 instead.

Arkansas is often listed among the top Republican pickup opportunities in the country, but Huckabee is the only Republican who matches up to Pryor and there are no comparable alternatives, observers say.

Although those close to Huckabee chalk up the Senate talk to overanxious bloggers and speculation, some see Huckabee-for-Senate as a real possibility and most Republicans make it clear they would welcome him home.

One state GOP source familiar with Huckabee's campaign said a Senate bid could indeed materialize and that it's something Huckabee has considered and analyzed. Huckabee ran for Senate in 1992.

Huckabee couldn't wait too long to abandon the presidential bid, the source said, and the Aug. 11 Republican straw poll in Ames, Iowa, could be a fork in the road.

"If he's knocked out by the straw poll, then, yes, that's a credible scenario," the source said. "If he's still around, I think, timeline-wise, it would add to the baggage that he already has in the state to drop a presidential [campaign] and come back and run for Senate."

Huckabee's presidential campaign said a Senate bid is not in the works and that it's not something he's looking at right now.

"At the moment, he has absolutely no plans to run for Senate," spokeswoman Kirsten Fedewa said. "He's on one track, and that's to explore the presidential bid. He has no Plan B."

Even if Huckabee were to enter the Senate race, Republicans see the 10-year governor as an underdog. Despite his long tenure in state government's top office, he was reelected with just 53 percent of the vote in 2002, which was less than Pryor's 54 percent in a good year for Republicans nationally.

Yet unlike other underdogs, Huckabee would have a reasonable chance at victory. He's seen as a better national than state figure, but he hasn't raised the kind of money required of a presidential candidate. At the same time, some see him competing with Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) for the "true social conservative" niche.

Operatives around the state struggle to think of other potential candidates. Nobody has expressed interest publicly yet, and there aren't any Republican statewide office holders.

Sen. Blanche Lincoln's (D-Ark.) 2004 opponent, former state legislator Jim Holt, took 44 percent against her in a presidential year despite spending less than $150,000 on the race. He called a repeat bid a "slim possibility" and said he would need to be promised $8 million to $10 million to finance it.

Banking executive J. French Hill, an appointee of the first President Bush, and 2006 lieutenant governor candidate Chuck Banks have been in talks with the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC), as has fourth-term Rep. John Boozman, the only Republican in the Arkansas delegation.

Boozman's chief of staff, Matt Sagely, however, said Friday that Boozman has "zero interest" in the job and completely ruled it out: "He considers himself lucky to be in the 3rd congressional district … That's about as far as it goes as far as running for another office in Arkansas."

The NRSC wouldn't comment on any communications with Huckabee but made it clear the committee would embrace his candidacy.

"Certainly, we would welcome a run by Gov. Huckabee if that was something he decided to do," spokeswoman Rebecca Fisher said. "But it's not our only option in that state."

Huckabee is, however, by far the best option. Aside from Boozman, none of the other potential candidates currently holds office, few have run campaigns, and there aren't many potential self-funders in the mold of a Pete Ricketts, the wealthy former Ameritrade executive who financed his unsuccessful bid against Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) in 2006.

Banks failed to force a primary runoff in the lieutenant governor's race. Holt won the nomination but performed slightly worse than he did in his 2004 Senate bid.

Pryor, meanwhile, is the son of a well-known former senator and has maintained an approval rating above 50 percent throughout his four years in office. He's been a relatively quiet figure, but he also hasn't provided Republicans with much ammunition to use against him.

"My gut is: Huckabee will either do it or not do it, and they're probably not going to win this race with anybody else," a politics professor at Hendrix College, Jay Barth, said.

The lack of candidates is mostly a symptom of the Arkansas Republican Party's state of disarray. An anomaly among Southern states, Arkansas remains solidly Democratic. At the same time, it chose President Bush by nine points in 2004.

With Huckabee replaced by Democratic Gov. Mike Beebe, the Democrats now hold all seven constitutional offices and three-quarters of the state legislature.

After the election, Arkansas GOP Executive Director Clint Reed posted a message on the party's website about its wounded state and its need to bounce back. This month, he left to become a regional director for the Republican National Committee, setting the party back another step.

"Look at what [Republicans] have — they got their clocks cleaned," Holt said. "There's not a lot of Republicans, even if they were very well established like a Huckabee, that would have the interest in taking on a Pryor in this state."

Republicans in Arkansas are a small yet factionalized group, split between the religious base, which controls the nominating process, and the moderates. The divisions have been both personal and ideological.

Part of the Republicans' challenge is finding someone who will rally both of those sects, an Arkansas GOP consultant, Bill Vickery, said. Other than Huckabee, few fit that mold.

"I think the Republican Party in Arkansas is searching for that one candidate who can unite their social conservatives and yet appeal to broad, moderate business conservatives in the state," Vickery said. "That's what the search is now."

NRSC Donates Funds From Terror Suspect (CCT)

The Contra Costa Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - A Republican Party campaign committee that received $20,000 in 2003 from a man now accused of helping terrorists has donated the money to a foundation that comforts families of wounded soldiers.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee, the campaign arm for Republican senators, renounced the contribution after news reports identified Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari as an NRSC "Inner Circle Member for Life."

Federal prosecutors charged Alishtari two weeks ago in New York with terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering. Alishtari pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

"In light of the recent charges filed against a former donor, the National Republican Senatorial Committee will donate the sum total of the former donor's contributions to a charitable organization," NRSC spokeswoman Rebecca Fisher said.

The committee gave $20,000 last week to the Fisher House Foundation, which provides housing for families on the grounds of military and Veterans' Administration hospitals.

Alishtari also donated more than $15,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee, the campaign arm for Republican House members.

Jessica Boulanger, a spokeswoman for the NRCC, said the committee is awaiting the outcome of Alishtari's case. If found guilty, she said, the money would be donated to charity.

Corporate Execs' Names Should Be Disclosed, Lawmakers Tell Governors (USAT)

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Three influential members of Congress' Democratic majority urged the National Governors Association Tuesday to support proposed legislation aimed at anonymously-controlled companies involved in crime.

"The central problem is that the 50 states are currently forming nearly 2 million companies in the United States each year with little to no information about who is behind those companies," wrote Sen. Carl Levin, of Michigan, and Sen. Barack Obama and Rep. Rahm Emanuel, both of Illinois.

STORY: Corporate owners hide assets, identities

While acknowledging that most of those companies operate legally, the lawmakers warned that some instead function "as conduits for organized crime, money laundering, terrorist financing securities fraud, tax evasion and other misconduct."

They asked the governors to back proposed federal legislation that would require those who register new companies in the 50 states to first gather information about their clients' identities. The proposal would also include company formation agents in federal anti-money laundering regulations.

The nation's governors, who ended their winter meeting in Washington Tuesday, are examining the issue, said Jay Hyde, communications director for organization.

The request for support followed a USA TODAY computer-aided review that showed a mini-industry has capitalized on weaknesses in incorporation laws and virtually non-existent oversight to promote some U.S. states as secrecy rivals of offshore havens. The USA TODAY story was published Friday.

The newspaper's review among other things showed that a promoter with a suspended law license has teamed with a convicted felon in a business that promoted forming Nevada corporations to shield assets "from 'capricious federal judges and any government agency.' "

Court records in a Federal Trade Commission lawsuit showed that two Nevada corporations formed through the business had been involved in what appeared to be money laundering for a suspected identity theft ring in Virginia.

Perry's 'Bizarre' Moves Vex Conservatives (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

DALLAS -- Texas Gov. Rick Perry, elected with strong conservative support in November, has taunted that political base recently and could face serious opposition in the state Legislature amid a developing power struggle.

Mr. Perry, a Republican, has begun to assert himself on several hot-button issues after a relatively quiet six years in office in a state where the constitution gives its governor little formal power. His executive order earlier this month ordering all Texas girls entering the sixth grade to be immunized against a venereal disease that causes cervical cancer provided the most heat and criticism from conservatives.

But another Perry edict, to speed up state review of proposed coal-fired power plants, was checked by a state judge last week. And another Perry suggestion, that the state should sell its lottery to help fund cancer research and care, hasn't caught on.

Richard Murray, director of the University of Houston Center for Public Policy, said Mr. Perry's latest moves constituted "bizarre behavior" in view of his courting of conservatives last year when, for a time, it appeared Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, a Republican, might return to Texas and run for governor.

"He solidified himself with the social conservatives then, and now he's just totally ignoring them on this issue, which they are to very sensitive to," said Mr. Murray. "It suggests he's not planning to run in any Republican primaries in the future."

But a spokesman for Mr. Perry denied that his boss has usurped too much power, and Mr. Perry has argued that the Texas Constitution gives him the power to lead "as the chief executive officer of the state."

"To ask the governor to stop directing agencies would be tantamount to asking him to stop leading," said his press secretary, Robert Black.

Mr. Black also said accusations against his boss as invalid. He said Mr. Perry showed strong leadership in 2001 with his Trans Texas Corridor plan, a massive proposal to build 4,000 miles of superhighways and railroads across rural Texas from the Mexican border to the Red River. He said his boss stood tall in 2003 when he strongly resisted efforts to raise taxes in the state and later led "the most sweeping tort reform legislation" in the United States.

"If you're going to throw big ideas out on table," said Mr. Black, "somebody's going to get mad at you."

But it was the HPV edict that bounced the hardest and loudest. Mr. Perry did not inform most of the legislative leadership of his plan before he announced it.

Almost immediately, some of the state's leading conservatives berated the idea, claiming that the human papillomavirus (HPV) vaccine, marketed under the name Gardasil, might also increase preteen promiscuity. Some opposed the edict for its mandatory nature, and others criticized it as neither needed nor helpful.

They combined to fllod the airwaves and the Internet in opposition. Last week in Austin, a legislative committee passed a resolution to rescind Mr. Perry's order, with a full-scale bill predictably not far behind.

Also last week, a group of Texans filed a lawsuit in district court in Austin, challenging Mr. Perry's authority to issue the order and seeking to block any state money from being spent on the vaccine until that question is resolved, said Kenneth Chaiken, the attorney representing the families.

"The school-age girls of Texas are not guinea pigs who may be subjected to medial procedures at the apparent whim of Texas' governor," according to the lawsuit, which was filed Thursday.

The best bet, said Cal Jillson, a Southern Methodist University political science professor, is that a bill to rescind the Perry executive order will pass. Then he sees a strong possibility that Mr. Perry will veto that, and a miffed Legislature then will override his veto and kill the program.

Mr. Black, the governor's spokesman, said yesterday Mr. Perry will "stand firm" on his belief the HPV plan is "morally right," and he added, "Legislators will have to determine what they stand for."

Others should not have been surprised at the HPV overture, he added, because Mr. Perry mentioned his support for it in his re-election campaign last summer.

"Evidently, someone wasn't listening," said Mr. Black.

Advocates Hopeful On Gun Ban (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, February 28, 2007

With the support of a new Democratic governor, advocates for a state assault weapons ban said Tuesday that they have the legislative backing and momentum to pass a bill this session.

"We are hopeful that the new political landscape will make a difference this year," said Sen. Michael G. Lenett, the Montgomery County Democrat sponsoring the proposal.

Gov. Martin O'Malley and state Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler are behind a proposal that would forbid the transport, sale, posses sion or purchase of military-style assault weapons. The 11-member Senate Judicial Proceedings Committee, which heard hours of testimony Tuesday on the proposal, appears split on the matter. If the bill were defeated in committee, it would take 16 senators to petition the initiative to the floor; the bill has 21 co-sponsors.

A proposed state ban died last year in the General Assembly. Then-Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican who had voted in 1996 while a member of Congress to repeal the federal assault weapons ban, didn't push for tougher state legislation.

The proposed assault weapons ban is the latest issue that had fizzled under Ehrlich to be resurrected with O'Malley at the helm. Tougher emissions standards for automobiles is another. Stem cell research will benefit from an additional $10 million commitment from O'Malley, a promise he made since being sworn in last month. And the governor lobbied last week for repeal of the death penalty.

O'Malley submitted a letter of support to the Senate committee Tuesday, urging passage of the assault weapons ban, which designates 45 firearms as assault weapons.

"More than 600 people die in Maryland each year from gun violence -- on average, more than 50 victims every month," the governor said in a statement. "Assault weapons are so frequently used in crime that one assault rifle is traced back to a Maryland crime every 48 hours. This legislation will help prevent these guns from reaching Maryland streets and will therefore assist law enforcement efforts to keep our communities safe."

Gansler, a Democrat and former Montgomery County prosecutor, provided the committee with his endorsement as well. "Weapons optimized for killing large numbers of people as quickly and efficiently as possible have no place on the streets of our communities," he wrote in a letter.

In addition to the ban, the bill would impose a registration re quirement and give gun owners a 60-day period, effective Oct. 1, to file the required information with the secretary of the state police.

Opponents, who packed the committee room and adjoining lounge wearing buttons with a slash through the bill number, testified Tuesday that their Second Amendment rights would be violated should the bill be passed.

DOJ_NMG_0138044

"We as abiding citizens will not be controlled by criminals," said John Hutchinson, a Montgomery County hunter and competitive marksman.

Clyde Lutter, a Gaithersburg engineer, said the proposed ban would "make us all less safe."

"The Second Amendment is not about hunting. It's not about sport. It's about self-defense," he said. Supporters of the ban testified that it would keep dangerous weapons off the streets and out of criminals' hands, that civilians have no need for weapons that are used in warfare in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Dale Miller, a 20-year-old from Calvert County, tearfully told the committee about her father, a former FBI agent who was murdered in Washington police headquarters in 1997. The shooter was carrying a compact assault weapon, according to news reports.

"No little girl should have to grow up without her father, should have to walk down the aisle alone on her wedding day," she said.

Proponents also lauded Maryland for the 1994 passage of a ban on assault pistols but urged that the law be expanded to prevent tragedies such as the 2002 Washington-area sniper shootings.

Paul Helmke, president and CEO of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, said most big-city mayors and police chiefs around the country are supportive.

"Maryland's doing a lot better than most states, but it could be doing better," said Helmke.

Representatives of the Maryland State Police testified in favor of the Maryland ban, saying it would help keep officers safe. A spokesman for the Fraternal Order of Police lobbied against it, however, arguing that it would be difficult to enforce.

Changing The Constitution (WP)

MARYLAND VOTERS will probably get to decide whether the state constitution should be amended to allow early voting. Let's hope they show more discernment and judgment than the Democratic-controlled legislature that is muscling an ill-defined measure onto the ballot.

Both houses of the General Assembly have approved a constitutional amendment to permit early voting, making it almost certain there will be a referendum in 2008. The action follows a rancorous two-year fight in which Democrats rammed through measures that gave them a clear advantage over Republicans. For instance, the only places where people would have been able to vote ahead of time just happened to be in heavily Democratic precincts. Republicans were right to think the effort was more about helping Democrats than helping voters. The Democratic effort was thwarted when the Court of Appeals rejected the law, saying the constitution does not authorize voting on any day other than Election Day.

So the Democrats are back with a bid to amend the constitution, arguing that early voting is a civic good because, by making it easier to vote, it boosts turnout. Too bad that's not really true. The experience of other states has shown that early voting does not increase turnout in any significant way. It's important that any decision about whether to allow early voting be framed by the facts -- not politics. There are arguments pro and con. Voters like having the choice and convenience of early voting, and ballot counting is more accurate under the system. On the other hand, there are increased costs associated with maintaining extended polling places and more opportunities for fraud. Plus, Maryland already allows no-excuse absentee voting, so early voting may be duplicative.

Still, we would be inclined to favor anything that makes it easier for people to vote. The Democrats are right that a constitutional amendment should not be encumbered by operational details such as where polling places would be located; changing the constitution is the first step. But the lack of a mechanism to ensure fair implementation of early voting is worrisome -- particularly given the Democrats' record of playing politics with the issue.

The House and Senate still must work out the differences between their respective bills. It's only fair that they also set up a system whereby voter approval of the amendment would trigger establishment of a bipartisan commission charged with working out the details of early voting. If they refuse to do that, voters should realize they are being asked to hand out a blank check.

States' Pension Shortfalls Widen Amid An Increase In Tax Receipts (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

State governments' unfunded pension liabilities continue to increase despite a recent rise in tax receipts, in a continuation of a spiral that began in the late 1990s, according to a Standard & Poor's analysis to be released today.

The report says states collectively had about $330 billion in unfunded pension obligations in fiscal 2005, the last period for which complete data are available. That is $46 billion more than in fiscal 2004. For the purposes of the report, a state's fiscal year is assumed to end in June.

Pension shortfalls have been building and could increase borrowing costs for some states, but the ratings firm said it expects the ratio to improve slightly in the next few years as states begin recording improved investment gains in fiscal 2006 and perhaps 2007. Better investment gains mean states can make smaller cash contributions to pension funds, which frees up money for other government obligations.

Parry Young, one of the report's authors, said in an interview that while the mean funded ratio for fiscal 2005 continued to widen, he expects a stable "investment atmosphere" will halt the trend. In fiscal 2000, he said, state pensions on average were funded at slightly more than 100% of obligations; a subsequent market slowdown has left the ratio at roughly 82% of projected liabilities. For fiscal 2004, S&P pegged that ratio at 83.5%.

The gap is the unfunded amount of projected liabilities, based on the current work force and benefit levels.

Among the states with the biggest unfunded obligations were Connecticut, Illinois and Oklahoma, the report said, all of which had gaps in the lower 40% range. West Virginia had the biggest gap, with an unfunded liability of more than 50%.

By contrast, the state in the best shape was Florida, with obligations funded at 107.3%, followed by North Carolina, with a 106.5% ratio. Oregon, Delaware and Georgia notched positive funding ratios as well.

Besides pension costs, states have been grappling with spiraling expenses in other areas, such as health care for the poor. States also are carrying an enormous and increasing amount of debt: The S&P report said pension liability and tax-supported borrowing in states reached 6.8% of money available to pay back such obligations. In fiscal 2004, the ratio stood at 6.3%.

While state revenue has been strong in recent years, this hasn't generally translated into healthier pension funds. The stock market was responsible for most of the gains states made in pension funding in the 1990s, but when the bubble burst in the early part of this decade it caused much of the unfunded gap.

Outsize investment returns have the greatest effect on pension reserves. Mr. Young said investment income accounts for about 60% to 70% of a typical state pension fund. Much of the remaining balance is made up by contributions from local and state governments. The report said such government contributions rose by about 50% over a two-year period beginning in fiscal 2002. Contributions declined about 7% in fiscal 2005.

The Cost Of Coverage (WSJ)

By Amy Finkelstein

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Thanks to widespread concern about the millions of Americans without health insurance, several states have recently mandated universal coverage for their residents. Massachusetts enacted legislation last spring; other proposals are brewing in California, Pennsylvania and elsewhere. Such reforms are likely to affect health-care spending, which has been growing faster than the overall economy for decades. It makes up approximately 16% of GDP, and is a prime area of policy concern, right up there with the number of uninsured.

For evidence of how such programs can lead to increased spending, just look at the effects of the introduction of Medicare in 1966. Medicare provides health-insurance coverage to virtually all Americans aged 65 and over. Prior to its enactment, only about one-quarter of these individuals had any meaningful health insurance. As a result of Medicare's introduction, about three-quarters of the elderly, or about 7.5% of the total U.S. population, gained health-insurance coverage. (For perspective, this is a similar increase in the share of the population with insurance coverage as what will happen in Massachusetts under its new universal coverage program.)

Research I conducted shows that Medicare had a substantial effect on the health-care sector. By 1970, the program caused a 37% increase in hospital spending. This is an enormous number. If I extrapolate from the Medicare experience to compute the effect of the overall spread of insurance -- both public and private -- between 1950 and 1990, it suggests that it is responsible for about half of the sixfold growth in real per capita health-care spending during this period.

Why does increased health insurance lead to increased health spending? One factor is that when individuals have insurance, they tend to consume more health care. This makes sense: If you only have to pay some fraction of the cost, you are more likely to go for an extra doctor's visit or get an additional diagnostic test than when you have to pay the full cost out of pocket.

Another reason is that hospitals and doctors respond to the increased demand for health care by changing some of the ways in which they practice medicine. For example, hospitals were more likely to adopt new medical technologies after Medicare was introduced because now, with greater insurance coverage, there were more people who could afford these new technologies. This in turn may have encouraged the development of a new generation of health-care innovations. All of this contributes to higher health-care spending.

Of course, the effect of health insurance on health spending tells us only of the costs of expanding health insurance coverage. We can also ask, what are the benefits? And once again, we can learn something from the Medicare experience.

Robin McKnight of the University of Oregon and I have examined the data, and as best we can tell, Medicare did not have any effect at reducing elderly mortality in its first 10 years of existence. Of course, mortality is only one measure of health, and it is possible that other aspects of health improved. It is also possible that in the long run, the new technologies adopted (and perhaps developed) because of Medicare had important health benefits that our 10-year analysis would not capture.

While the health benefits from Medicare therefore remain uncertain, we found clear evidence of a different type of benefit: It provided substantial financial protection to the elderly. Prior to Medicare, they faced the risk of large out-of-pocket medical expenditures. About one in 10 of elderly individuals spent one-fifth of their annual income on medical expenses that were subsequently covered by Medicare. By 1970, we estimate that Medicare had reduced this risk of extremely large out-of-pocket medical expenditures by half.

What all this means is that, as best we can tell, the elderly were not foregoing life-saving treatments prior to Medicare. Rather, they were getting these treatments, albeit at large or even enormous personal financial cost. But overall Medicare did not so much save lives as it did provide financial security. This is the goal of insurance -- not to prevent an awful event from occurring, but to make sure that if it does occur you are not devastated financially.

The Medicare experience offers valuable lessons for today. Recent state efforts to create universal health-insurance coverage would reduce the fraction of the population in a state without insurance by similar amounts as did the introduction of Medicare nationwide. And if that program is any guide, we may perhaps see changes in the structure of the health-care system, such as the development and adoption of new medical technologies. We are likely to witness an improvement in the financial security of the currently uninsured. There are also likely to be increases in health-care spending -- quite possibly substantial ones.

Add Roads, Not Tolls (USAT)

By Bill Graves

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Congestion pricing, touted as a cure for gridlock, is unfair, ineffective and ignores the transportation needs of Americans.

The several forms of congestion pricing all rely on giving motorists better highway access for a price. In many uses, it does not markedly reduce congestion, but merely raises revenues — taxes, in other words. Congestion pricing increases cargo transportation costs and hurts the economy. Higher manufacturers' and retailers' operating costs mean higher costs to consumers for everything from gasoline and clothing to food.

Congestion pricing is unfair, because motorists have already paid for highways with taxes, and fuel taxes are a much more efficient way to fund new infrastructure that effectively reduces congestion. Toll booth islands decrease speeds and increase congestion. Research shows that a toll system consumes more of the revenue than does fuel tax administration.

Proponents of congestion pricing say those who don't want to pay or cannot afford to pay increased commuting costs have other choices. But many low-income motorists cannot change their work hours or child-care needs. Not everyone has access to public transit, which can take longer and is less reliable than traveling by car. The motorist's alternative to paying more at the toll booth is to find another route that is time-consuming and merely shifts congestion to other roads and neighborhoods.

London's model urban congestion pricing scheme spends on overhead about half of the $14 charged a vehicle for entering the city's center. Motorists complain of invasion of privacy from video cameras and tracking devices, and residents of neighborhoods near the city complain of increased congestion.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has called congestion pricing "relatively risky to implement" because people pay for a service they were getting for free, many people would rather have congestion than pay more, and it's hard to predict how much emissions would be reduced.

Congestion pricing comes at a cost to motorists, businesses and the economy. Motorists also lose a bit of their right to travel freely. Adding capacity with new infrastructure funded by fuel taxes is a better solution.

Legal Imperialism (WSJ)

By Joseph G. Finnerty III And John Merrigan

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

The media recently has been writing the obituary of the tort lawyers. "The power of the plaintiffs bar is on the wane," argued the American Lawyer; a cover story in Business Week promised to reveal "How Business Trounced the Trial Lawyers." With apologies to Mark Twain, the reports of the trial lawyers' demise are greatly exaggerated.

While asbestos and tobacco litigation bonanzas are winding down, America's most aggressive contingency-fee law firms still have in place a fee structure in search of an investment strategy. And so, faced with shrinking domestic opportunities, these firms have gone global.

Consider one class-action lawsuit, in which a plaintiffs firm sued Deutsche Bank on behalf of an African tribe which suffered atrocities committed by imperial Germany in the 19th century. Or another, consolidating 10 complaints filed around the country on behalf of all South Africans injured by the former apartheid regime from 1948 to the present.

One of the South African complaints was on behalf of a class including 32,000 plaintiffs; the class in another was estimated to encompass "millions of individuals." The defendants, almost 100 multinational corporations that did business in South Africa after 1948, were alleged to be liable for injuries on the theory that they had aided and abetted the apartheid regime. Purported damages in just one of the consolidated actions total $400 billion.

The law used to lodge these massive foreign class actions in the U.S. is the Alien Tort Statute (ATS). This obscure piece of legislation adopted in 1789 gave federal district courts jurisdiction in civil cases brought by an alien for a tort committed in violation of the law of nations, or of a U.S. treaty. The law was passed primarily to assure a hearing for cases involving offenses against foreign ambassadors, violations of safe conduct and piracy.

The ATS was virtually dormant for two centuries. Then relatives of a Paraguayan citizen who had been kidnapped and tortured to death by a Paraguayan police official -- on Paraguayan soil -- brought a civil suit against the police official. Plaintiffs and defendants happened to be in the U.S., the police official illegally. In 1980 a U.S. court of appeals allowed the suit to go forward under the ATS, on the grounds that the police official violated international law, including various U.N provisions. From that acorn a mighty oak has grown.

Even by American standards the size of recent ATS class actions is extraordinary. Cases involving wholly foreign events routinely consist of tens or hundreds of thousands of "John Doe" plaintiffs who reside in remote locations as distant as Sudan and Pakistan. The size of the class of defendants has also grown to 500 or more deep-pocketed individuals or companies.

The fact that these lawsuits appear in U.S. courts at all defies common sense. Imagine our justifiable indignation if courts in Japan, France or Russia determined they had jurisdiction over alleged wrongdoing by Americans, in America, against other Americans. It takes a thoroughly arrogant view of the world -- call it legal imperialism -- to presume that our courts should be the arbiter of problems everywhere, whether or not the problem had anything whatsoever to do with the U.S.

Nevertheless, our tort lawyers presume just that, demanding that our court system sit in judgment over alleged conduct occurring completely within the borders of other sovereign nations, regardless of the effect this may have on U.S. foreign relations. Huge ATS cases have been filed against classes of unnamed defendants in Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar and other countries in the Middle East where vital, and delicate, U.S. national security interests are at stake.

Of course, it ultimately will be impractical for U.S. courts to police these monster ATS class actions if they are allowed to proliferate; they dwarf in size the asbestos cases that currently plague the U.S. courts. Congress could have amended the ATS to limit the damage, and in 2005, Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein proposed to do so, without success.

Fortunately, the Supreme Court weighed in. In Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, a Mexican doctor suspected to have participated in the torture and murder of a U.S. DEA agent was apprehended in Mexico by Jose Sosa, a Mexican national hired by U.S. law enforcement. Mr. Sosa brought the Mexican doctor to the U.S., where he was arrested. The doctor sued Mr. Sosa for unlawful detention. In 2004, the Supreme Court dismissed the action and imposed a "high bar" against innovative ATS lawsuits. As a result of Sosa, several ATS suits have been rejected because of the potential for interference with U.S. foreign policy.

In one case, the D.C. circuit dismissed an ATS case seeking reparations from Japan for crimes committed during World War II because the suit interfered with state-to-state negotiations and threatened to "disrupt Japan's delicate relations with China and Korea, thereby creating serious implications for stability in the region."

In another, a federal court dismissed a case brought after the Israeli Defense Forces used heavy equipment to demolish buildings in the Palestinian territory. Plaintiffs sought damages from the manufacturer, Caterpillar, along with an order to stop supplying products to the Israeli armed forces. The court noted that the plaintiffs improperly sought to challenge the acts of an existing government in a region "where diplomacy is delicate and U.S. interests are great."

Trial lawyers nevertheless continue to test the outer limits of ATS liability, "high bar" or not, by filing an array of increasingly ambitious ATS class actions. In one pending case, Wal-Mart has been sued on behalf of residents of China, Bangladesh, Indonesia, Swaziland and Nicaragua. Plaintiffs seek to hold the company vicariously liable for the labor policies of its overseas suppliers. The improvement of labor policies in other countries is certainly a worthy goal. But it is the province of the executive branch and Congress under the foreign affairs and treaty-making powers, not that of attorneys looking for contingency fees.

The corporations named in the South African case -- including IBM, General Motors, Ford, Xerox, Coca-Cola and Citigroup -- were legally doing business in South Africa pursuant to the official U.S. policy of "constructive engagement" that sought to encourage positive changes in South Africa through economic investment. Recognizing this, the federal court in the Southern District of New York dismissed all 10 of the cases.

That dismissal, along with the dismissals of several other ATS cases, is now pending on appeal before the Second and Ninth Circuits. As these and other ATS cases ripen for appellate review, the era of post-Sosa ATS jurisprudence is entering a critical phase.

The executive branch has promoted strict conformance with Sosa: Both the Clinton and Bush administrations have filed progressively stronger "Statement of Interest" briefs urging that federal courts dismiss ATS cases that could interfere with U.S. foreign policy.

Still, leading class-action law firms such as Motley Rice, Milberg Weiss and Cohen Milstein have launched exploratory ATS cases to test the waters, trying to maneuver around sovereign immunity, which prevents lawsuits against foreign governments. Instead, the plaintiffs lawyers claim that U.S. corporations doing business abroad are vicariously liable for the purely overseas acts of foreign governments, or other actors, in jurisdictions where the U.S. companies do business. And pressured by the massive exposure involved in ATS class actions, defendants in some early cases have opted to settle rather than undertake the risks of litigation.

These plaintiffs firms are flush with cash, experts in the business of creating cases, and undeterred by setbacks. In fact, contingency-fee lawyers take each rejection as a lesson in which tactics work and which do not. They know that if they can weather dismissal motions in a single case, they can proliferate a succession of copycat ATS class actions.

Once they do, you can be sure that a torrent of global ATS class actions will follow -- to the detriment of the U.S. court system, foreign policy and U.S. standing around the world.

Mr. Finnerty heads the New York Litigation Practice Group for DLA Piper, which represents defendants in ATS cases. Mr. Merrigan, a partner at DLA Piper, is former chairman of the Democratic National Committee's Business Council.

American Insourcing (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

The House of Representatives takes up a foreign investment bill today, so it's time to hold your breath. In the best case scenario, the Members will do their Lou Dobbs riff on "the selling of America," and then pass largely symbolic legislation. But the debate is taking place with an "open rule" on the House floor, which means protectionists could yet do real harm.

For their part, the voters have long ago moved past last year's Dubai Ports fiasco, with polls showing that most Americans understand the benefits of foreign investment. They can see it every day. Only this week, Toyota announced its latest plans to make cars in the U.S., creating some 2,000 jobs in Mississippi. Hyundai is locating an R&D headquarters in Michigan. And Governor Ed Rendell, a Democrat, recently boasted that Pennsylvania "has almost 400,000 people employed by foreign owned companies."

In 2005 alone, foreigners increased their investment in the U.S. by $1.4 trillion, an amount larger than the entire GDP of all but seven nations. Foreigners like our giant market, its rapid growth and, especially since the 2003 tax cuts, our higher returns on capital investment. According to Commerce Department data, last year foreigners invested roughly $500 billion more in the U.S. than Americans invested abroad.

"The United States derives substantial benefits from open trade and investment flows," concludes the latest Economic Report of the President. Net foreign direct investment "accounts for a disproportionately high share of U.S. exports" (19%), physical capital expenditures (10%), and R&D spending (13%). This investment also accounts for five million American jobs paying well above the national average.

Open U.S. capital markets allow Americans to invest in growing foreign companies as well. From 1997-2005, American shareholders have tripled the net value of their ownership of foreign firms, to more than $3 trillion. Nokia may be based in Finland, but some 55% of the cellular phone company's shares are owned by Americans. Capital Group, a U.S. asset management company, recently became the largest single Nokia shareholder. Limits on foreign investment here will only invite retaliation abroad.

The protectionists can't really rebut any of this, so instead they play up the "security" angle. And there is no denying that some foreign takeovers deserve to be scrutinized on national security grounds. That's precisely what the executive branch now does via the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS, an interagency group that has up to 75 days to inspect transactions. A handful are changed or disapproved, but 94% of all foreign investment in the U.S. is made by European and other OECD nations that are hardly a threat.

In the wake of the Dubai Ports debacle, the Bush Administration is already making CFIUS review too stringent. A new study by the National Foundation for American Policy finds that in the last year the "process for securing approvals within CFIUS has grown more difficult and uncertain for foreign investors" with a tripling in the number of investigations and a doubling in the number of withdrawn mergers.

A dangerous precedent was set last year in the $11.6 billion sale of Lucent Technologies to France's Alcatel, when the Administration asserted an authority to revisit a deal even after it was approved and the merger had taken place. Perhaps Administration officials should read their own White House economic report.

As for this week's House vote, the Democratic bill does less damage than Republicans threatened to do last year. On the good side, it would restrict an Administration's ability to re-open CFIUS reviews after they've been closed, reducing the chances of political double jeopardy. On the bad, the bill would require more careful regulatory scrutiny when U.S. assets are sold to foreign enterprises that are government-owned. That involves only about 5% of all such sales, however. More Congressional scrutiny or longer delays were wisely dropped from the bill.

The real danger is the threat of floor amendments from protectionists in both parties. California Republican Duncan Hunter has one of the worst ideas with his proposal to prohibit the sale of any "critical infrastructure" to foreigners. That's a definition so elastic it could include just about everything -- which is what Mr. Hunter wants. If any such provisions get through the House, they deserve a veto.

U.S., N. Korea To Normalize Ties (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

SEOUL -- North Korea's top nuclear negotiator was on his way to the United States yesterday for talks on issues that a State Department official said would include the first steps toward the normalization of diplomatic relations.

The trip, which coincides with the first high-level talks between North Korea and South Korea in more than four months, reflects the rapid easing of tensions with President Kim Jong-il's regime since North Korea agreed this month to freeze its nuclear program in exchange for heavy fuel oil and other concessions.

Kim Kye-gwan, North Korea's vice minister of foreign affairs, arrived in Beijing yesterday and was expected in San Francisco tomorrow, a State Department official told The Washington Times. He will continue to New York for talks with his U.S. negotiating counterpart, Christopher Hill, which will likely begin early next week.

At a State Department briefing yesterday, spokesman Sean McCormack said the two would begin a process of normalization described in the nuclear deal concluded with Pyongyang on Feb. 13 in Beijing.

That agreement calls for the two countries to open bilateral talks "aimed at resolving pending bilateral issues and moving toward full diplomatic relations."

Asked yesterday to confirm that diplomatic normalization would be a part of the New York talks, a State Department official said yes. Normal diplomatic relations typically involve an exchange of ambassadors and related courtesies.

The process to be started in New York also calls for the United States to "begin the process of removing the designation of [North Korea] as a state-sponsor of terrorism and advance the process of terminating the application of the Trading With the Enemy Act with respect to [North Korea]."

Before traveling to New York, Mr. Kim is expected to deliver a speech and meet with private organizations in the San Francisco Bay Area. The State Department official was not certain how long he would be there.

Travel by North Korean diplomats at the United Nations normally is restricted to a 25-mile radius of Manhattan, although exceptions have been made with State Department permission.

The United States still maintains it does not talk to North Korea outside the context of the six-party negotiations, which involve China, Russia, South Korea and Japan. But the outlines of the Beijing deal were worked out in advance during three days of one-on-one meetings between Mr. Kim and Mr. Hill in Berlin.

The breakthrough was also preceded by negotiations between North Korea and the U.S. Treasury Department, which in September 2005 successfully pressured a bank in Macao to freeze $24 million of Pyongyang's overseas holdings.

"Changes are being made to lift the sanctions in the Office of Foreign Assets Control," a source familiar with the U.S. financial community told The Washington Times yesterday. The Office of Foreign Assets Control is tasked with tracking the assets of the United States' enemies.

"Officials there are saying, 'If you look at our documents, North Korea, Iran and Cuba were the enemies of the United States,' " the source said. " 'Going forward, we are looking at Iran and Cuba.' "

A South Korean delegation led by Unification Minister Lee Jae-joung, meanwhile, arrived in Pyongyang for what was expected to be four days of talks. It was the first such meeting since North Korea conducted a nuclear weapons test in October.

The talks were expected to deal with the implementation of the Feb. 13 accord as well as a resumption of South Korean aid and other North-South economic projects.

The delegates could also discuss South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun's call this month for a peace treaty to replace the armistice that halted fighting in the Korean War in 1953.

"The meeting is to create the future of the Korean people and the hope of the Korean Peninsula," Mr. Lee said before leaving Seoul. "We will also focus on normalizing the framework of inter-Korean dialogue and discuss ways of establishing a lasting peace on the Korean Peninsula."

In the North Korean capital, Pyongyang, the group was welcomed by Prime Minister Pak Pong-ju and treated to a gala dinner at the flagship Yanggakdo Hotel.

"Now is the time for the two Koreas to step on a springboard planted on firmer ground," Mr. Pak said, according to pool reports.

McConnell Fears Iran Nukes By 2015 (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

Iran's development of nuclear arms is "very dangerous," and Tehran could deploy the weapons within the next several years, the nation's most senior intelligence official told the Senate yesterday.

"We assess that Tehran seeks to develop nuclear weapons and has shown greater interest in drawing out the negotiations rather than reaching an acceptable diplomatic solution," said retired Vice Adm. Michael McConnell, the new director of national intelligence.

"This is a very dangerous situation, as a nuclear Iran could prompt destabilizing countermoves by other states in this volatile region," he told members of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Iran could have the capability to build nuclear weapons by 2015 and about the same time will be able to mount a nuclear warhead on a missile, Mr. McConnell said in response to a question from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat.

Asked whether Iran would use a nuclear weapon against Israel, Mr. McConnell said: "They've stated that they would consider that, that Israel shouldn't exist, should be wiped off the map. I don't know that I would conclude that they would use it in a prescribed period of time, but that risk would be there."

Mr. McConnell said Iran poses a threat to the United States beyond its nuclear weapons program and is seeking to project military power "with the goal of dominating the Gulf region." Iran is working to disrupt U.S. military operations and the reinforcement of U.S. forces in the region, "thereby raising the political, financial and human cost of our presence," he said.

"To this end, Tehran views its mounting inventory of ballistic missiles as an integral part of its strategy to deter and, if necessary, retaliate against forces in the region, to include United States forces," Mr. McConnell said.

Tehran's power projection capabilities include "terrorist operations" that are aimed at regime preservation, deterring U.S. or Israeli attacks and driving the United States out of the Middle East, he said.

The Lebanese terrorist group Hezbollah is a key element of Iran's strategic goals, and the group could carry out attacks against the United States if it or Iran is threatened, Mr. McConnell said.

He also described Iran's role in Iraq, saying the United States has evidence that Iran is training insurgents at sites outside Iraq to use explosively formed penetrators against U.S. troops.

"If Iran is training Iraqi militants in the use of Iranian weapons, which are then being used to kill Americans in Iraq, I think that's a very serious act, and one that we ought to consider taking steps to stop," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent.

Army Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), was asked during the hearing whether China will pose a threat to the United States because of its weapons buildup.

"China, today, could be a military threat," he said. "They have intercontinental ballistic missiles and nuclear warheads and so on, so it's a matter of they're building their military, in my view, to reach some state of parity with the United States. So, in a threat sense, it becomes intentions. So they're a threat today, they would become an increasing threat over time."

But Tom Fingar, the deputy director of national intelligence for analysis, said China has had nuclear capability for decades and that Beijing "appeared to have decided that we are not an enemy" and wants a peaceful global environment to better address its "very severe social problems."

Gen. Maples also told the Senate panel that North Korea is taking "initial steps" to comply with the Feb. 13 Beijing agreement by allowing international inspections of the Yongbyon nuclear facility. The DIA will be watching "a number of successive steps" that North Korea needs to take under the agreement, Gen. Maples said.

Joseph DeTrani, the mission manager for North Korea in the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, disclosed during the hearing that U.S. intelligence agencies have information that Pyongyang acquired "material sufficient for a production-scale capability of enriching uranium" in violation of agreements to denuclearize. It was the first time a senior U.S. intelligence official had discussed the covert North Korean uranium-enrichment program publicly.

"They were confronted with that information in October 2002, and at that time they admitted to having such a program," Mr. DeTrani said. "And immediately thereafter, that's when they pulled out of the [nonproliferation treaty], they asked the [International Atomic Energy Agency] to leave and so forth."

Iran Worries US Officials Beyond Its Nuclear Plans (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON

The consensus view of US intelligence agencies is that Iran is a power on the rise in the Middle East, eager to expand its military might and committed to the development of nuclear weapons.

If it forges ahead with its current program Tehran could produce an atomic bomb by the early or middle years of the next decade, said the new Director of National Intelligence, retired Vice Adm. Michael McConnell, at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Tuesday on future threats to the United States.

"Iran is growing in its ability to project military power with the goal of dominating the Gulf region," said Admiral McConnell.

This warning comes at a time when the US has charged that Iranian forces are sending deadly weapons to Shiite militias inside Iraq. In addition, US officials have cited the potential threat of long-range Iranian missiles as a reason why Europe might need US-made missile defenses.

Critics of the White House say that the US may be misusing intelligence information to create a pretext for conflict with Iran, in a manner similar to the run-up to the Iraq war.

Intelligence officials appearing before the Senate Armed Services panel said that they were calling Iranian intentions as they saw them.

McConnell said that as part of the learning process for his new job he recently reviewed intelligence about the position of Iran's hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and was disappointed with what he found.

"He remains popular," McConnell said. "He has staffed his cabinet and [positions] around him with hard-liners. The economy is strong because of oil revenues."

Iran's ballistic missiles currently can reach only as far as Israel, said Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency. Iranian scientists might perfect longer range models by 2015, he said.

"We are seeing them develop some space launch capability," said Mr. Maples.

In addition, it is "probable" that Iran's leadership knows that the Iranian Qods Force, an elite unit of the Revolutionary Guards, is shipping sophisticated anti-armor explosives to Iraqi Shiite militias, according to US intelligence.

"There is no direct link," said McConnell. "I am comfortable saying it is 'probable'."

Meanwhile, on Tuesday the White House said that it would be willing to attend a regional conference in Iraq next month that could include Iran and Syria.

The conference would be aimed at ways to stabilize Iraq. The administration has ruled out any direct talks with Tehran unless it suspends its uranium-enrichment program.

But if Iraq puts together a multilateral meeting, "[and] if we were invited to participate, we certainly would," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

At the Senate Armed Services threat briefing, intelligence officials also presented a mixed view about the prospects and implementation of the president's plan to push for more security in Baghdad.

President Bush presented the effort as one in which Iraqi troops would be in the lead, with US forces serving in a supporting capacity.

To this point, Iraqi units are not fully at the point of the spear in Baghdad, but "are in the process of taking the lead," McConnell said.

Iraqi brigades moved into Baghdad have had anywhere from 43 to 82 percent of their approved manpower, he said. "It is a work in progress."

Military success will not occur without progress toward political reconciliation, said intelligence officials. Yet that remains a difficult challenge.

The Shiites are not confident of their position in the majority, and remain worried about a Sunni resurgence, said the officials. The Sunnis, for their part, are not yet willing to admit they are no longer in charge.

"The question is, will leadership emerge and be capable of taking the country to the next level," McConnell said.

US Military Chief "Categorically" Denies Plans For Iran Air Strikes (AFP)

AFP, February 28, 2007

The head of the US military declared "categorically" Tuesday that the United States is not planning air strikes against Iran.

"It is not true," said General Peter Pace, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, when asked during an appearance in Congress about suggestions that the US military was preparing to launch air strikes on Iran.

Asked by Senator Robert Byrd if he was categorically denying the reports, Pace replied: "Categorically sir".

US Vice President Dick Cheney fueled concerns about possible US military strikes against Iran over the weekend by saying that "all options are still on the table" to deal with Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program.

There have also been reports in the US media that the Pentagon has been doing contingency planning for military action, possibly including air strikes on nuclear sites around Iran.

But senior officials have stressed publicly that Washington remains committed to using diplomacy to convince Iran to comply with a UN resolution calling on it to suspend uranium enrichment activities some believe are a precursor to producing atomic weapons.

Hezbollah Warns U.S. Against Iran Attack (AP)

By Scheherezade Faramarzi

AP, February 28, 2007

The deputy chief of Hezbollah warned Tuesday that any "military adventure" by the United States and Israel against Iran would have dangerous consequences across the Mideast.

Sheik Naim Kassem suggested his pro-Iranian group would not get involved if the U.S. attacks Iran, but he raised the possibility that Israel might attack Lebanon as part of such an assault — in which case, he said, Hezbollah would "definitely" respond.

He said Hezbollah guerrillas were making plans in case Israel, like last summer, attacks Lebanon again.

"The resistance is taking all the necessary measures to be ready and prepared," Kassem said in an interview with the Associated Press. He would not elaborate but said Hezbollah is constantly changing its fighting tactics so the Israelis would not know its capabilities.

"We've evaluated the experience of the war and learned lessons from it and are taking steps to accommodate them with new realities," he said. "We are making sure the enemy will be in the dark in the future. This is the strength of the resistance and the secret of its success."

The United States insists it is not planning to attack Iran and is trying to persuade Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment, as demanded by the United Nations. But fear of a strike is growing throughout the Middle East.

Kassem, a Shiite Muslim cleric, warned that an assault on Iran could expand across the region.

"It remains to be seen what the level of an American aggression on Iran would be," he said. "Is it going to be limited or an all-out war? Will other countries become involved? Will it spread to the entire region?"

Asked if the U.S. attacked Iran, Hezbollah would retaliate by striking Israel, Kassem said Iran is capable of defending itself because it "possesses the means, a tenacious populace and a wise leadership."

Iran has threatened to attack the hundreds of thousands of U.S. forces based in the Persian Gulf and in Iraq if America launches a strike.

Kassem warned, "we will definitely respond and defend ourselves" if Israel attacks Lebanon.

Kassem's comments aimed to counter speculation that Hezbollah may stir up trouble in the region — including attacking Israel — if Iran is attacked: "They have to know that any military adventure, if widened and involves several countries in the region, would have dangerous consequences for everyone."

In Lebanon, Hezbollah has been locked in a power-struggle for months with the U.S.-backed government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. The Shiite group and its allies are demanding a new government in which they would have greater power. Washington has dramatically beefed up support for Saniora, who has rejected the opposition's demands.

Kassem blamed the United States for the deadlock, saying it is pressuring Saniora to refuse a compromise. Washington's goal is to undermine Hezbollah's resistance against Israel, he said.

Kassem, who is the deputy of Hezbollah's charismatic leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, dismissed Lebanese and American government charges that Hezbollah was a tool of Iran and Syria. In contrast, he said, "the (Saniora) government is directly dictated by the Americans."

US Targets Iran's Financial Underbelly (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington

DOJ_NMG_0138053

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

Encouraged by what it sees as the success of financial sanctions imposed on North Korea, the Bush administration is embarking on an aggressive policy of raising the cost to Iran of its alleged nuclear and terrorist activities by targeting non-US private sector ties to Tehran.

Officials say the policy has support from "hawks" in the administration who see actions against financing as a key component in the "war on terror".

However, there is still debate over whether the financial pressure on North Korea ultimately forced it to agree two weeks ago to a freeze of its Yongbyon nuclear facility, or whether the measures wasted a crucial 17 months while Pyongyang boycotted talks and continued producing plutonium for its growing nuclear arsenal.

North Korea's frozen accounts in Banco Delta Asia, a small Macao bank that was designated a "primary money laundering concern" in September 2005, remain an issue that could still have an impact on the February 13 agreement to freeze Yongbyon.

US Treasury officials are in Macao this week to discuss the fate of the accounts with the monetary authority there. Chris Hill, the senior State Department official who negotiated the nuclear suspension, reached an understanding with North Korea that the issue would be "resolved" within 30 days.

Daniel Glaser, the Treasury official leading the Macao talks, on Monday said the US wanted to take "specific steps" to resolve the issue as soon as possible. But he also said the US, having investigated 300,000 documents, had confirmed its "suspicions and concerns".

The White House said it saw the actions taken against North Korea as a model for its Iran policy. "Concerted diplomatic activity and pressure on the government of North Korea did bring the North Koreans back to the six-party talks. And we look at that as a possible template," Tony Snow, the spokesman, said in reference to Iran.

Other officials and US bankers note, however, that the financial sanctions hurt North Korea mainly because Chinese banks took part, in a reflection of how seriously Beijing regarded its neighbour's nuclear -programme.

Although the US is starting to make progress in persuading European banks to cut ties with Iran, diplomats are less confident that China and other big customers for Iranian oil will follow suit at this stage.

Trita Parsi, an Iran analyst who advocates dialogue between the US and Iran, argues that Washington's "euphoria" over the perceived success of its financial sanctions is severely flawed. He says the dwindling popularity of Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's hardline president, is more due to his own failed economic policies and the exaggerated expectations raised by his populist promises.

Matthew Levitt, who until last month was a senior official in the US Treasury's terrorism and financial intelligence branch, said: "The most exciting tool we are experimenting with is private sector investment."

The Treasury was looking at ways to raise the cost to Iran, he told a meeting hosted by the Washington Institute of Near East Policy where he is now a senior analyst.

Mr Levitt said foreign banks were responding to US pressure by considering the risk to their reputation from dealing with Tehran, following sanctions imposed on two Iranian commercial banks. However, while "engaging" the private sector was proving beneficial, he said some banks were doing the "minimum to keep out of trouble" with the US by halting dollar transactions with Iran but not transactions in other currencies.

U.S. Sanctions With Teeth (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Everybody knows that economic sanctions don't work. Just look at the decades of fruitless pressure on Cuba. But guess what? In the recent cases of North Korea and Iran, a new variety of U.S. Treasury sanctions is having a potent effect, suggesting that the conventional wisdom may be wrong.

These new, targeted financial measures are to traditional sanctions what Super Glue is to Elmer's Glue-All. That is, they really stick. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt doesn't even like to call them sanctions, preferring the term "law enforcement measures." Explains Stuart Levey, Treasury's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence: "Sanctions are scoffed at. They have a bad history."

Authority for the new sanctions, as with so many other policy weapons, comes from the USA Patriot Act, which in Section 311 authorizes Treasury to designate foreign financial institutions that are of "primary money laundering concern." Once a foreign bank is so designated, it is effectively cut off from the U.S. financial system. It can't clear dollars; it can't have transactions with U.S. financial institutions; it can't have correspondent relationships with American banks.

The new measures work thanks to the hidden power of globalization: Because all the circuits of the global financial system are inter-wired, the U.S. quarantine effectively extends to all major banks around the world. As Levey observed in a recent speech, the impact of this little-noticed provision of the Patriot Act "has been more powerful than many thought possible."

Treasury applied the new tools to North Korea in September 2005, when it put a bank in Macao called Banco Delta Asia on the blacklist. There was no legal proceeding -- just a notice in the Federal Register summarizing the evidence: Banco Delta Asia had been providing illicit financial services to North Korean government agencies and front companies for more than 20 years, according to the Treasury notice. The little Macao bank had helped the North Koreans feed counterfeit $100 bills into circulation, had laundered money from drug deals and had financed cigarette smuggling. North Korea "pays a fee to Banco Delta Asia for financial access to the banking system with little oversight or control," Treasury alleged.

Wham! The international payments window shut almost instantly on Pyongyang's pet bank. Transactions with U.S. entities stopped, but the Treasury announcement also put other countries on notice to beware of Banco Delta Asia. The Macao banking authorities, realizing that they needed the oxygen of the international financial system to survive, took regulatory action on their own and froze the bank's roughly $24 million in North Korean assets. And around Asia, banks began looking for possible links to North Korean front companies -- and shutting them down.

A similar financial squeeze is being applied to Iran. Here again, the impact has come from the way private financial institutions have reacted to public pressure from Treasury. "As banks do their risk-reward analysis, they must now take into account the very serious risk of doing business in Iran, and what the risks would be if they were found to be part of a terrorist or proliferation transaction," says Kimmitt.

Treasury began squeezing Iran last September, when it accused Bank Saderat, one of the largest government-owned banks, of financing terrorism by funneling $50 million to Hezbollah and Hamas since 2001. The Treasury order cut the bank off from any access to the U.S financial system, direct or indirect. A similar ban was imposed in January on Bank Sepah, which Treasury alleged was a key intermediary for Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization, the agency that oversees the country's ballistic missile program.

Meanwhile, top Treasury officials began visiting with bankers and finance ministers around the world, warning them to be careful about their dealings with Iranian companies that might covertly be supporting terrorism or weapons proliferation. This whispering campaign was enough to convince most big foreign banks in Europe and Japan to back away from Iran.

The new sanctions are toxic because they effectively limit a country's access to the global ATM. In that sense, they impose -- at last -- a real price on countries such as North Korea and Iran that have blithely defied U.N. resolutions on proliferation. "What's the goal?" asks Levey. "To create an internal debate about whether these policies [of defiance] make sense. And that's happening in Iran. People with business sense realize that this conduct makes it hard to continue normal business relationships."

GLOBAL POSITIONING Russian Deals In Middle East Snarl U.S. Strategy On Iran (WSJ)

By Gregory L. White And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

As the U.S. struggles to contain Iran and its nuclear program, it is bumping into a new impediment: an assertive Russia bent on regaining leverage -- and markets -- in the Middle East.

While the U.S. and Russia tussled last autumn over a United Nations resolution to rein in Iran's nuclear program, Moscow quietly moved ahead on another front. It delivered more than $700 million worth of air-defense systems to help protect Iran's nuclear enrichment and research sites from attack, Russian officials confirmed in December. The Russian military then started training Iranian officers to use the new systems.

"We don't think Iran should feel itself encircled by enemies," President Vladimir Putin told al-Jazeera television earlier this month, after Tehran successfully tested the weaponry. "The Iranian people and the Iranian leadership should feel that they have friends in the world."

Pumped up by surging oil revenues and a rebounding economy, the Kremlin now is keen to reclaim a prominent global role and help offset the perceived might of the U.S., especially in the Middle East. Under broad pressure to engage Tehran and other adversaries diplomatically, the U.S. yesterday agreed to join in with both Iran and Syria in regionwide talks about Iraq, though Washington said the scope of the talks would stay narrow.

In its campaign to recapture its sway in the region, Moscow has forgiven billions of dollars in Soviet-era debts and lined up lucrative energy and arms deals, causing heightened concern for Washington. U.S. and Israeli officials say there also are signs that Russian antitank missiles are finding their way back into the hands of Lebanon's Hezbollah militia via Syria, even after the Kremlin promised to cut off any flow after the war last summer between Israel and Hezbollah. Russia also has broken with the U.S. by nurturing contacts with the Palestinian militant group Hamas, which the U.S. regards as a terrorist group.

Stark Example

But the starkest example of Russia's new assertiveness is toward Iran. For months, the Bush administration had tried to get Moscow to stop the arms sale, Russia's biggest to Iran in years. For the White House and much of the Arab world, last summer's war in Lebanon served as a wake-up call on Iran's growing role in supporting radical groups such as Hezbollah. The U.S. since then has bulked up its forces in the Persian Gulf and declined to rule out an attack on Iran. It has led a financial crackdown against Iran's banks and other financial entities, along with the U.N. effort to curb Iran's nuclear program.

Russia has taken a far different tack. For four months last autumn Moscow used its U.N. veto power to fight successfully against U.S. and European efforts to impose tough sanctions on Iran's nuclear program. Russia finally agreed in December to a much more narrowly tailored resolution that targeted only parts of Iran's nuclear and ballistic-missile programs.

In January, while the U.S. and Europe were working to isolate Iran and U.S. forces were detaining Iranian officials in Iraq, Mr. Putin reacted warmly to an Iranian proposal for Russia and Iran, two countries with the world's largest reserves of natural gas, to form an OPEC-style alliance. The idea drew a swift negative response from Washington and Europe. Earlier this month, in a speech in Germany that raised fears in the West of a new Cold War, Mr. Putin said American military aggressiveness was the reason countries like Iran are seeking nuclear weapons.

"Russia is a huge problem on the Iran front," says John Bolton, who frequently wrestled with Moscow as President Bush's ambassador to the U.N. until December. "When it comes to Russia and Iran, it is hard to say who is whose client state."

Current administration officials who work closely with Russia aren't quite so harsh, but concerns over Moscow's intentions in the Middle East -- as well as its overall foreign policy -- are rising. "When it comes to Iran, the Russians want to have their cake and eat it, too," said one senior U.S. official. "They want to look tough in working to keep Iran from getting nuclear weapons, while also standing in as Iran's friend and weapons provider."

Tensions are likely to sharpen again, after the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency found last week that Iran was adding hundreds of new centrifuges at its main nuclear research site at Natanz and accelerating efforts there to enrich uranium. The work is a sign to many in the West that Tehran -- despite its protestations to the contrary -- is seeking to develop nuclear weapons. The U.S., France and Britain immediately called for another sanctions resolution, but Russia warned that it would resist any moves to hit Iran's economy. Diplomats met in London Monday but have yet to negotiate details.

Russian officials insist they share the U.S. goal of preventing a nuclear-armed Iran. But Russia has argued that the Bush administration's confrontational approach to Iran won't work, and could pave the way for another war in the region. The Kremlin also looks at Iran as an important customer for its weapons and civil nuclear technology and says economic ties give it much-needed leverage over Tehran.

Softer Approach

Moscow's much softer, carrot-and-stick approach toward Iran also serves Russia's other goals. It allows Moscow to wield its leverage within the U.N. Security Council, where Russia is one of just five countries with veto power. Fending off tough economic sanctions also allows Russia to continue expanding trade ties with Iran, while showing other regimes in the region that friendship with Moscow pays geopolitical dividends.

The Middle East is a key target market for Russia's nuclear-power and arms exports, industries that Mr. Putin is counting on to help diversify its oil-dependent economy. Russia's global arms exports are expected to hit a record $7.5 billion in 2007, and they are growing fast in the Middle East, though still far behind the U.S. and Europe. Russia is also building Iran's only nuclear power plant, which is now unopposed by the U.S. and European leaders, at the southern port city of Bushehr under a contract signed in 1992. Mr. Putin dismisses U.S. sanctions on Russian arms and nuclear exporters that do business with Iran as efforts by the U.S. to engage in "unfair competition." He says the Kremlin won't sell any weapons that would change the balance of power in the region.

With its economy growing and its foreign debts paid, the Kremlin is in a much stronger position to push its view and make the U.S. listen. "Russia is not claiming the role of a superpower," Mr. Putin told al-Jazeera. "But Russia knows its own worth and we will strive to make the world multipolar."

Russian officials argue that harsh sanctions would only cause Iran to speed up its nuclear-weapons program. Iran's nuclear sites are too well dispersed and concealed for an air attack to be successful, Russian officials say, an assessment shared by many in Washington and Europe. A failed assault, they warn, would trigger a wave of violence and instability across the entire region, dwarfing the chaos in Iraq and reaching into Russia's southern border regions, already riven by separatism. "We cannot subscribe to the notion that the best path to finding a long-lasting and comprehensive solution lies through isolation and confrontation," says Russia's ambassador to the U.S., Yuri Ushakov.

Moscow and Washington have split over thorny Middle East issues in the past, but until recently the conflicts didn't go far. As the U.S. prepared to invade Iraq in 2003, for example, the Kremlin warned that Washington's confrontational approach would prove counterproductive. But in the end, Moscow limited itself to sounding off in public.

As recently as 2005, after U.S. and Israeli warnings the weapons could fall into the hands of Hezbollah, Moscow shelved plans to sell sophisticated portable antiaircraft missiles to Syria, signing a deal with Washington to disclose sales of those weapons in the future.

'Difficult Partner'

But now, talk of a "strategic partnership" between Washington and Moscow has been scrapped. Russian officials bristle at U.S. criticism of Mr. Putin's crackdown on opposition at home, as well as Washington's courting of Russia's former-Soviet neighbors and moves to counter efforts by Kremlin-controlled energy giants to expand internationally.

After a visit to Washington this month, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov told Russian TV that the U.S. is Moscow's "most difficult partner."

Then Moscow stirred a furor in Washington by vehemently opposing U.S. plans to build a rudimentary missile-defense network in Europe to counteract future threats from Iran. Moscow's top military brass, in language smacking of the Cold War, threatened to target planned U.S. installations in Poland and the Czech Republic. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called the threat "extremely unfortunate."

Russian officials from Mr. Putin on down barely disguise their relish when they highlight setbacks for U.S. policy in the Middle East and recount Moscow's prewar warnings that the invasion of Iraq was a bad idea. "Today, America is viewed as the great loser in the eyes of the Russian establishment," says Yevgeny Satanovsky, president of the Institute of Middle Eastern Studies in Moscow.

At the same time, years of careful courting of Iran and the Arab countries of the Middle East are paying off for the Kremlin as political and economic ties to the region flower in a way not seen even during the Cold War.

Russia is unencumbered by the communist dogma that made the Soviet Union anathema in large swaths of the Middle East. "There are no countries in the Arab world left that we have any differences with," Mr. Putin told al-Jazeera before his recent trip to the region.

As on his other visits, his delegation was packed with representatives of big Russian companies looking for deals in areas like energy, arms and nuclear power. While Western capitals routinely criticize the Kremlin for rolling back democratic institutions, Middle Eastern leaders have publicly called for Mr. Putin to defy a constitutional ban and remain in office when his term ends next year.

"There's no more ideology, there's just business," says Mr. Satanovsky.

Just how much has changed has become clear over the last year. In June, Russia finally agreed to let the fight over Iran's nuclear program spill into the U.N. Security Council, signing onto an incentives package that promised Iran a range of trade and other concessions -- including direct talks with the U.S. -- if Tehran suspended its uranium enrichment work. But Russia also made clear that it would not endorse any moves to target Iran's economy or to lay the ground for possible military action.

Two weeks later at the G-8 summit of leading nations in St. Petersburg, Mr. Putin, hosting the summit for the first time, took the floor as leaders struggled to come up with a joint response to the war then raging in Lebanon. According to people familiar with the meeting, he recalled that in 2000 when he took office he faced what the Kremlin saw as an Islamist uprising in Chechnya and a moribund economy. Promises of support from G-8 partners proved largely empty, overshadowed by criticism of Russian brutality in the Chechen war. Middle Eastern countries were ultimately more supportive, sending observers to vet elections after fighting subsided. Noting Russia's big Muslim population and vulnerable borders near the Middle East, Mr. Putin gave his bottom line: He was only ready to sign on to a G-8 statement on the Middle East if it didn't hurt Moscow's relations with the Islamic world "by one iota."

Things got testier in September when Russia, China, France, Britain and the U.S., along with Germany, began trying to draft a U.N. resolution on Iran. Russia was adamant that any sanctions be finely tuned to limit the inflow of sensitive nuclear technology, and not try to hit Iran's economy in a broader way. Moscow also insisted that nothing hamper its work at the Bushehr nuclear plant.

Tougher Punishments

The Bush administration initially wanted to push for a much tougher package of economic punishments, even if it meant that both Russia and China abstained from the measure. Russia in the end succeeded in keeping the U.N. measures as minimal as possible to win its support, and left the work at Bushehr unscathed.

Despite the view of the U.S. and most European capitals, the Kremlin frequently argues that Iran isn't necessarily seeking to build nuclear weapons. Russian officials also say they carefully restrict what kinds of weapons to sell to Iran, for example, refusing requests for shoulder-mounted antiaircraft missiles that are a favorite among terrorists.

The Kremlin also is partly using the Bushehr project as a tool to prod Tehran over the nuclear program, according to some Western diplomats. Though Russian officials publicly deny any connection, as Iran has dug in its heels on its uranium-enrichment efforts, Moscow has repeatedly put off shipment of the fuel for the reactor. Just last week, Russian officials said problems with payments from Iran -- which Tehran denies -- would lead to further hang-ups.

After the Kremlin last year offered a compromise in which Iran would do sensitive work with uranium fuel only with Russia, Tehran stalled and then ignored the offer. That fueled Russia's U.N. vote for sanctions, which surprised Tehran. "They hoped until the end that Russia would block or veto," says Rajab Safarov, director of the Russian-Iranian Business Council in Moscow. "They were horrified."

Yet just as swiftly, Russia moved to repair its ties to Tehran, exchanging high-level visits and delivering the air-defense missiles.

Russia: Hamas To End Attacks Against Israel (USAT)

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Hamas supreme leader Khaled Mashaal promised during a meeting Tuesday with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov in Moscow that the militant Palestinian group will end missile attacks and other violence against Israel, Lavrov said.

However, Mashaal said his group is not ready to recognize the Jewish state. Renouncing violence and recognizing Israel are key demands of international peace negotiators before ending a financial aid boycott of the Hamas-led Palestinian government.

Sudan rejects chargesof war crimes in Darfur

Sudan Justice Minister Mohammed Ali al-Mardi rejected on Tuesday the International Criminal Court's allegations against a government minister and a militia leader accused of war crimes in Darfur.

"All the evidence the prosecutor referred to is lies," he said. He said the ICC "has no jurisdiction to try any Sudanese" and the suspects would not be handed over for trial.

The court accused Ahmed Muhammed Harun, junior minister for humanitarian affairs, and militia commander Ali Mohammed Ali Abd-al-Rahman, also known as Ali Kushayb, of 51 counts of crimes against humanity and war crimes in 2003 and 2004. Harun was junior interior minister during the worst Darfur fighting.

Since 2003, at least 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million displaced in fighting between the Sudanese army and its Arab militia allies against a tribal uprising.

Two Canadian anti-terror laws will not be renewed

Canada's Parliament scrapped two anti-terrorism measures adopted after the 9/11 attacks in 2001. One allows three-day detention without charges of anyone suspected of planning an imminent attack. The second allows a judge at investigative hearings to force witnesses to testify about alleged terrorist activities.

The House of Commons voted 159-12 not to renew the measures. They expire March 1.

Liberal Party leader Stephane Dion said the laws have never been used and "represent a risk to individual rights." Prime Minister Stephen Harper, whose Conservatives won power in January 2006, says the Liberals are soft on terrorism.

U.S., Italian envoys injuredin Sri Lanka rebel attack

U.S. Ambassador Robert Blake and Italian envoy Pio Mariani were slightly wounded when Sri Lankan military helicopters carrying them came under fire from ethnic Tamil rebels. The helicopters had landed in Batticaloa when mortars exploded, government minister Mahinda Samarasinghe said. The U.S. Embassy said Blake was "all right," but it did not elaborate.

Ex-official, Militia Chief Charged With War Crimes (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

NEW YORK -- The International Criminal Court yesterday charged a former Sudanese official and the leader of the government-backed Janjaweed militia with committing war crimes in Darfur, the first of many anticipated attempts to punish participants in the bloody ethnic conflict.

The nascent court, which has been collecting evidence on Darfur for 20 months, accused Ahmad Mohammed Harun, formerly the junior interior minister in charge of the western Sudanese region, and Janjaweed commander Ali Kushayb of being involved in war crimes and crimes against humanity between August 2003 and March 2004.

The Bush administration, until recently a foe of the ICC because of claims it lacks safeguards to protect U.S. soldiers and civilians in conflict zones, praised the court action.

"We fully support bringing to justice those responsible for crimes and atrocities that have occurred in Darfur," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters in Washington.

Prosecutors at tribunal based in The Hague made the charges public yesterday morning.

"The prosecution has concluded there are reasonable grounds to believe that Ahmad Harun and Ali Kushayb ... bear criminal responsibility in relation to 51 counts of alleged crimes against humanity and war crimes," said ICC prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo.

"The evidence shows they acted together, and with others, with the common purpose of carrying out attacks against the civilian populations," he said.

The two men were largely responsible for carrying out a campaign of 51 specific counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity, including rape, murder, torture, forcible transfer, destruction of property, pillaging, inhumane acts, outrage upon personal dignity, attacks against the civilian population, and unlawful imprisonment or severe deprivation of liberty, the court said.

Human rights groups welcomed the action, but warned that a meaningful international military intervention is still necessary to save the remaining survivors and stabilize nearby Chad, temporary home to some 230,000 Sudanese refugees displaced by four years of fighting and attacks that are thought to have killed more than 200,000 people.

The Sudanese government yesterday rejected the ICC's authority as "illegitimate" and said it would not turn over the suspects for trial.

"The court has no jurisdiction to try any Sudanese for any alleged crimes," Justice Minister Mohammed Ali al-Mardi told reporters in Khartoum, according to wire service accounts.

"[Our] stance is not limited to those who fight on the government's side, but applies to all Sudanese, including those who still bear arms and fight the government. They are Sudanese, and we will not let them be tried by any court outside Sudan."

He dismissed the court's evidence, but also noted that one of the two suspects, Mr. Kushayb, had been in government custody since November on charges relating to the killings in Darfur.

The Sudanese government, which has grudgingly allowed an ill-equipped African Union peacekeeping force to police specific areas, has rejected a more robust U.N. peacekeeping force.

The charges announced yesterday at The Hague describe a direct link between the Interior Ministry and Mr. Kushayb, who is referred to as "the colonel of colonels" in charge of Darfur.

An estimated 2.5 million people have been driven from their homes since 2003, when ethnic African rebels took up arms against the government, claiming decades of discrimination and neglect.

Outside observers, including officials from the United Nations and African Union, blame pro-government militias for the worst atrocities.

Sudan Official Accused In Darfur Atrocities (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

UNITED NATIONS -- A top Sudanese government official colluded with militias to commit atrocities against civilians in the Darfur region, the International Criminal Court's chief prosecutor said Tuesday.

Prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo presented results of a 21-month investigation that he said showed "reasonable evidence" that Ahmed Haroun, then state minister for the interior, and imprisoned militia leader Ali Kushayb, "bear criminal responsibility" for mass executions, rapes and the forcible removal of thousands of people from their homes.

The allegations, which are not an indictment, are a first step that could lead to arrests and prosecutions by the court at The Hague, and they come amid an international campaign to halt the violence in Darfur, which has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million in the last four years.

Prosecution, however, will not be easy. Sudan's justice minister immediately rejected the allegations and said the suspects would not be handed over for trial.

Haroun is Sudan's state minister for humanitarian affairs. Kushayb, whose real name is Ali Mohammed Ali Abdalrahman, has been under arrest in Khartoum, the capital, since November, on unspecified charges.

"The court has no jurisdiction to try any Sudanese for any alleged crimes," Justice Minister Mohamed Ali Mardi said. Sudan is not a signatory to the treaty that created the International Criminal Court and says it will not respect the court's decisions.

If the Sudanese government refuses to cooperate with the ICC, Tuesday's announcement could be the beginning of a long judicial process for the fledgling international court. Its judges can issue a warrant for the men's arrest, but if Sudan decides to prosecute them for the same crimes under its own judicial system, the international court would no longer have jurisdiction.

"I have no assurance of cooperation," Moreno-Ocampo said in a conference call with journalists. "We know it is a difficult challenge."

He added that in previous cases, a summons was sufficient to get the suspects to appear in court.

Human rights groups have pressed the court to assign blame with the president and army chiefs.

DOJ_NMG_0138059

Moreno-Ocampo said that additional suspects could be named later but that his team for now had gone after those they could clearly link to crimes against humanity.

The investigation focused on militia attacks on four towns in Darfur, in western Sudan, from August 2003 to March 2004.

As head of the "Darfur security desk," Haroun coordinated the recruitment, arming and funding of militiamen known as janjaweed, the prosecution document says. It quotes Haroun as saying during a public meeting that he had been given "all the power and authority to kill or forgive whoever in Darfur for the sake of peace and security," and shows that he directed the militiamen to attack villages.

A member of Haroun's office said the state minister was in Khartoum but unavailable for comment.

Ali Kushayb, a commander of thousands of militia fighters in Darfur, issued orders "to victimize the civilian populations" through mass rapes, killings, torture, looting and the displacement of residents, the court said in a statement.

Moreno-Ocampo said witnesses had testified that Kushayb personally participated in the execution of 32 men in Mukjar, and that his fighters tied women to trees and raped them repeatedly.

Sudanese government officials called the ICC accusations politically motivated and were preparing to organize mass demonstrations.

"The whole thing is counterproductive," a senior official in Khartoum said. "They are just trying to put pressure on the government. The rebels committed atrocities. The government committed atrocities. But we are still in the situation of war. All other tribunals like this took place after the war was over. The issue of justice should come after the peace."

The pending indictments have been a factor in ongoing talks with Khartoum about whether United Nations peacekeeping troops will be allowed in Darfur. Sudan's negotiators have questioned whether U.N. troops would be used to enforce court arrest warrants or to pursue suspects.

Cameron Hume, the U.S. charge d'affaires in Sudan, urged all sides to not allow the court's accusations to interfere with efforts to resolve the crisis. Like Sudan, the U.S. does not recognize the authority of the ICC.

"The urgent thing is improving the humanitarian situation and protecting the humanitarian operations, and having a political dialogue that leads to peace," Hume said.

In an attempt to appease the international community, Sudan created a special court in 2005 to try suspects accused of war crimes in Darfur.

A handful were put on trial in Nyala, accused of being militia members.

"It was a mockery," said Adam Azzain Mohammed, head of the University of Khartoum's Institute for the Studies of Public Administration and Federal Governance. "They only tried ordinary people who had nothing to do with the real clashes."

Justice Ministry officials have suggested that additional prosecutions are imminent, and Khartoum newspapers have reported that trials will start next week.

Some local humanitarian groups expressed frustration that the international court did not list more names or higher-ranking suspects.

"This is very disappointing," said Salih Osman, a human rights attorney in Darfur. "People were expecting more than a list of two men. It's not going to satisfy the victims."

Osman said that both men were "deeply implicated" in the Darfur crisis but that neither was a major orchestrator of the violence. He said Haroun did not hold much political or tribal power in Khartoum and might easily be "sacrificed" by the government.

Nevertheless, he expressed hope that the case would help end the crisis in Darfur.

"Justice and accountability are very important elements to stopping the violence," he said. "The ICC can be a deterrent for government officials who are continuing to commit crimes."

2 Face Trials At The Hague Over Darfur Atrocities (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

THE HAGUE, Feb. 27 — International prosecutors on Tuesday designated their first suspects in atrocities in the Sudanese region of Darfur, selecting a government minister and a militia commander to bring to trial.

Luis Moreno-Ocampo, the chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, said he had presented close to 100 pages of evidence and asked the judges to issue summonses for the two men, Ahmad Harun and Ali Muhammad Ali Abd-al-Rahman.

Mr. Harun, currently Sudan's deputy minister for humanitarian affairs, was a senior government official in charge of the military and police and intelligence forces in Darfur as civilians were killed, raped and chased from their homes in the region, the prosecutors said.

His “unlimited” budget, the prosecutors said, allowed him to arm and finance Mr. Rahman, also known as Ali Kushayb, the militia leader who led fighters in a brutal campaign of violence against civilians. “We have focused on some of the most serious incidents,” Mr. Moreno-Ocampo said.

The announcement came after 20 months of criminal investigation into Darfur’s enormous bloodshed and humanitarian disaster. Human rights activists described the two suspects as powerful but not among Sudan’s top leaders.

At a news conference in The Hague, Mr. Moreno-Ocampo declined to say whether the most important figures in Sudan’s political or military hierarchy would be held accountable for the mass killing, looting, rape and general devastation in Darfur, which has uprooted more than two and a half million people, according to the United Nations.

The prosecution is believed to be investigating crimes by the government, the militias aligned with the government and the rebel forces they oppose.

Court officials said the prosecutor favored a strategy of focusing on specific events to which he can link individuals, rather than pursuing broad, ambitious indictments. He may also be following the path of other war crimes tribunals, building a base of evidence with lesser cases before moving up the chain of command. But the arrival of any Sudanese suspects at the court is far from assured.

In Khartoum, the Sudanese minister of justice immediately said the nation did not recognize the court’s jurisdiction, did not intend to hand over anyone and would try any cases itself. Sudan has told Mr. Moreno-Ocampo that it has already arrested 14 people for human rights violations, including Mr. Rahman. Even so, human rights groups said most of those arrested in Sudan have been low-level fighters.

The prosecutors’ decision, and the reaction from Khartoum, raised the basic difficulty the court faces: how to investigate, let alone put on trial, officials from sitting governments.

The International Criminal Court, embraced by 104 countries but independent from the United Nations, has a broad mandate to investigate war crimes and crimes against humanity. But it has no police to enforce its summonses or arrest warrants, leaving it dependent on the very governments it may be investigating, as in the case of Sudan.

Such issues have confronted United Nations war crimes tribunals for a decade, with prosecutors for Uganda’s genocide and the wars in the Balkans still begging for the arrests of important suspects.

For the first Darfur case — the court is handling cases in three other African nations — the prosecution has focused on violence in four villages and towns, starting in the summer of 2003.

In April of that year, Mr. Moreno-Ocampo said, rebels attacked Al Fasher airport in Darfur, destroying planes, killing government soldiers and kidnapping the Sudanese air force commander. That was a turning point in the conflict, the prosecutor said, and led to intense recruiting of Arab militiamen, or janjaweed, who have been aligned with the Arab-dominated government.

The janjaweed focused on the civilian population, he said, on the rationale that they were supporters of the rebels.

“This strategy became the justification for the mass murder, summary execution and mass rape of civilians,” Mr. Moreno-Ocampo said.

At the time, Mr. Harun was the minister of state for the interior, and oversaw the Darfur Security Desk.

Mr. Harun was seen traveling with well guarded boxes of cash and was observed distributing money, weapons and ammunition throughout Darfur, according to the prosecutor’s statement, and worked closely with the militia leader, Mr. Rahman.

On one occasion, in early August 2003, Mr. Harun arrived by helicopter in the Darfur town of Mukjar as janjaweed militia were moving in and gave a public speech. According to the prosecutor, Mr. Harun said that since the children of the Fur tribe had become rebels, the Fur people and their possessions had become booty for the militia. Immediately upon his departure, the janjaweed “looted the entire town,” the prosecution statement said.

Mr. Rahman personally led the attack on Mukjar and three other villages and towns, the statement said. By mid-2003 he was commanding thousands of janjaweed. His forces pillaged and burned homes and shops, killed hundreds of people and tied women to trees and repeatedly raped them. According to the prosecution, Mr. Rahman took part in a number of summary executions.

He was arrested in Sudan in November and is being held on a different set of human rights violations.

Mr. Moreno-Ocampo said his staff tried to meet with him, and with Mr. Harun, in recent weeks, but the Sudanese government prevented it.

World Court's Big Move On Darfur (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, February 28, 2007

THE HAGUE

DOJ_NMG_0138061

After 20 months, more than 100 formal witness statements, and visits to 17 countries, the chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) Tuesday indicted a high-ranking Sudanese interior minister and a janjaweed militia leader on 51 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity in the ongoing crisis in Sudan's troubled Darfur region.

The naming of Ahmed Haroun, a former deputy interior minister, and a janjaweed leader known as Ali Kushayb, is considered a bold move for the young ICC and its chief prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo. Despite Sudan's rejection of the indictments, most experts hailed them as an international censure that could help end the four-year-old crisis that has killed more than 200,000 people, and displaced more than 2 million.

"The ICC did the right job at getting individuals who can be sacrificed by the Sudanese government, but who at the same time have a significant degree of culpability," says Alex de Waal, a Darfur expert and program director at the Social Science Research Council in New York.

Prosecutor Moreno-Ocampo intrinsically linked the Sudanese government and the feared janjaweed arguing that after Mr. Haroun took charge of the Darfur security desk in April 2003, he oversaw the "staffing, funding, and arming of the [janjaweed]," which grew by 10,000 soldiers and conducted atrocities in Darfur under Haroun's direct authority.

Darfur is widely regarded as the highest profile case in international justice circles, and a possible turning point in efforts to establish a global criminal tribunal – though ICC investigations into Darfur have proceeded during the conflict, and without cooperation by Sudan.

The "Sudanese Armed Forces" conducted a systematic campaign of "underlying operational" support for the janjaweed, the indictment argues, saying that Haroun and Mr. Kushayb met frequently. Janjaweed militiamen told villagers they had the backing of the state, including "the power to kill or forgive." Haroun visited Darfur towns so often he was "known as 'the official' from Khartoum," in west Darfur, Moreno-Campo charged, saying Haroun provided funds from "an unlimited budget...that was not audited."

Significantly for the war crimes and crimes against humanity charges, the janjaweed attackers "targeted no rebel peasants, but civilian residents, based on the idea that they supported the opposition rebels," Moreno-Campo said, and conducted "mass murder, summary executions, and rape."

The ICC has often been termed a "court of the future" for its prospective role as an arbiter of international justice. It was conceived in 1998 as a "court of last resort," and has built its legal approach and validity on the example of the UN Yugoslavia and Rwanda criminal tribunals also housed at The Hague. The ICC has not prosecuted anyone, though it is preparing a trial for Thomas Lubanga Dyilo for enlisting child soldiers in the Congo war of 2002-03.

Still, Tuesday's Darfur indictment is considered crucial in international legal circles since it is the first such case to be referred by the United Nations Security Council. Neither China, which has close ties to the Sudanese regime, Russia, or the US blocked the Darfur case.

Washington's tacit approval is significant, experts say, since the US has not participated in the ICC since it was established in 1998.

"The US position [to allow Darfur investigations to go forward] is a turning point institutionally," says Diane Orentlicher of American University's Washington College of Law, "since it reflects a willingness of the US to accept the jurisdiction of the court."

"All the NGO reports, the UN reports, the State Department, and the commissions, point to a pattern of crimes committed by the janjaweed as a proxy of the Sudanese government," says a source with close ties to the prosecutor. "The pattern is one of aerial attack by government planes and helicopters followed by janjaweed on the ground, sometimes supplemented by government troops."

Sudan says it will not extradite those indicted at The Hague. Still war crimes experts argue that international courts such as the Rwanda and Yugoslavia tribunals eventually proved to build moral and strategic arguments against those charged, which eventually limited their ill-doings and provided a basis for rebuilding the society.

International tribunals, which rarely have much clout, have faced a steady uphill climb over the years, with skepticism if not cynicism about their effectiveness a widely shared feeling among politicians and powerbrokers.

Yet they have continued to develop.

"Some people may never be brought to trial," says Anne Heindel, assistant director of war crimes research at American University in Washington. "But restricting their movements has an overall effect, making it harder [for them] to operate."

The inability of the court to travel in Darfur worries some international human rights legal scholars, who say the evidence should be gathered from the site of the war crimes themselves. Others have argued eloquently that charges of genocide should be brought in Darfur.

Yet most experts seem to agree that the ICC should simply proceed with as much professionalism and investigation as possible. "With this submission, the ICC Chief Prosecutor has stood up for the victims of the mass atrocities in Darfur and awakened the hope for justice in the region. He has also warned all parties to the conflict that they will pay a heavy price for any further attacks on civilians," said Maureen Byrnes, executive director of Human Rights First in New York, in a press release Tuesday.

"The first submission should not be the last," Byrnes adds. "The Chief Prosecutor should pursue evidence of criminal responsibility up the chain of command, no matter how high it takes him." The ICC prosecutor will submit his indictment to judges at The Hague court, after which the judges will decide how and whether to conduct a trial.

Most wanted

A look at the ICC's main targets since it began issuing arrest warrants in 2005:

Ahmed Muhammed Harun (Sudan): Former head of Khartoum's Darfur Security Desk; currently junior minister for humanitarian affairs

Ali Mohammed Ali Abd-al-Rahman, aka Ali Kushayb (Sudan): Janjaweed militia leader

Thomas Lubanga (DR Congo): Militia leader accused of recruitingchild soldiers during 2002-03 conflict; first person put in ICCcustody; ordered last month to stand trial

Joseph Kony (Uganda): Head of fearsome rebel group, the Lord's Resistance Army

Justice For Darfur (WP)

By Angelina Jolie

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

BAHAI, Chad -- Here, at this refugee camp on the border of Sudan, nothing separates us from Darfur but a small stretch of desert and a line on a map. All the same, it's a line I can't cross. As a representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, I have traveled into Darfur before, and I had hoped to return. But the UNHCR has told me that this camp, Oure Cassoni, is as close as I can get.

Sticking to this side of the Sudanese border is supposed to keep me safe. By every measure -- killings, rapes, the burning and looting of villages -- the violence in Darfur has increased since my last visit, in 2004. The death toll has passed 200,000; in four years of fighting, Janjaweed militia members have driven 2.5 million people from their homes, including the 26,000 refugees crowded into Oure Cassoni.

Attacks on aid workers are rising, another reason I was told to stay out of Darfur. By drawing attention to their heroic work -- their efforts to keep refugees alive, to keep camps like this one from being consumed by chaos and fear -- I would put them at greater risk.

I've seen how aid workers and nongovernmental organizations make a difference to people struggling for survival. I can see on workers' faces the toll their efforts have taken. Sitting among them, I'm amazed by their bravery and resilience. But humanitarian relief alone will never be enough.

Until the killers and their sponsors are prosecuted and punished, violence will continue on a massive scale. Ending it may well require military action. But accountability can also come from international tribunals, measuring the perpetrators against international standards of justice.

Accountability is a powerful force. It has the potential to change behavior -- to check aggression by those who are used to acting with impunity. Luis Moreno-Ocampo, chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC), has said that genocide is not a crime of passion; it is a calculated offense. He's right. When crimes against humanity are punished consistently and severely, the killers' calculus will change.

On Monday I asked a group of refugees about their needs. Better tents, said one; better access to medical facilities, said another. Then a teenage boy raised his hand and said, with powerful simplicity, "Nous voulons une Ã©preuve." We want a trial. He is why I am encouraged by the ICC's announcement yesterday that it will prosecute a former Sudanese minister of state and a Janjaweed leader on charges of crimes against humanity.

Some critics of the ICC have said indictments could make the situation worse. The threat of prosecution gives the accused a reason to keep fighting, they argue. Sudanese officials have echoed this argument, saying that the ICC's involvement, and the implication of their own eventual prosecution, is why they have refused to allow U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur.

It is not clear, though, why we should take Khartoum at its word. And the notion that the threat of ICC indictments has somehow exacerbated the problem doesn't make sense, given the history of the conflict. Khartoum's claims aside, would we in America ever accept the logic that we shouldn't prosecute murderers because the threat of prosecution might provoke them to continue killing?

When I was in Chad in June 2004, refugees told me about systematic attacks on their villages. It was estimated then that more than 1,000 people were dying each week.

DOJ_NMG_0138063

In October 2004 I visited West Darfur, where I heard horrific stories, including accounts of gang-rapes of mothers and their children. By that time, the UNHCR estimated, 1.6 million people had been displaced in the three provinces of Darfur and 200,000 others had fled to Chad.

It wasn't until June 2005 that the ICC began to investigate. By then the campaign of violence was well underway.

As the prosecutions unfold, I hope the international community will intervene, right away, to protect the people of Darfur and prevent further violence. The refugees don't need more resolutions or statements of concern. They need follow-through on past promises of action.

There has been a groundswell of public support for action. People may disagree on how to intervene -- airstrikes, sending troops, sanctions, divestment -- but we all should agree that the slaughter must be stopped and the perpetrators brought to justice.

In my five years with UNHCR, I have visited more than 20 refugee camps in Sierra Leone, Congo, Kosovo and elsewhere. I have met families uprooted by conflict and lobbied governments to help them. Years later, I have found myself at the same camps, hearing the same stories and seeing the same lack of clean water, medicine, security and hope.

It has become clear to me that there will be no enduring peace without justice. History shows that there will be another Darfur, another exodus, in a vicious cycle of bloodshed and retribution. But an international court finally exists. It will be as strong as the support we give it. This might be the moment we stop the cycle of violence and end our tolerance for crimes against humanity.

What the worst people in the world fear most is justice. That's what we should deliver.

US Sees Repression 'worsening In Cuba' (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

The Bush administration official whose job is to hasten the end of communism in Cuba on Tuesday claimed the Castro government was stepping up its internal repression in response to an increasingly active opposition movement.

Caleb McCarry, the US State Department's Cuba transition co-ordinator, cited "independent Cuban journalists" as saying civil society had become more active, especially in the provinces, since Fidel Castro temporarily passed power to his brother Raúl last July.

Cubans were starting to speak up in defence of their neighbours from attacks by government-orchestrated mobs, Mr McCarry told the conservative American Enterprise Institute (AEI) policy group. His assessment contrasted with that of analysts and members of Congress who recently returned from Cuba with reports of a smooth transition of power.

"What you see is an uneasy version of the status quo," said Dan Erikson, analyst with the Inter-American Dialogue think-tank. What was remarkable since last July was the level of caution and lack of new thinking displayed by all sides – the government in Havana, the Bush administration and the exiled Cuban community.

The no-change in US policy was underlined by Carlos Gutierrez, the US commerce secretary, in a speech to the AEI. He indicated no intention to relax the travel ban or the partial trade embargo as members of Congress have proposed. He also reiterated the administration's rejection of dialogue offered by Raúl Castro.

"The problem is the repressive communist system. The only solution is to change the system," Mr Gutierrez said.

While Mr Gutierrez stressed the US had "no imperialist intentions" or military plans to occupy Cuba, Roger Noriega, a former Bush administration official, said "international intervention" could be necessary if the regime used "deadly force" to survive.

Asked if the US would intervene to stop such an outcome, Mr McCarry said he did not answer hypothetical questions.

Mr McCarry heads an inter-agency office which has been planning for the "day after" Fidel Castro's death. His mandate is to "accelerate the demise of Castro's tyranny" with a more proactive approach that would undermine the regime's survival strategies.

McConnell: Repression In Cuba Increases (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, February 28, 2007

Repression is increasing in Cuba under the control of Raul Castro, and the domination of the government by his brother, Fidel, is nearing an end, Bush administration officials said Tuesday.

"In Cuba, this year will mark the end of the long domination of that country by Fidel Castro," Mike McConnell, the nation's new spy chief, told Congress.

McConnell, who did not explain his remark, told the Senate Armed Services Committee that significant positive change immediately after Fidel Castro's death was unlikely. He said Raul Castro has had the opportunity to solidify his control in the seven months since his brother's incapacitating illness last July.

Separately, the Bush administration official who oversees a White House effort to promote transition to democracy in Cuba said he has seen no indication that the government is getting ready to make any changes.

"What has increased is repression," Caleb Charles McCarry said at a seminar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Security forces have stepped up harassment of dissidents and have kept closer track of reporters since Fidel Castro transferred control of Cuba's government to his brother after undergoing intestinal surgery, the U.S. official said.

McCarry said the White House Commission for Assistance for a Free Cuba does "what it can to hasten the day when they can enjoy freedom again."

He spoke primarily of broadcasts to Cuba and expressions of support for human rights, and said only peaceful means are used by the United States.

On the job since July 2005, McCarry dismissed any suggestion of U.S. dialogue with Cuba to prepare for transition to democracy. "The dialogue that needs to take place is between Cuban authorities and the Cuban people," he said.

The fall of Castro's 48-year-old government has long been predicted by U.S. officials since the 1959 revolution on the island.

New United Nations Chief Tackles The Agency's Tradition Of Patronage Jobs (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 27 — Secretary General Ban Ki-moon is installing tough new requirements for hundreds of jobs at the United Nations that he hopes will begin to dispel the reputation for inaction and bloat that has long dogged the institution, according to officials in his office.

He is adopting the changes, which include increasing internal competition for jobs and removing some job guarantees, first in his own office, and is calling on others to follow suit or leave the organization. Mr. Ban has found that approach necessary because the powers of a secretary general to force change outside his own office are limited, and the barriers to change in patronage procedures erected by the 192-member General Assembly are substantial.

"From Day 1, he wanted to change the working culture of the United Nations by leading by example," said Kim Won-soo, a Korean associate regarded at the United Nations as Mr. Ban's most influential adviser.

"He says, 'I do it myself and I expect my senior members to do it,' " Mr. Kim said. "He's keen on that."

Among the new procedures, which have already started to agitate the organization, are strict annual performance reviews and term limits for new hires, the opening of high-level jobs at headquarters to United Nations workers in the field and strong pressure for all top officials to make public their confidential financial disclosures.

He is also removing what are known as "reversion options" under which officials ending their service at a high level automatically have the right to revert to their previous level and stay in United Nations service. All appointees will now be told they must give up this option or the job offer will be withdrawn.

High-level officials will be reviewed at the end of their first two years, and all positions will be considered five-year appointments. The secretary general's term is five years, and aides say Mr. Ban believes that other officials should pass through the same reappraisal process he will face if he runs for a second term.

Another innovation Mr. Ban hopes will expand through the executive ranks is what he calls "opening the floor" — making all top deputy positions available to candidates from throughout the United Nations system. The offer of job opportunities in New York has provoked a big response from workers in the field who previously had little hope of landing a coveted headquarters job. More than 1,200 applications have come in for 12 such positions on the 38th floor, which houses Mr. Ban and his top executives.

"Everybody thinks this is the secretary general's floor and the secretary general can put into office whoever he wants," said an official who said he could not discuss policy changes for attribution. "But he wants to show that he has no hidden agenda or any person in mind, he just wants to get the best qualified."

An official who worked on the new arrangement said it had been received well in United Nations offices in Geneva, Vienna and Nairobi, but less so in New York, where, he said, people were likely to want the protection of patronage to enable them to stay put.

Overhauling United Nations management has been a long-thwarted goal.

Last year, reform was aggressively pushed by Ambassador John R. Bolton, then the United States delegate, but the effort ended in confrontation with ambassadors from the developing world and little achievement. The present plan has had only limited input from the United States, according to Mr. Ban's aides and American observers.

Outside experts give Mr. Ban's approach higher odds for working than past efforts.

"This is real change," said Edward C. Luck, a professor of international affairs at Columbia who has followed the United Nations for more than three decades. "This is a way to make top management accountable in ways that have never been tried before."

John G. Ruggie, a professor of international relations at Harvard and former under secretary general for planning, said: "There's a big cultural change under way here that is more than just an institutional change agenda. Ban understands that it's not enough just to move boxes around the organization charts."

Kathy A. Bushkin, chief operating officer of the United Nations Foundation, said: "It's very much like what very modern companies do by changing culture at the top and driving it through the organization. It's a significant move in the direction of the kind of real reform that people have been calling for."

The End Of The Affair? (WSJ)

By Kim R. Holmes And Nile Gardiner

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

For over half a century the Anglo-American "special relationship" has been a dominant force in world affairs. Today it is the engine of the global war on terror, and its enduring strength continues to confound and even infuriate leaders in continental Europe. Britain is the only nation the U.S. truly trusts as an ally; it is the British prime minister and not the German chancellor, the French president or the U.N. secretary-general, to whom the U.S. president looks first for partnership in addressing the big international security matters of the day.

Most Americans automatically think of Winston Churchill and Margaret Thatcher when conversation turns to the Anglo-American alliance, and Britain's Conservative Party is traditionally viewed in Washington as the U.K. home of the special relationship. Tony Blair, a steadfast support for America since 9/11, is acknowledged as an exception to the rule, a pro-American leader of a traditionally America-skeptic Labour Party.

There are, however, growing doubts among American policy makers that the resurgent Conservative Party led by David Cameron remains fully committed to the special relationship. There is now discussion in the White House, State Department and Pentagon of the possibility of dealing with a future Conservative-led British government that seeks to distance itself from the U.S. But the issue is also of concern on Capitol Hill -- among Republicans and Democrats. The notion that the special relationship could be heading for the rocks is no longer a fantasy, but a distinct political reality.

Shadow Foreign Secretary William Hague's Jan. 31 speech to the Royal Institute of International Affairs -- Chatham House -- spoke of a "solid but not slavish" alliance, and called for "the effective management of the relationship with the United States of America." These controversial words caused significant political damage here. It echoed Mr. Cameron's "liberal conservative" speech given on the fifth anniversary of 9/11, where he spoke of the need for "humility and patience" in conducting foreign policy.

Mr. Hague's carefully chosen description of America's and Britain's "loss of moral authority," and the need for Britain to shift more political weight to "the relationships of the Asia-Pacific region," is viewed in Washington as a fundamental reassessment of the special relationship, with far-reaching implications for both the U.S. and the U.K.

What was missing from the speech was any display of solidarity with the U.S. when thousands of British soldiers are fighting alongside their American counterparts in Iraq and Afghanistan, a stunning omission at a time of war. British forces have played an extraordinarily successful role in maintaining security in the southern third of Iraq in the face of Iranian interference and extreme provocation from Shia militias. In Afghanistan, British forces have been in the vanguard of NATO operations to defeat the Taliban and al Qaeda in the south of the country.

Perhaps the greatest benefit that Britain derives from the special relationship, and Tony Blair's close tie to George W. Bush, is the almost invisible security embrace, and close intelligence cooperation, that Washington gives only to its closest ally. U.S. intelligence, after all, helped thwart a series of large-scale al Qaeda attacks on British targets, including Heathrow Airport and Canary Wharf, which had been planned by 9/11 architect Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. Standing shoulder to shoulder with the U.S. may not be the most popular policy in Britain, with few votes to be gained, but it is fundamentally in Britain's interest.

The special relationship is a two-way street that significantly enhances Britain's ability to act as a major player on the world stage. For London, any downgrading of the Anglo-American alliance would significantly harm British strategic interests, and result in the loosening of defense and intelligence ties, the further loss of national sovereignty within the European Union, the diminution of British global power, and a weakening of the two nations' close-knit financial, trade and investment relationships.

Unfortunately, in its public statements the Conservative Party's leadership appears increasingly to be following the rise of anti-Americanism in the polls, rather than leading public opinion. There is a very real danger the Conservatives will make the same mistake that Gerhard Schröder did in the 2002 German elections, exploiting widespread anti-U.S. sentiment for short-term political gain. The consequences for U.S.-German relations were disastrous, with a virtual "cold war" between Washington and Berlin until Mr. Schröder's exit in 2005.

If the Conservatives take office in 2009 or 2010, the relationship between the White House and Downing Street could well be a tense one whether the Republicans or Democrats are in power, with a great deal of bad blood generated in advance. Despite President Bush's departure in January 2009, the fundamentals of U.S. foreign policy and America's approach to winning the war on terror are unlikely to dramatically change. Both sides of the political spectrum in Washington would balk at the kind of negative language being used by British Conservative politicians with regard to the Anglo-American alliance.

It is not too late, though, for the Conservatives to adopt a more traditional and pragmatic foreign-policy position, one that recognizes the huge stakes involved in maintaining the alliance. British and American leaders should advance a strongly pro-Atlanticist agenda that emphasizes Anglo-American global leadership.

The U.S. and Britain are committed to many of the same values and ideals on the world stage: the defense of national sovereignty, the projection of military power to confront tyranny and threats to international security, the advancement of free trade, and the protection of human rights.

With the threat of a nuclear-armed Iran just two to three years away, and the continuing war against al Qaeda raging across the globe, it is vital that Britain and America stand together.The future of the free world depends on it.

Messrs. Holmes and Gardiner are, respectively, vice president for foreign policy and director of the Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom, at the Heritage Foundation.

Blogger On Ice (WP)

THE BUSH administration has tolerated Egypt's brutal crackdown on domestic dissent and the broader reversal of its democratic spring of 2005 in part because President Hosni Mubarak argues that his adversaries are dangerous Islamic extremists. It's true that the largest opposition movement in Egypt is the Muslim Brotherhood; how dangerous it is can be debated. But what is overlooked is that Mr. Mubarak reserves his most relentless repression not for the Islamists -- who hold a fifth of the seats in parliament -- but for the secular democrats who fight for free elections, a free press, rights for women and religious tolerance.

The latest case in point is a blogger named Abdel Kareem Nabil Soliman, who was sentenced to four years in prison last week on charges of religious incitement, disrupting public order and "insulting the president." A brave and provocative 22-year-old student, Mr. Soliman first achieved notice with postings that denounced riots in Alexandria directed at Egypt's Christian Copt minority. He said the brutality he witnessed was the result of extremist Islamic teachings, in part by his own university, Al-Azhar, which he called "the other face of al-Qaeda." He compared the prophet Muhammad to Israel's Ariel Sharon. And he said Mr. Mubarak was a "symbol of tyranny."

Setting aside the hyperbole, there was considerable truth in many of the blogger's charges. Right or wrong, he certainly would seem to deserve the same freedom of speech as Egypt's government-owned newspapers, which regularly publish vile anti-Semitic screeds. But Mr. Soliman was one of several Egyptian bloggers arrested last year. While others were released after being beaten -- and in one case, raped -- by police, Mr. Soliman was brought to trial by Mr. Mubarak's prosecutors in what seemed a clear attempt to freeze what had been a growing space for free expression.

"This verdict sets a legal precedent for prosecuting someone for what they write on the Internet, on charges that are not easily defined or defended against," wrote another Egyptian blogger known as Sandmonkey. "This could be used to prosecute any blogger the government feels like punishing and serves as a huge blow to freedom of speech in Egypt."

As a political prisoner, Mr. Soliman will join Ayman Nour, who was sentenced a year ago on fabricated charges after he ran for president against Mr. Mubarak on a liberal democratic platform. As many as 800 members of the Muslim Brotherhood have also been jailed in the past year. This by a government that continues to be one of the largest recipients in the world of U.S. aid, collecting more than $2 billion a year. What do American subsidies support? Not least, the elimination of what would otherwise be the strongest secular democratic movement in the Arab Middle East.

Suit demands details on secret court's wiretap ruling; Group seeks to learn if program requires individual warrants

Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

Wednesday, February 28, 2007

A privacy rights group sued the Justice Department on Tuesday to try to pry loose a ruling by a secret court that the Bush administration says approved its clandestine wiretapping program.

The suit, if it succeeds, should answer an important question about the future of the program: whether the court will require individual warrants, with specific evidence, before allowing the government to intercept phone calls and e-mails between Americans and alleged terrorists in foreign countries.

In December 2005, President Bush confirmed a New York Times report that he had authorized the National Security Agency four years earlier to eavesdrop on such communications without obtaining warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as required by a 1978 law.

A federal judge in Detroit declared the program unconstitutional in August, a ruling the administration has appealed. In San Francisco, another judge is considering more than 40 lawsuits accusing telecommunications companies of illegally collaborating with the program by allowing the National Security Agency to intercept messages and examine customer records.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco organization that represents AT&T customers in one of the lawsuits, sued Tuesday in Washington, D.C., seeking disclosure of a pivotal Jan. 10 ruling by a judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

The ruling's existence was disclosed Jan. 17 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who told the Senate Judiciary Committee that the judge had approved the surveillance, after lengthy negotiations, and that the program was now operating under authority of the foreign intelligence court.

Gonzales did not say, however, whether the judge was requiring a warrant in each case or instead had given overall approval to the program. The attorney general has refused to make the order public, although the Justice Department sent copies to the federal judge in San Francisco and the appeals court reviewing the Detroit ruling.

The department also disclosed the order to selected members of Congress, including leaders of the House and Senate judiciary committees. Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said Leahy would like to see a declassified version made public and is exploring the subject with the Justice Department and the White House.

In Tuesday's lawsuit, the Electronic Frontier Foundation argued that the public was entitled to learn details of the order under the Freedom of Information Act.

"While national security and law enforcement demand a limited amount of secrecy, Americans have the right to know the government's basic guidelines for this kind of invasive electronic surveillance of their personal communications," said David Sobel, a lawyer for the organization.

By random draw, the case was assigned to U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who resigned from the foreign intelligence court after the December 2005 disclosure that the administration had been conducting surveillance without court review.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said he couldn't comment on the suit, but noted that orders of the foreign intelligence court have historically been classified. The Jan. 10 order "contains very sensitive information, including sources and methods" of intelligence, Boyd said.

But Sobel said federal law prohibits agencies from keeping entire documents secret if parts of them could be released safely. Whether the foreign intelligence court will require wiretaps for each surveillance is "the kind of question that could be answered without compromising any national security interest," he said.

Wrongly convicted say FBI was at fault; Compensation urged in closing arguments

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

Lawyers for four men wrongly convicted of a 1965 gangland slaying argued yesterday that the FBI was squarely to blame for withholding critical evidence during their trial and urged a federal judge to order the government to compensate them for the decades they spent in prison.

"It was more important for the FBI to protect their informants than to protect innocent people who had families," said Victor Garo, one of the lawyers, during closing arguments in a civil suit seeking more than $100 million in damages from the government on behalf of Joseph Salvati, Peter J. Limone, Henry Tameleo, Louis Greco, and their families. "Shame on our government for doing that."

The discovery of secret FBI files that were never turned over during the men's 1968 trial prompted a state judge six years ago to overturn the murder convictions of Limone, who had served 33 years in prison, and Salvati, who was paroled in 1997 after serving 30 years. Exoneration came too late for Greco, who died in prison in 1995 at age 78, and for Tameleo, who died a decade earlier at age 84.

Yesterday, a Justice Department lawyer argued that the FBI had no duty to share internal documents with state prosecutors and insisted the state was responsible for convicting the men in the slaying of Edward "Teddy" Deegan in Chelsea.

"The United States is not liable to plaintiffs because they were convicted as a result of a state prosecution," Bridget Bailey Lipscomb said. "The FBI did not initiate this prosecution, and there is no duty of the FBI to submit to state or local governments any of its internal files."

She said the FBI had shared some information about Deegan's death with local police.

Three members of Congress who were involved in a two-year investigation of the FBI's mishandling of informants and had condemned the government's handling of the Deegan case were in court yesterday for final arguments, including Dan Burton, an Indiana Republican who spearheaded the probe and formerly chaired the House Committee on Government Reform. Also present were William D. Delahunt, a Quincy Democrat, and Stephen F. Lynch, a South Boston Democrat.

Burton said he believes that all four men were wrongly convicted. "We want to make sure justice is served," he said.

US District Judge Nancy Gertner said she expects to rule by late March or early April on whether the government is liable and, if so, how much it should pay.

The judge challenged Lipscomb's effort to distance the federal government from the state prosecution, saying that state authorities had been unable to solve Deegan's slaying until FBI agents recruited hit man Joseph "The Animal" Barboza as a witness against local Mafia leaders and turned him over to state authorities.

Lipscomb said that the FBI was focusing on Barboza's testimony against Raymond L.S. Patriarca, then the New England Mafia boss, in a federal murder conspiracy case and that there was no evidence they "were even paying attention" to the Deegan case.

Lawyers for Salvati, Limone, Greco, and Tameleo ridiculed the government's assertion, saying that now-retired FBI agent Dennis Condon and his late partner, H. Paul Rico, were aware of internal FBI documents that indicated that Barboza had falsely implicated the four men, yet Condon took the stand during the 1968 trial to vouch for Barboza's credibility.

The FBI didn't disclose that agents listening in on an illegal bug had overheard Barboza and another Boston gangster and FBI informant, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi, seeking Patriarca's permission to kill Deegan several days before the March 12, 1965 slaying.

Juliane Balliro, a lawyer for the Limones and the Tameleos, accused Rico and Condon of engaging in "criminal, dishonest, and disgraceful conduct."

Michael Avery, a lawyer who also represents the Limones and the Tameleos, called the government's arguments frivolous.

"They were aware of [Barboza's] perjury, and they delivered him to the state knowing full well what he was going to do," he said.

On his way out of the courthouse, Salvati, 74, of the North End, said: "We waited 42 years, and we're still waiting. But we had our day in court. . . . Now we just rely on the judge."

Lawyer: FBI let innocents rot

Associated Press

BOSTON - The FBI considered the lives of four men who spent decades in prison for a murder they didn't commit "acceptable collateral damage" in the fight against organized crime, an attorney for the men's families said yesterday.

Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison after being convicted in the 1965 gangland killing of Edward "Teddy" Deegan are suing the federal government for malicious prosecution.

In closing arguments yesterday, attorney Michael Avery said Boston agents had known that FBI informant Joseph "The Animal" Barboza lied when he named the four men as Deegan's killers. Barboza wanted to protect a fellow FBI snitch, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi, who was involved in Deegan's killing, Avery said.

The men were "acceptable collateral damage" in the FBI's priority at the time - taking down the Mafia through the use of criminal informants, Avery said.

The government has argued that federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Limone, Salvati, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco. Justice Department lawyer Bridge Bailey Lipscomb said yesterday that federal authorities cannot be held responsible for the results of a state prosecution.

Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after FBI memos surfaced.

The memos were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

Judge: US can deny federal funding to AIDS groups that don't disavow sex trafficking

LARA JAKES JORDAN

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_A federal appeals court ruled that the Bush administration can deny funding to nonprofit AIDS groups that do not publicly disavow prostitution and sex trafficking.

Overturning a lower court's decision, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia said Tuesday that the AIDS groups' free speech rights would not be violated if the money was linked to a pledge to uphold government policy.

At issue is the case of DKT International Inc., which provides family planning and HIV/AIDS prevention programs in 11 countries. The group, which helps distribute condoms to prostitutes and other sex workers in Vietnam, has refused to sign a pledge to support the Bush administration policies.

In 2005, DKT sued the U.S. Agency for International Development, contending its free speech rights were violated by a 2003 law requiring groups to explicitly oppose prostitution and sex trafficking in order to qualify for part of a $15 billion (euro11.34 billion) AIDS program. A U.S. District Court ruling last year agreed, saying the funding conditions insist that groups "parrot" the U.S. government's position on prostitution.

But U.S. Circuit Judge A. Raymond Randolph said Congress has authorized the Bush administration to assist non-governmental organizations like DKT "on such terms and conditions as the president may determine."

"The act does not compel DKT to advocate the government's position on prostitution and sex trafficking; it requires only that if DKT wishes to receive funds it must communicate the message the government chooses to fund," Randolph wrote in a 10-page decision reversing the lower court's ruling. "This does not violate the First Amendment."

Calls for comment to DKT's offices in Washington were not immediately returned Tuesday.

Guantanamo detainees look to Supreme Court for quick ruling on their legal rights

MARK SHERMAN

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_Foreigners imprisoned at a U.S. Navy base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, want the U.S . Supreme Court to rule quickly on their legal rights, before the justices go off on their summer break.

Lawyers for two men who face military trials as early as this summer asked the court Tuesday to hear their cases on a rare fast track. Their request was even more unusual because a federal appeals court has yet to rule whether Omar Khadr and Salim Ahmed Hamdan can be tried by a military tribunal or whether they even have the right to mount their challenge in U.S. courts.

Khadr is a Canadian accused of killing a U.S. soldier in Afghanistan and Hamdan is a Yemeni accused of supporting al-Qaida operatives. The Supreme Court last year voided Bush administration plans to try Hamdan before a military commission, but a new law restored those plans and stripped detainees of their right to seek their freedom through the courts.

Other detainees plan to file their appeals with the court by Monday, requesting expedited review of the same law, the Military Commissions Act, which limits their ability to challenge their confinement.

Last week, a panel of federal appeals judges ruled, 2-1, that the nearly 400 detainees still at Guantanamo are prohibited from using the U.S. court system.

The court should consider the cases together and quickly, said a team of lawyers led by Neal Katyal, who argued Hamdan's case before the Supreme Court. Doing so would allow the justices to rule, in one decision, on the legality of the jurisdiction-stripping provisions of the military commissions law both for detainees facing military trials and those who have not been charged but are being held indefinitely as "enemy combatants," the lawyers argued.

The last time the court acted so promptly was in a 1997 case on the line-item veto in which the justices held a special argument session and rendered a decision by late June.

Watch list dispute highlights U.S.-Canadian tensions

By Shane Harris, National Journal

The U.S. government believes that Maher Arar, a Canadian telecommunications engineer, has ties to terrorists, and it has placed his name on a U.S. watch list that bars him from entering the country.

That alone would be unremarkable because U.S. watch lists contain thousands of names -- except that the Canadian government, after a highly publicized inquiry last year, concluded that there is no basis for believing that Arar is connected to Islamic radicals. The inquiry also determined that, based on all of the evidence collected by Canadian officials, there is nothing to indicate that Arar committed a crime or that he poses a threat.

This U.S.-Canada dispute, in and of itself, might also be unremarkable, except that in September 2002, U.S. officials detained Arar at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York and then sent him to Syria, the country of his birth, after receiving intelligence from the Canadians that indicated Arar was connected to terrorism.

Arar says, and the Ottawa inquiry confirmed, that he was interrogated in Syria for almost a year and tortured. In October 2003, Arar was returned to Canada, where he has become a cause celebre and a potent symbol for critics of the Bush administration's practice of sending suspected terrorists to third countries that employ torture.

Now, U.S. and Canadian officials find themselves in a standoff over whether Arar remains a threat and should be on the watch list. The dispute has shone a light on the deeply rooted suspicions each country has of the other when it comes to the gray and secretive world of intelligence.

Despite having a wealth of potential terrorist targets, Canada has no foreign-intelligence service; information about outside threats comes from other governments. Indeed, the tips that first led Canadian officials to suspect that Arar had terrorist connections came from Syria.

The Canadian inquiry found that Ottawa's handling of his case was deeply flawed and was based on false information. The Canadian government has agreed to pay Arar nearly $10 million in compensation and has asked that the Americans clear his name. The Bush administration has refused.

Current and former U.S. national security officials said that the United States and Canada have maintained good political relations but that American intelligence officials don't consider Canada an especially strong partner in the war on terrorism because the country doesn't gather its own foreign intelligence.

The Arar inquiry, which focused on internal Canadian law enforcement processes, hasn't changed U.S. opinions.

"They didn't have the ability to look at [Arar's] past activities," said Christopher Sands, a senior associate with the Canada Project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. One source from which the Canadians could have received that information, the United States, wouldn't cooperate with the inquiry.

The Arar dispute is now straining political relations. Last month, Canadian Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day visited Washington and met with his counterpart, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

In that and subsequent meetings among lower-level officials, the United States showed Canada the information it has that keeps Arar on the watch list. In a letter to Day, Chertoff and Gonzales wrote that the information was developed independently of what the Canadians used to conclude that Arar was innocent.

The Canadians remain unmoved by the U.S. claims; the Americans won't take Canada's conclusions as definitive. Hence, the stalemate.

"We're both playing to our type," Sands said. "Canadian nationalism ... from the very beginning has had this sense of superiority to the Americans. The Americans were richer and had more toys, but in the end the Canadians were smarter."

Meanwhile, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., is investigating what information prompted the United States to send Arar to Syria and says that Gonzales and Justice officials have repeatedly stonewalled him in that effort. Maria LaHood, Arar's attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York City, said that keeping her client on a list of suspected terrorists adds "insult to injury."

But a U.S. government counter-terrorism official, who requested anonymity because the Arar matter has become a political issue, said the feud over Arar's guilt or innocence stems from that uneven intelligence relationship.

The Canadians "continue to view this case, and the information they have about this case, in a rather open-and-shut manner, meaning they have assessed what they have and made a decision, and they seem rooted in that decision, which is certainly their prerogative." But the official added, "We have our own information, as well."

U.S. joins false claims suit against drug company

The U.S. has intervened in a whistleblower suit originally filed almost ten years ago by a Florida home infusion company against an Ohio-based pharmaceutical manufacturer, alleging violations of the False Claims Act (FCA), the Department of Justice announced on January 29, 2007. The government's complaint alleges that Boehringer Ingelheim Roxane, Inc. (Roxane) engaged in a scheme to report fraudulent and inflated prices for several pharmaceutical products, knowing that federal health care programs established reimbursement rates based on those reported prices.

Price inflation. According to the government's complaint, Roxane artificially inflated spreads to market, promote, and sell generic drugs that are reimbursed by Medicare and Medicaid. The "spread" is the difference between the government reimbursement rate and the actual price paid by health care providers for a drug. Accordingly, the larger the spread on a drug, the larger the profit for the provider.

The government's complaint alleges that from at least on or before January 1, 1996, Roxane reported prices that, in some instances, exceeded 1,000 percent of the actual sales prices on some of the drugs it manufactures. The U.S. alleges that Medicare and Medicaid have reimbursed Roxane's customers more than $500 million for the drugs that are the subject of the complaint.

Possible money judgment. Under the FCA, if it is determined that Roxane submitted or caused others to submit false or fraudulent claims to the federal health care programs, the government can recover treble damages plus statutory penalties of $5,500 to $11,000 for each false or fraudulent claim filed. In addition, if the government is successful in litigating its claims, the whistleblower who initiated the action can receive between 15 and 25 percent of the amount recovered.

Federal bidders find protests often succeed

KIM HART and RENAE MERLE, THE WASHINGTON POST

After losing a competition last year to build helicopters for the Air Force, Lockheed Martin and Sikorsky Aircraft did what hundreds of companies do when lucrative contracts don't go their way.

They protested the decision. And this week, they won.

The Government Accountability Office ruled the Air Force was "inconsistent" when judging the competition and said the losing bidders should be allowed to vie for the work again.

Lockheed Martin and Sikorsky thus became the latest companies to prevail in appeals, a strategy that is paying off for government contractors.

Contractors filed 1,327 protests with the GAO in 2006 and the number of firms taking their cases to court has risen 50 percent. Companies' chances of winning such appeals have doubled, to nearly 30 percent.

As the government outsources work to private companies, experts say the rise in successful protests, while not huge, suggests problems with the procurement process. Many agencies have lost workers trained to evaluate contracts through retirement, creating more opportunities for mistakes and appeals. Even when they are not successful, protests can double or triple the time it takes to hire companies, delaying crucial work.

The battle over who should build 141 Air Force search-and-rescue helicopters will set back a contract awarded to Boeing three months ago. The criteria the Air Force used to judge the competitors did not match the provisions in the solicitation, the GAO said. If Boeing does not emerge as the top choice, the company's contract should be terminated, the decision says.

If the Air Force follows the GAO's recommendation and reopens the competition, as is customary, Boeing can file a protest of its own or take the case to the U.S. Court of Federal Claims.

The initial contract is worth $712 million, but the program's budget would grow to as much as $15 billion as the winner begins building aircraft, a significant loss for Boeing if it loses the deal.

Similar bid protests have delayed dozens of contracts for months, even years. Experts say the trend is largely driven by the government's effort to consolidate smaller deals into mega-contracts. Losing a contract could mean missing out on nearly a decade of work and billions of dollars.

"Many of these procurements have become must-win situations for companies to survive," said Ray Bjorklund, senior vice president of Federal Sources, a consulting firm. "There's more at stake, so they're willing to take more risks to ensure they stay viable."

Contractor protests

Here is the number of successful protests by contractors:

2002: 193 (16 percent of 1,204 filed)

2003: 230

2004: 312

2005: 312

2006: 385 (29 percent of 1,327 filed)

Government Contractors Must Take Early Compliance Steps

Ronald Schechter, Martha Cochran and Jill Newell

As spending on federal contracting reached record levels in recent years -- a reported $400 billion in 2005 alone -- the risks, as well as the rewards, of doing business with the federal government have never been greater.

The U.S. government has vowed to crack down on procurement fraud and other fraud in government programs. Last year's $3.1 billion in settlements and judgments in cases involving fraud against the government was the largest amount ever recovered in a single year. It included $615 million paid by the Boeing Co. to resolve claims relating to its use of confidential competitor information and the hiring of a former Air Force acquisition chief who had responsibility for its contracts; it also included numerous other cases involving defense procurement fraud, health-care fraud and other fraud against the government.

Last fall, the Justice Department launched a National Procurement Fraud Task Force to focus "resources at all levels of government to increase criminal enforcement" in areas of procurement fraud. The stepped-up attention to this area throughout the government may signal that the $3.1 billion record in federal fraud recoveries in 2006 could soon be broken. More than 50 inspectors general from across all government departments and agencies also are actively pursuing thousands of investigations.

In addition, powerful newly installed Democratic committee and subcommittee chairs in Congress are launching dozens of oversight investigations of alleged government and contractor abuses, focusing on the reconstruction effort in Iraq and in the U.S. Gulf Coast following Hurricane Katrina, numerous areas of military and homeland-security procurement, the pricing of pharmaceuticals and other significant areas of federal contracting. For instance, House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., in the first week of February began one set of hearings on alleged waste, fraud and abuse by government contractors in Iraq and another set of hearings on alleged overcharging by drug companies in federal health programs.

BROAD SWEEP

Contractors long have known that the government has a broad range of investigative and enforcement powers that can turn what would be a normal business dispute in a private commercial transaction into allegations of civil or criminal fraud, leading to massive fines and penalties, as well as disqualification from receiving new government contracts. Given the broad sweep of the government's investigative powers and the complexity of procurement rules, companies that are wholly innocent of an intent to fleece the feds may nonetheless find themselves under scrutiny. What is striking about the current environment is the scope and intensity of federal investigative and prosecutorial resources directed at this activity.

The added factor of a Democratic Congress -- with new committee chairs, frustrated in the past by what they viewed as their Republican colleagues' lack of effective oversight of the Bush administration and its perceived coziness with contractors, and eager to use their newly acquired oversight and subpoena powers -- raises the stakes enormously. While no target of a government investigation can be comfortable or secure when dealing with an inspector general, the FBI or other government investigators, managing these investigations while under the spotlight of a high-profile congressional investigation can be even more daunting.

The procurement fraud initiative, created by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, was modeled after his 2005 Procurement Fraud Working Group, begun when he served as the U.S. Attorney General for the Eastern District of Virginia and led the prosecution of former Air Force acquisition chief Darleen Druyun and Boeing for contract favoritism in exchange for job offers. The current initiative focuses on virtually all areas of alleged procurement fraud, from pricing irregularities and labor mischarging, to misuse of classified and procurement sensitive information, and ethics and conflict-of-interest violations.

Participants in the task force reflect the significant firepower of federal government investigatory and enforcement agencies. Chaired by Alice Fisher, the head of Justice's Criminal Division, the task force includes the FBI, the inspectors general of major federal agencies -- from the Departments of Defense, Homeland Security and Veterans Affairs, to the General Services Administration and the U.S. Postal Service -- as well as the Defense Criminal Investigative Service and other military criminal investigative organizations.

Perhaps to emphasize the seriousness of the effort, the Justice Department, on the day it announced the creation of the task force, also announced that Oracle Corp. had agreed to pay almost $100 million to settle False Claims Act allegations that a company it acquired had overcharged the government under its GSA Federal Supply Schedule Contract. The task force more recently announced a criminal case in which a former Defense Department contractor was sentenced to serve nine years in prison and ordered to pay a $3.6 million fine for his role in a bribery and fraud scheme flowing from contracts for the reconstruction of Iraq.

Beyond the work of the task force, the Justice Department has pursued numerous False Claims Act cases against pharmaceutical companies alleging mischarging under government drug contracts and benefit programs. Health-care fraud accounted for $2.2 billion in settlements and judgments recovered by the federal government last year -- a $1 billion increase over the prior year.

Agency inspectors general have become more powerful weapons in the government's procurement fraud arsenal in the almost 30 years since the enactment of the Inspector General Act of 1978. According to one report, more than 11,000 auditors, investigators and other professionals populate 57 Offices of Inspectors General throughout the federal government.

Inspector general investigations always present the risk that the matter under investigation will be referred to the Justice Department for criminal or civil prosecution. Each year, inspector general investigations lead to thousands of criminal indictments and successful prosecutions, as well as numerous Justice Department civil fraud claims, with fines and penalties totaling billions of dollars. The recent joining of forces of federal inspectors general with Justice in the Procurement Fraud Task Force signals that the level of inspector general referrals to Justice will only increase.

Moreover, because each inspector general reports semiannually to Congress, the reports have become a rich source for congressional inquiries and will continue to serve as such in the new Congress. For example, last year Congress extended the term of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction until at least late 2008. By the end of 2006, the SIGIR had issued more than 125 audit and project assessment reports, many of them highly critical of contractor performance. In testimony before Congress in September 2006, the SIGIR said 89 criminal investigation cases were open and 25 cases had been referred to the Justice Department, four of which had resulted in convictions.

In another area that has received significant attention lately, the Homeland Security Department's Inspector General for Gulf Coast Hurricane Recovery has issued more than 40 reports, many of which deal with the Federal Emergency Management Agency's procurement activity. Several of these audits, as well as other government reports, address the failure and fraudulent actions of contractors responding to the Katrina recovery. The inspector general's Sept. 30, 2006, report to Congress reported 439 indictments related to Katrina and 255 convictions for hurricane-related allegations and crimes.

Although the Republican-led Congress held numerous oversight hearings on some of the same issues now targeted by Democrats, the pace is quickening in the new Congress. Oversight investigations into contractor waste, fraud and abuse have already begun; initial hearings have been launched, and more are on the way. Two major congressional oversight committees -- the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform (which added the word "oversight" to its title in January) and the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs -- each took the step of adopting rules authorizing staff deposition authority, giving their large and growing staffs the ability to take testimony on the record and under oath outside the context of a formal congressional hearing. Although the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee's agenda is the broadest of any congressional committee, other House committees, such as Armed Services and Energy and Commerce, also have begun oversight hearings.

Waxman also announced plans to reintroduce legislation he called the Clean Contracting Act to assist in curbing contract abuse. Bills relating to contracting for homeland security, Iraq and private security services already have been introduced in the House. In the Senate, Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has introduced a bill called the War

Profiteering Prevention Act of 2007, which would criminalize war profiteering acts, defined as "materially overvaluing any good or service with the specific intent to excessively profit from war and relief or reconstruction activities."

TAKE THE STEPS NOW

With all of this attention, contractors cannot afford to wait for a call from the Justice Department task force, an inspector general or Congress to take action. Companies must take steps now to prevent and detect improper procurement activity and potential fraud in government programs, to mitigate the damage if any such activity is found and to develop strategies to respond to government inquiries should they arise.

To begin, every contractor must have in place an effective compliance program that includes standards of conduct, as well as mechanisms for investigating potential violations and for taking prompt and appropriate remedial steps if violations are found. Contractors should conduct self-audits in areas of government business that the company believes may be considered high risk. If any information surfaces that suggests an employee or the company has committed wrongdoing, a contractor must thoroughly investigate the event and take appropriate action. The company's goals should be to understand the circumstances surrounding any alleged wrongdoing and to maintain the initiative during any government investigation.

A company must be prepared to respond promptly to inquiries from government investigators regarding its performance of government contracts. Most government contractors understand that Justice and agency inspectors general have far-reaching investigative authority and expect contractors to cooperate with their inquiries.

It is essential that, at the earliest stages of the investigation, the contractor develop an overall response strategy. That strategy will be guided by the contractor's assessment of its vulnerability on the issues being investigated. In some instances, it may make sense to seek a prompt, amicable resolution; in others, it may be better to seek an aggressive defense on the merits.

Counsel, in particular, should focus on key objectives during an investigation: maintaining contact with the investigators; gaining a thorough understanding of all of the facts and the government's key concerns; and presenting the facts in the best light for the company. Counsel should work cooperatively with government investigators, while ensuring that the client's rights are being protected and that its position is being vigorously represented. Counsel should insist that the company be permitted a chance to present its side of the story, as well as to understand the bases for the government's claims, before the government takes formal action. In most instances, Justice Department lawyers and inspectors general staff will agree to this type of exchange.

THE COMMITTEES

Of course, managing these investigations becomes much more complex when a congressional oversight committee takes an interest. Congressional committees have the power to conduct oversight investigations into any matter within their jurisdictions. They have the power to subpoena the testimony of witnesses and virtually all documents that may be relevant to the subject matter of their inquiries. An ongoing criminal or civil investigation generally will not convince a congressional committee to back off of an oversight investigation -- or even to delay issuing a subpoena for the testimony of an individual who is the target of a federal criminal investigation.

In these circumstances, counsel is faced with a delicate balancing act, requiring careful communication with each of the investigative bodies to ensure that the contractor's rights are protected. And in these circumstances, despite the very public nature of a congressional investigation, the overriding concern of counsel must be to assure that the individual's or organization's conduct in the investigation and the witnesses' testimony in a congressional hearing do not adversely impact ongoing criminal or civil investigations by other bodies or lead to further criminal exposure.

Essay: A Federal Appeals Court Upholds the Jurisdiction-Stripping Provisions of the MilitaryCommissions Act of 2006, But Overlooks the Possibility of an Evolving Conception of Habeas Corpus

By MICHAEL C. DORF

Last week, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit dismissed the habeas corpus petitions of aliens detained at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base. The court in Boumediene v. Bush unanimously found that the Military Commissions Act (MCA) of 2006 eliminated federal court jurisdiction to entertain habeas petitions or other federal lawsuits for such detainees. By a 2-1 vote, the panel also held that Congress had not violated the Constitution in eliminating habeas for Guantanamo Bay detainees.

Now the case will undoubtedly go to the Supreme Court. Again. The Justices have already issued two landmark rulings regarding the treatment of foreign detainees.

In the 2004 case of Rasul v. Bush, the Court held that the habeas corpus statute, as it then stood, permitted an alien held at Guantanamo Bay to sue in a federal district court, because the statute, as construed by the Court, only required that there be jurisdiction over the custodian holding the detainee, which there undoubtedly was.

Congress responded by passing the Detainee Treatment Act (DTA) of 2005, which appeared to strip the federal courts of the jurisdiction the Rasul Court had found to exist. But last year, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, the Justices said that the DTA did not apply to pending cases, only to future filings. Then, on the merits, the Hamdan Court found that the procedures the Bush Administration had adopted for the detention and trial of enemy combatants violated the Geneva Conventions, which were made enforceable via the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

By deciding the jurisdictional issue in Rasul and Hamdan on statutory grounds, the Supreme Court managed to duck a hard constitutional question: What is the scope of Congress's power to adjust the habeas jurisdiction of the federal courts without formally suspending the privilege of the writ under Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution?

The Constitution states: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." But what exactly is the scope of the writ that shall not be suspended?

In last week's D.C. Circuit ruling, Judge A. Raymond Randolph gave the following answer for the majority: The Constitution requires that habeas corpus (or its equivalent) must be available in only those circumstances in which it was available when the Constitution was ratified in 1789. The court decided that, at the Founding, habeas was not available for aliens who were neither present in, nor the owners of property in, the country. Thus, it concluded that the MCA worked no constitutional violation.

That conclusion is not obviously wrong, although it was vigorously contested by Judge Judith Rogers in dissent. The scope of Congressional power over habeas corpus is quite unclear. But here, as in many other areas, ambiguity does not warrant an interpretive method that gives controlling weight to the original understanding: There is no reason to assume that the Constitution's meaning was frozen in 1789.

Column continues below ↓

The Statutory Non-Issue

Lawyers for the detainees in Boumediene gamely argued that, contrary to what was obvious to everyone who observed the debate over the MCA, the Act was not meant to eliminate habeas corpus jurisdiction for their clients. Citing the Supreme Court's decision in the 2001 case of INSv. St. Cyr, they noted that a clear statement by Congress is required to eliminate habeas jurisdiction. The relevant provision of the MCA, they contended, does not mention habeas, and thus is not a sufficiently clear statement.

However, as Judge Randolph noted, the intended effect of the MCA on this point is impossible to mistake. The statute says that the "amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act, and shall apply to all cases, without exception, pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act which relate to any aspect of the detention, transfer, treatment, trial, or conditions of detention of an alien detained by the United States since September 11, 2001." It's true that this provision itself does not use the word "habeas," but it's equally true that the "amendment made by subsection (a)" is an amendment that reads as follows: "No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the United States who has been determined by the United States to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant or is awaiting such determination."

Accordingly, the DC Circuit was right to reject the statutory argument, and the Supreme Court will not be able to duck the constitutional question a third time by relying on statutory grounds for its decision.

The Scope of the Writ in 1789

The real bone of contention in Boumediene concerned the question whether Congress had violated the Suspension Clause by eliminating habeas for foreign detainees without first finding that because of a "rebellion or invasion," the suspension of habeas was required by "the public safety."

If the Guantanamo petitioners are not among the people who have a right to habeas, then Congress did not need to suspend habeas in order to deny it to them. Thus, the disagreement in Boumediene centered around the scope of the constitutional right to habeas, in circumstances where it has not been suspended: Does that right apply to persons in situations like those foreign detainees occupy today?

To answer that question, the D.C. Circuit investigated the scope of habeas corpus as it existed when the Constitution was adopted. Both the majority and dissent accepted British precedents--which would have been well-known to the Framers--as highly relevant.

The crucial point for the majority was that English courts had never granted a writ of habeas corpus for an alien detained outside the territory of the crown. Concluding that the de facto control that the United States exercises over Guantanamo does not rise to the level of sovereignty, the majority determined that the present petitions go beyond the historic office of the writ as it was conceived in 1789.

Even on its own terms, this argument has difficulties. As Judge Rogers noted in her dissent, absence of evidence is not necessarily evidence of absence: Just as the detainees' lawyers could point to no case in which a British court granted a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of an alien held beyond British sovereign land, so the government had pointed to no case in which such a petition was made to a British court and denied on that basis.

Although the far-flung British Empire did imprison people around the globe, the state of communications and transportation in the Eighteenth Century may have prevented such detainees or their kin from finding legal counsel to represent them back in England. Accordingly, the absence of decisions granting habeas petitions of external aliens may simply reflect the absence of petitions seeking writs of habeas for such persons.

From the Eighteenth Century to the Twenty-First

The panel majority's historical argument also proves too much. Judge Randolph quoted a leading English treatise which states that even British subjects held in "remote islands, garrisons, and other places" could not file for habeas relief. Yet the majority of the panel itself acknowledged that, today, Congress could not authorize detention of a U.S. citizen abroad without access to habeas or its equivalent. So it appears that the scope of the writ is not fully defined by Eighteenth Century understandings, after all.

Indeed, as the Supreme Court explained as recently as 2001 in the St. Cyr case, "at the absolute minimum, the Suspension Clause protects the writ as it existed in 1789." (Emphasis added.) That language suggests that today the Suspension Clause protects more than it protected in 1789. Significantly, all five members of the St. Cyr majority--Justices Stevens, Kennedy, Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer--remain on the Court today. Thus, a majority of the Court appears to be open to the argument that the constitutionally mandated scope of the writ is greater now than in 1789.

Nor should that be surprising, for many constitutional provisions mean something different today from what they meant when they were was first adopted. Modern conceptions of free speech, equal protection, interstate commerce, and a host of other constitutional provisions reflect both changed circumstances and changed values. While the text and original understanding of the Constitution are almost always the starting point for analysis of the meaning of any constitutional provision, they are rarely the end point.

From a Territorial to a Functional Understanding of the Suspension Clause

Perhaps the distinction between U.S. (or British) territory and foreign territory once made sense as a means of parceling out the jurisdiction of Eighteenth Century courts, but given modern methods of transportation and communication, it makes little sense today. Accordingly, there is no good reason to limit the scope of habeas--absent its valid suspension--to persons held within the borders of the United States or its territories. Yet the Boumediene majority treats the scope of the writ in 1789 as reflecting the full modern understanding.

Those who favor reading the Constitution to mean exactly what it was generally understood to mean at its adoption frequently complain that, if judges depart from the original understanding, then they have no fixed standard by which to ascertain constitutional meaning. The charge, however, is doubly misleading.

First, as the disagreement in Boumediene itself illustrates, discerning guidance for modern controversies from Eighteenth Century sources that were contested even in their day, is hardly a determinate exercise that leads to a single incontrovertible result. Second, one can find functional guideposts for modern understandings that also effectively constrain conscientious judges' decisionmaking.

With respect to the Suspension Clause, we might begin with the core function of habeas--to prevent arbitrary deprivations of liberty--and the exigencies of warfare. Justice Kennedy zeroed in on these two factors in a separate opinion in the Rasul case. He wrote: "Perhaps, where detainees are taken from a zone of hostilities, detention without proceedings or trial would be justified by military necessity for a matter of weeks; but as the period of detention stretches from months to years, the case for continued detention to meet military exigencies becomes weaker."

To be sure, Justice Kennedy also thought it significant in Rasul that Guantanamo Bay was, in all relevant respects, part of the United States. And while that continues to be true for the Guantanamo Bay detainees, it is difficult to see why this particular fact should matter more generally. Suppose that the government were to move the Guantanamo Bay detainees to a U.S.-operated military prison on foreign land over which it exercised fewer of the incidents of sovereignty--a military base in eastern Europe or central Asia, say. From a practical perspective--and certainly from the perspective of the detainees--such formal matters would not make any readily perceptible difference. They would still be held by the United States at a place chosen solely by the United States.

What Substantive Rights Do Alien Detainees Have?

To say that alien detainees have a constitutional right to habeas does not mean that their detention is unlawful. It only means that the federal courts have jurisdiction to examine the lawfulness of their custody. Because she believed that there was jurisdiction over the case, Judge Rogers thought it necessary to address the further question of lawfulness.

On this question, Judge Rogers concluded that Congress, in approving "combatant status review tribunals" (CSRTs) in the MCA, had not provided an adequate substitute for habeas. Nor did she think that D.C. Circuit review of CSRT determinations--for which the DTA and MCA also provide--was a sufficient check on the power of the CSRTs, because judicial review is limited to legal questions, not factual ones.

As to the procedures used by CSRTs, Judge Rogers would have found them lacking for a variety of reasons, including the following: the detainee, rather than the government, bears the burden of proof; the government need not inform a detainee of the charges against him; there are strict limits on a detainee's ability to obtain and introduce rebuttal evidence; the detainee is not entitled to his own lawyer; and evidence obtained by torture is not categorically barred. Whether these limitations will prove decisive, should the Supreme Court address them, remains unclear. In the 2004 case of Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, the lead opinion by Justice O'Connor suggested that at least some such limitations would be permissible even in a proceeding to determine the combatant status of a citizen. The constitutional minimum cannot be any higher for a non-citizen.

Of course, CSRTs may well be unlawful because they violate the Geneva Conventions. But Congress has closed that door in the MCA by rendering unenforceable the rights conferred by the Geneva Conventions themselves.

Thus, the Suspension Clause appears to be the alpha and omega of limits on the procedures Congress may establish for holding those whom it deems to be alien unlawful enemy combatants. That provision is almost maddeningly ambiguous: It prohibits suspension of the privilege of the writ, but neither the clause itself, nor any other provision of the Constitution, states what scope the writ has absent suspension.

The constitutional scope of the writ absent suspension is a legitimately difficult question. Whatever answer the Supreme Court gives, one can hope, at a minimum, that it does not simply rely on precedents and materials from the Eighteenth Century.

Bush administration's faith-based initiatives at issue Wednesday in Supreme Court

PETE YOST

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_The White House is turning to the Supreme Court for help as the administration fights a challenge to its aggressive promotion of federal financial aid for religious charities.

Last year, a federal appeals court allowed a group of atheists to pursue a lawsuit alleging the Bush administration gives faith-based programs an inside track on federal grant programs.

Instead of going through Congress, Bush issued executive orders to create the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives and similar centers in 10 federal agencies during his first term.

One of the goals Bush set for these offices was to help religious and community groups compete for federal funding to fight poverty, substance abuse and other social problems.

This assistance is being challenged by Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc., a Wisconsin-based group of atheists and agnostics which characterizes the White House's initiative as a singling out of faith-based organizations to the exclusion of other organizations.

The issue before the justices is whether the atheists have the right _ called standing _ by virtue of their being taxpayers to bring their complaint in the federal court system.

The 7th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in Chicago sided with the anti-religion group, and the Justice Department wants the Supreme Court to overturn the lower court.

The appeals court ruling "would transform the doctrine of taxpayer standing into a roving license" on church-state issues, says the Justice Department solicitor general's office.

The case may turn on a 1968 Supreme Court decision that created an exception to the general prohibition on taxpayer challenges to the government spending of tax revenue. In an 8-1 decision by Chief Justice Earl Warren, the court allowed taxpayers to challenge congressional spending for private religious schools.

In the current case, the Bush administration organizes conferences where faith-based organizations are allegedly singled out as being particularly worthy of receiving federal money.

The administration says spending for speeches and meetings of executive branch officials does not involve spending federal money outside the government and therefore taxpayers are not entitled to challenge it.

Taxpayer standing is not restricted to grants outside the government, lawyers for the group of atheists argued.

The case is Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc., 06-157.

Editorial: Government by Law, Not Faith

The Supreme Court hears arguments today in a case that could have a broad impact on whether the courthouse door remains open to ordinary Americans who believe that the government is undermining the separation of church and state.

The question before the court is whether a group seeking to preserve the separation of church and state can mount a First Amendment challenge to the Bush administration's "faith based" initiatives. The arguments turn on a technical question of whether taxpayers have standing, or the right to initiate this kind of suit, but the real-world implications are serious. If the court rules that the group does not have standing, it will be much harder to stop government from giving unconstitutional aid to religion.

Soon after taking office, President Bush established the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, and faith-based offices in departments like Justice and Education. They were intended to increase the federal grant money going to religious organizations, and they seem to have been highly effective. The plaintiffs cited figures showing that from 2003 to 2005, the number of federal grants to religious groups increased 38 percent. The Freedom From Religion Foundation and several of its members sued. They say that because the faith-based initiatives favor religious applicants for grants over secular applicants, they violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment, which prohibits government support for religion.

These are profound issues, but because the administration challenged the right of the foundation and its members to sue, the courts must decide whether the plaintiffs have the right to sue in this case before they can consider the constitutionality of the faith-based programs. An appeals court has ruled, correctly, that the plaintiffs have standing.

In many cases, taxpayers are not in fact allowed to sue to challenge government actions, but the Supreme Court has long held that they have standing to allege violations of the Establishment Clause. Without this sort of broad standing, many entanglements between church and state would never make it to court.

The Bush administration is pushing an incorrect view of standing as it tries to stop the courts from reaching the First Amendment issue. Taxpayers can challenge the financing of religious activity, the administration claims, only when a Congressional statute expressly authorizes the spending. There is no statute behind the faith-based initiative.

In his decision for the appeals court, Judge Richard Posner of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in Chicago, convincingly explained why this argument is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's precedents on the Establishment Clause.

Procedural issues like standing can have an enormous impact on the administration of justice if they close the courthouse door on people with valid legal claims. The Supreme Court has made it clear that taxpayers may challenge government assistance to religion. The justices should affirm Judge Posner's ruling so the courts can move on to the important question: Do the Bush administration's faith-based policies violate the Constitution?

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Rules Padilla Competent To Stand Trial. The New York Times (3/1, Sontag, 1.16M) reports Federal District Court Judge Marcia Cooke has found Jose Padilla "competent to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges Wednesday, granting a significant victory to the government in the high-profile criminal case" of a US citizen "initially designated an 'enemy combatant' and held without charges." Cooke ruled after "three and a half days of an intensely argued hearing," rejecting the argument of Padilla's attorneys that their client should be "sent to a hospital for psychiatric treatment so that he could be 'healed' from what they said was post-traumatic stress disorder caused during his three years and eight months in military detention."

The AP (3/1, Anderson) reports, "Padilla's lawyers had asked Cooke to order that their client be treated for post-traumatic stress disorder, which they contend stems from years of isolation and interrogation while in military custody. … Cooke said testimony in the competency hearing showed that Padilla understands 'legal nuances' of pretrial motions and noted that he had signed a document verifying the truth of allegations made by the defense that he was tortured and mistreated during his years in a Navy brig in Charleston, South Carolina. … 'At some time, the defendant was able to discuss some things with his lawyers,' Cooke said. 'The defendant's situation is unique. He understands that.'" The AP adds, "Bush administration officials vehemently deny that Padilla was mistreated, and Cooke said her decision on competency should not be read as a ruling on those claims. 'That discussion is for another day,' she said."

The Washington Post (3/1, A3, Whoriskey, 690K) reports the ruling "leaves aside for now the question of whether Padilla, accused of being an al-Qaeda operative, was mistreated during his 3 1/2 -year confinement in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. … Instead, the ruling found that whether or not he was abused, Padilla is currently capable of understanding the legal proceedings and their consequences, and that he can assist his attorneys. That is enough under legal standards to find him fit for trial." The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Williams, 850K) adds that Cooke "prefaced her ruling by saying she might conduct another hearing at which she would take testimony on the torture allegations before Padilla's trial, set to begin April 16."

NYTimes Condemns US Behavior In Padilla Case. The New York Times (3/1, 1.16M) editorializes, "There were so many reasons to be appalled by President Bush's decision to detain people illegally and subject them to mental and physical abuse. The unfolding case of Jose Padilla reminds us of one of the most important: mistreating a prisoner makes it hard, if not impossible, for a real court to judge whether he has committed real crimes. … The government's arguments at the hearing sounded ridiculous and shameful. Prosecutors said Mr. Padilla always seemed fine to his jailers, but it was his jailers who did things like standing on his bare feet with boots so they could shackle him. … When a psychologist testified for the defense that Mr. Padilla was 'an anxiety-ridden, broken individual,' the prosecution said her tests were invalid -- because the jailers had kept Mr. Padilla handcuffed throughout. … So far, this trial has been a reminder of how Mr. Bush's policy on prisoners has compromised the judicial process. And it has confirmed the world's suspicions of the United States' stooping to the very behavior it once stood against."

Bush Convenes Bipartisan Terror Working Group. The Washington Post/AP (3/1, A7) reports, "Despite initial wariness from Democrats, President Bush finally convened a bipartisan working group to advise him on terrorism, sitting down at the White House yesterday to discuss the deteriorating conditions in Afghanistan with senior lawmakers from both parties." In January, when he unveiled his new Iraq policy, the President "mentioned his interest in forming such a group as a way of improving relations with Congress. Democrats initially balked out of concern that Bush would be dictating the subject and the people present, congressional aides said. What now appears to have emerged is a plan to have regular meetings to discuss key national security issues with an evolving cast of participants from Capitol Hill, according to congressional and White House aides."

Judge Denies Request To Declassify FBI Evidence On Muslim Charity. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Krikorian, 850K) reports US District Judge A. Joe Fish of Dallas "has denied a request to declassify thousands of pages of FBI evidence in the prosecution of a Muslim charity, but said it was disturbing that a recently unsealed document falsely accused charity officials of anti-Jewish slurs. In his ruling against lawyers for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development," Fish "concluded there was insufficient evidence to show the inaccuracies were part of a 'widespread problem' with the government's evidence. At the same time, Fish advised defense lawyers to return to court if they found more government summaries that were 'significantly inaccurate or misleading.' The now-defunct Muslim charity and seven former officials face criminal charges alleging financial ties to the Islamic militant group Hamas."

The Dallas Morning News (3/1, 500K) adds that Fish "said there was no justification for a defense request to declassify almost 10 years' of surveillance based on the apparent fabrications found in the government's April 15, 1996, surveillance summary. The document claimed that two of the Holy Land officials now facing trial made remarks that are not in the actual transcripts of surveillance. The alleged remarks included one Holy Land official calling Israel 'the government of the demons' and telling a colleague: 'Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests…the sons of snakes and scorpions.' The judge said he found it 'disturbing' that the government summary included inflammatory language not found in the transcript. Defense attorneys, like prosecutors, had no comment on Tuesday's ruling. But in their original motion, defense attorneys said they only recently had received declassified summaries representing about 10 percent of the conversations recorded by the government in court-authorized surveillance. They signaled that additional discrepancies might exist."

US Will Not Send CIA Defendants To Italy. The Washington Post (3/1, A12, Whitlock, 690K) reports State Department legal adviser John B. Bellinger III Wednesday said the US "would refuse to extradite CIA officers who face kidnapping charges in Italy, warning that European criminal prosecutions of US agents were harming transatlantic counterterrorism efforts." Although the Italian government has not made a final decision on whether to ask Washington to extradite the agents, Bellinger said, "If we got an extradition request from Italy, we would not extradite US officials to Italy."

The Financial Times (3/1, Laitner) notes that last month the European parliament "accused some European governments of turning a blind eye to the illegal transportation of alleged terrorists through their countries to face possible torture." However, Bellinger "branded" that report "unbalanced, inaccurate and unfair," and cautioned that European probes into US officials "can harm intelligence cooperation."

PATRIOT ACT:

EFF Suit Seeks Details On FISA Wiretap Ruling. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/28, A-6, Egelko) reports, "A privacy rights group sued the Justice Department on Tuesday to try to pry loose a ruling by a secret court that the Bush administration says approved its clandestine wiretapping program." The Chronicle continues, "The suit, if it succeeds, should answer an important question about the future of the program: whether the court will require individual warrants, with specific evidence, before allowing the government to intercept phone calls and e-mails between Americans and alleged terrorists in foreign countries." The Chronicle adds, "In December 2005, President Bush confirmed a New York Times report that he had authorized the National Security Agency four years earlier to eavesdrop on such communications without obtaining warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as required by a 1978 law. … A federal judge in Detroit declared the program unconstitutional in August, a ruling the administration has appealed. In San Francisco, another judge is considering more than 40 lawsuits accusing telecommunications companies of illegally collaborating with the program by allowing the National Security Agency to intercept messages and examine customer records." The Chronicle notes, "The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco organization that represents AT&T customers in one of the lawsuits, sued Tuesday in Washington, D.C., seeking disclosure of a pivotal Jan. 10 ruling by a judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. … The ruling's existence was disclosed Jan. 17 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who told the Senate Judiciary Committee that the judge had approved the surveillance, after lengthy negotiations, and that the program was now operating under authority of the foreign intelligence court. … Gonzales did not say, however, whether the judge was requiring a warrant in each case or instead had given overall approval to the program. The attorney general has refused to make the order public, although the Justice Department sent copies to the federal judge in San Francisco and the appeals court reviewing the Detroit ruling. … The department also disclosed the order to selected members of Congress, including leaders of the House and Senate judiciary committees. Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said Leahy would like to see a declassified version made public and is exploring the subject with the Justice Department and the White House."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House, Democrats Clash Over TSA Unionization Effort. USA Today (3/1, Frank, 2.27M) reports efforts by congressional Democrats "to let airport screeners unionize for the first time since the government took over aviation security after the 9/11 attacks" have "provoked a clash with the Bush administration and Republican lawmakers that could scuttle attempts to enact one of the broadest homeland security bills since 9/11." While labor leaders say unionizing Transportation Security Administration screeners "would strengthen security by improving working conditions and reducing high attrition and injury rates, which cause staffing shortages," TSA says "security would suffer because the agency could not quickly reassign screeners to counter new threats. President Bush might veto any bill that would let TSA screeners unionize."

States To Be Given More Time On Real ID Act. The Washington Post (3/1, A4, Hsu, Barr, 690K) reports "congressional and Department of Homeland Security officials said yesterday" that the Bush administration will allow states to delay implementation of the Real ID Act. "The retreat came as the White House and the Democratic Congress headed for a showdown over a broad counterterrorism bill to implement many of the remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission." Eight senators debating the bill yesterday "supported a push by Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine) to postpone the driver's license program by two years. They blamed the administration for failing until a scheduled announcement today to spell out what states must do to comply with the law, which was passed nearly two years ago." A senior official at the Department of Homeland Security, "speaking on the condition of anonymity pending the official release, said that although the Real ID law set a May 2008 deadline, the administration is interpreting that as requiring states to be able to begin issuing compliant IDs by that time. They will be allowed to replace all 245 million licenses held by Americans on a 'reasonably prompt basis' over five years."

"Strategy Of Chaos" Seen As Best Way To Thwart Rail Attacks. Frank J. Cilluffo, director of the George Washington University Homeland Security Policy Institute, a non-partisan think tank, and Laura P. Keith, a policy analyst at HSPI, in an op-ed in USA Today (3/1, 13A, 2.27M) write that with their "low security measures, high numbers of passengers, and mass transit's critical economic significance," terrorist attacks on trains and subways "potentially have the biggest impact for the lowest cost." However, while most subway systems in the US "have implemented some" security measures, "the US government has not formalized rail security standards, identified 'best practices,' or completed an overall rail security strategy, three things Congress has called on it to do." Cilluffo and Keith continue that one way to "prevent what appears to be inevitable" may be to "create security plans that can be executed with a high level of unpredictability and flexibility — a strategy of chaos." The writers call for an increased "investment in the nation's surface transportation security plans" and state that with a "strategy of chaos" and "greater public awareness…we can beat the terrorists at their own game."

9/11 Victim's Family Member Says Senate Democrats Snubbed Him. The Washington Times (3/1, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "A family member of a September 11 victim says Senate Democrats invited him to Washington then snubbed him yesterday after he criticized a bill adopting 9/11 commission recommendations. 'They made me sit in the hallway for 40 minutes for nothing,' said Bruce DeCell, a former New York City police officer whose son-in-law was killed at the World Trade Center on September 11." He "was invited by the Senate Democratic Steering and Outreach Committee to represent victims' family members at a lunch and press conference that included Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey. … Thomas Russell, director of the steering committee, later called and apologized, saying he was 'being pulled in too many directions and he forgot to come and get me,' Mr. DeCell said." DeCell "called the explanation 'disingenuous.'"

Terror-Linked Inmates Being Moved To Indiana Prison. The Terre Haute Tribune-Star (3/1, Loughlin) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has opened a new unit at the medium-security prison in Terre Haute to monitor communications of its inmates more closely, which could include lower-risk offenders convicted of or associated with terrorism, a Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman said." The Tribune-Star continues, "The Washington Post has reported that the unit houses "a hodgepodge of second-tier terrorism inmates, most of them Arab Muslims, whose ability to communicate with the outside world has been tightly restricted." … The self-contained unit opened in December and has about 17 inmates, although that number eventually could expand to 90, said Traci Billingsley, Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman. … The so-called 'Communications Management Unit,' or CMU, 'isn't a terrorist unit,' she said. … The purpose of the CMU 'is to provide increased monitoring of inmate communication in a self-contained unit. It assists in regulating and monitoring communication between inmates and those in the community,' she said." The Tribune-Star adds, "Those convicted of or associated with domestic or international terrorism 'may be candidates for this unit,' Billingsley said. … It eventually will house a variety of inmates, including sex offenders who try to communicate with victims or inmates who try to conduct illegal activity by phone or mail. … The unit is located in an area that formerly served as death row. Death row has been moved to the new high-security facility in the Federal Correctional Complex." The Tribune-Star notes, "Prisoner advocates are raising concerns that most of the inmates in CMU so far are of Middle Eastern descent or Muslim faith, which could represent racial profiling. … Billingsley said she didn't know inmates' race or religion, and 'that would not be a factor in placement,' she said. … The most dangerous, high-risk terrorists in the federal system likely would be housed at the ADMax or 'supermax' facility in Florence, Colo., she said. According to the Washington Post article, the supermax facility houses al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui."

New Orleans Residents Turn Out To File Claims Against Army Corps Of Engineers. USA Today (3/1, Gomez, 2.27M) reports that in the face of a Thursday deadline, thousands of New Orleans residents showed up at the Army Corps of Engineers office Wednesday "to file claims that accuse the corps of being responsible for levee failures that flooded New Orleans. … Joseph Bruno, one of several attorneys representing victims, says he expects more than 100,000 to file claims. Debbie Simon, a corps spokeswoman, said it expects the total to be around 60,000 claims." USA Today notes that those who miss the deadline may be spared "if a judge grants an extension to the deadline at a court hearing scheduled for Friday. Lawyers representing victims in the lawsuit are asking for a 6-month extension."

Judge Hears Arguments On State Farm Katrina Claims Settlement. The New York Times (3/1, Treaster, 1.16M) reports lawyers appeared before Judge L. T. Senter Jr. of Federal District Court in Gulfport, Mississippi Wednesday "to argue the merits of a settlement with State Farm that would reopen 36,000 previously closed claims of Mississippi homeowners whose homes were damaged" by Hurricane Katrina. "The central issue has been whether the insurers are responsible for damage caused by extensive flooding. The insurers say their policies never provided coverage for any kind of flooding. In many cases, storm victims say, the insurers, especially State Farm, refused to pay claims if the damage was done by a combination of wind and water." Wednesday's hearing, which featured "homeowners who have complaints about State Farm," became "raw and emotional" at times. "The judge, saying he had a duty to protect storm victims, had been unwilling to endorse the settlement because of concerns that it favored State Farm."

WPost Says Bush Must Use "Bully Pulpit" To Accelerate New Orleans Recovery. The Washington Post (3/1, 690K) editorializes, "A month after neglecting to mention New Orleans or the Gulf Coast in his State of the Union address, President Bush heads today to the city crippled by Hurricane Katrina." The president is "certain to get an earful during his listening tour of the region," but for New Orleans' recovery "to go from a crawl to a gallop, Bush must use the bully pulpit of the presidency to energize all levels of government." The Post sees wisdom in Bush's insistence "that local officials plan and control their own destiny," but says "that does not absolve him of any role in fulfilling a vow he made to New Orleans in his speech in Jackson Square: 'This great city will rise again.' … One specific way Mr. Bush could show leadership is by directing the Federal Emergency Management Agency to waive the requirement that Louisiana contribute 10 percent to meeting disaster recovery costs; the federal government has issued similar waivers to other jurisdictions, including New York City after the attacks of Sept.

11, 2001. Cutting that bit of red tape would allow the freed-up money to be used for other rebuilding purposes."

WAR NEWS:

Democrats To Add Up To $10 Billion In Non-War Items To Iraq Spending Bill. The AP (3/1, Taylor) reports, "While Democrats try to restrict how President Bush can spend the $100 billion he wants for Iraq, they also hope to load his measure up with $10 billion in add-ons -- from aid for avocado growers to help for children lacking health insurance. Lawmakers also hope to add money for drought relief in the Great Plains, better levees in New Orleans and development of military bases that are closing down." The "expected battle with the White House over the add-ons is getting far less attention than debate over Iraq," but "it could reveal a lot about how much Democrats will be able to rewrite the Republican president's budget later this year." Bush "has yet to veto a spending bill, and Democrats are gambling he'll sign the Iraq measure despite objections to spending he didn't seek. Republicans, meanwhile, may be reluctant to vote against the package since it contains funds for U.S. troops overseas."

The Politico (3/1) also says "House Democrats plan to pick a fresh fight with the White House with an unannounced plan to add billions of dollars in spending for their domestic priorities to…Bush's $99.6 billion emergency war spending bill." The programs "being eyed by Democratic leaders, including $700 million for health care for poor children, could boost Bush's war proposal by 10 percent or more, sources in both parties said." The White House "wants Congress to stick with what Bush requested -- money for ongoing military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, repair and replacement of damaged equipment and an increase in the size of the nation's deployable military force." But "Democrats plan to follow the same strategy Bush has used for years to get his priorities funded: packaging appropriations for key projects separately from the overall budget and tying them to money for troops in the field. … 'He has competition now,' said one Democratic leadership aide."

The Hill (3/1, Bolton) reports Rep. Collin Peterson, chairman of the House Agriculture Committee and "a senior member of the Blue Dog Coalition of some 45 conservative Democrats," said, "I don't think the supplemental will pass if we don't" add "disaster-relief funds. Without farm-relief funds the Iraq-Afghanistan bill would lose 'quite a few' Blue Dog votes, said Peterson. 'They'd lose mine,' he added." The Hill adds, "Republican House leaders anticipated such sweeteners. At yesterday's weekly meeting of the House Republican Conference," House Minority Leader John Boehner "urged colleagues not to be lured by money for agriculture and health insurance, said two lawmakers who attended the meeting." Boehner "warned his colleagues to remember the bigger picture of troop funding."

House Democrats Could Face Inner Turmoil Over New Anti-War Strategy. The AP (3/1, Flaherty) reports, "House Democratic leaders are developing an anti-war proposal that wouldn't cut off money for US troops in Iraq but would require President Bush to acknowledge problems with an overburdened military." The plan "could draw bipartisan support but is expected to be a tough sell to members who say they don't think it goes far enough to assuage voters angered by the four-year conflict. Bush 'hasn't to date done anything we've asked him to do, so why we would think he would do anything in the future is beyond me,' said Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., one of a group of liberal Democrats pushing for an immediate end to the war." The AP adds, "Democratic protests to the war grew louder in January after they took control of Congress and Bush announced he planned to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq." Rep. John Murtha, who sponsored a plan to restrict funding for the war, "is extending his support to the revised proposal," a "tactic…more likely to embarrass Bush politically than force his hand on the war. He would have to sign repeated waivers for units and report to Congress those units with equipment shortfalls and other problems."

Local TV devoted significantly less attention to the Congressional debate than it had in previous days. Some examples: WSIL-TV Paducah, KY (2/28, 10:13 pm) broadcast, "Democrats continue to work on ways to scale back the war in Iraq without cutting off funding. Some House Democrats have taken up a plan that would require…Bush to sign a waiver for troops sent into battle that don't meet certain standards. Congress would then be notified. Meanwhile, Senate Democrats are working on repealing the 2002 measure that authorized the war. The new legislation could restrict the mission in Iraq and order troop withdrawals by the summer. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid says it could be brought up in a matter of days."

WDRB-TV Louisville (2/28, 10:34 pm) said that in Congress, "House Democrats are trying to figure out what to do with Congressman Jack Murtha's proposal to attach conditions to war funding. Democratic leaders may go ahead with the idea, but also give the President the option of waving those funding restrictions. Republicans say Democrats are backpedaling. Democrats say they're looking for a workable plan." KION-TV Monterey (2/28, 6:07 pm) and WPBF-TV West Palm Beach, FL (2/28, 6:13 pm) aired similar reports.

The Politico (3/1) reports, "To put it bluntly, as the former Marine is wont to do…Murtha is rankling some of his fellow Democrats who worry his outspokenness sometimes upstages even…Pelosi. … A day before the House voted on a resolution disapproving of the president's troop 'surge' plan last month, Murtha turned to a liberal Web site to preview his plans to block the president's deployment of an additional 21,500 troops into Iraq. And his statements overshadowed the ongoing floor debate and fueled Republican charges that Democrats were laying a foundation to cut off war funding." Murtha's plan "was 'overexposed before it was exposed,' said Rep. Earl Pomeroy (D-N.D.), a member of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition. … Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.), another Blue Dog, was similarly annoyed. 'I was not keen on him stepping on Nancy's message,' Cooper said."

The Washington Post (3/1, A15, Romano, 690K), meanwhile, profiles Rep. Patrick Murphy, who "normally would have fallen into the category of unknown freshman legislator elbowing to make a name for himself. But attracting attention has been no problem for Murphy." He "happens to be the only member of Congress who is a veteran of the war in Iraq, a distinction that has swiftly catapulted him to Washington's front lines of politics and policy with little effort. Senior members turn to the 33-year-old for policy guidance. Generals are eager to brief him one-on-one. Murphy delivers moving speeches on the floor about the 19 paratroopers he served with who died in Iraq. And he stood shoulder to shoulder with…Pelosi at a news conference, emotionally talking about flawed US policy."

McCain Says Petraeus Deserves A Chance. On CBS' Late Show (2/28, Letterman), Sen. John McCain said of the surge, "I think it's really our last chance to salvage a very difficult war which has been badly mismanaged, and we've got a very good general over there, a guy named Gen. Petraeus. … I've known him well enough to know he's really an outstanding general. Generals alone don't do it, but he does. I think we can hopefully bring about a period of stability so that you can have economic and political development and stop this terrible bloodletting which is, as you know, sectarian violence, terrible things are happening. Showing a little progress. Let's hope and pray that it works."

Odierno Says US Needs "A Minimum Of Six To Nine Months" To Secure Baghdad. Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, introduced by Wolf Blitzer as the "number two US commander in Iraq," said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/28), "We could maintain security here. We could have things look good for one or two weeks. That's what we've done in the past. But when we've done that, we've always had some problems in not maintaining it. So the key to this is being able to show that we can maintain the security in Baghdad over a long period of time -- six, seven months -- which enables the Iraqi government to mature, it enables the Iraqi security forces to continue to mature and take control of this. … I think that will take some time. I don't want to put an exact time on it, but a minimum of six to nine months."

Brownback Calls For "Three-State" Solution. Sen. Sam Brownback said on Fox News' Your World (2/28, Asman), "I think what we've got to do is push toward a political solution in Iraq. We cannot cut and run and we need to stay there to move this process on forward. … I think we need to move this towards a three-state, one country solution of a Kurdish area, a Sunni area, and a Shia area, with Baghdad as a federal city."

Baker, Christopher To Chair Panel On War Powers. The AP (3/1) reports, "Former Secretaries of State James A. Baker III and Warren Christopher will head a private, bipartisan panel to study a lingering and gnawing national question: Who does the Constitution say has the power to begin, conduct and end wars? The dispute over the authority to wage war has historically divided presidents, members of Congress and scholars." The war powers study "is sponsored by the private Miller Center of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia."

The Washington Post (3/1, A15, Abramowitz, 690K) notes Lee Hamilton will also part of the committee, in addition to "another veteran of the Iraq Study Group, former attorney general Edwin Meese III." It also "includes another member of the Sept. 11 commission, former senator Slade Gorton (R-Wash.). Baker will co-chair the new commission with former secretary of state Warren Christopher, who is a commission veteran himself, having chaired the blue-ribbon group that looked into the Los Angeles Police Department after the Rodney King riots."

Sen. Arlen Specter said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/28, Blitzer) yesterday, "I believe we need substantially more study to understand where the congressional constitutional authority ends on the power of the purse on appropriations, contrasted with the President's power as commander in chief. I do not believe, for example, that Congress can micromanage the war. We can cut off funding, although nobody would even consider that to jeopardize the troops. So these are complex issues. … We are in very deep water. And we oughtn't to go off halfcocked. And we ought to be very careful that we don't set a precedent now which will bind some future president to the detriment of the country. It's a matter which requires a lot more thought than has been given to it so far. And that's why I want the hearings with the experts to study the precedence and to get very deeply involved so that we know what we are doing."

Chafee Says Senators Should Be Called To Task For Opposing Levin Measure In 2002. Former Sen. Lincoln Chafee, in today's New York Times (3/1, 1.16M), writes about the 2002 debate on the Iraq war resolution. Says Chafee, "A mere 10 hours before the roll was called on the administration-backed Iraq war resolution, the Senate had an opportunity to prevent the current catastrophe in Iraq and to salvage the United States' international standing. Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, offered a substitute to the war resolution, the Multilateral Use of Force Authorization Act of 2002." Levin's amendment "called for United Nations approval before force could be authorized. It was unambiguous and compatible with international law." The amendment "was defeated by a 75 to 24 vote. Later that night, the Iraq War Resolution was approved, 77 to 23." Levin adds, "We must not sidestep the fact that a sensible alternative did exist, but it was rejected. Candidates -- Democrat and Republican -- should be called to account for their vote on the Levin amendment."

Congress Urged To Give "Surge" A Chance. Michael O'Hanlon, senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/1, A13, 2.04M), "Despite the earlier pledge of congressional Democrats not to challenge funding for the war in Iraq this year, key members of the House and Senate are considering robust and binding responses to the conflict -- most specifically to…Bush's surge strategy. Congress is within its constitutional rights to do so. But in its understandable response to a failing mission and an impatient American public, its approach is unproductive. Rather than force a showdown with Mr. Bush this winter and spring, Congress should give his surge strategy a chance -- while preparing for the real fight this fall." Hanlon adds, "Patience makes sense, for now. Congressional critics should, whether they personally support the surge or not, tolerate it for a few more months."

Iraqi Military Official Says Security Crackdown Working. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Berthelsen, 850K) reports a top Iraqi military official "announced today that authorities have killed more than two dozen militants, arrested hundreds of others and seized huge caches of weaponry in the last week, declaring that a 3-week-old security crackdown was working even as car bombs, mortar attacks and shootings continued to claim lives around the country." Brig. Gen. Qassim Atta Musawi's announcement "comes as many Iraqis are expressing a growing impatience with the U.S.-Iraqi security push. Iraqis overwhelmingly want the plan to work and are frustrated by multiple daily attacks that have continued even as they have put up with neighborhood raids, house-to-house searches and vehicle stops."

US Soldiers Dispersing To Smaller Outposts In Baghdad. The Washington Post (3/1, A1, Partlow, 690K) reports in a front pages story that American soldiers "are leaving their sprawling fortress-cities and establishing many small outposts in the capital's most violent neighborhoods in a major tactical shift under the two-week-old Baghdad security plan." Informed by "counterinsurgency theory that calls for placing units full-time among the people they want to sway, U.S. troops are using their new bases to work with their Iraqi counterparts, uncover more battlefield intelligence and reinforce, by their sustained presence, the message that they will not allow militants unfettered freedom of movement." But along "with these advantages, American soldiers say these outposts pose new risks to their own safety and require pulling soldiers off patrols to protect their lodgings. The threats became apparent this month when a car bomb exploded at a U.S. outpost in Tarmiyah, north of Baghdad, killing two U.S. soldiers and wounding 29 others."

Saddam-Era Munitions Used For IEDs. USA Today (3/1, 1A, Brook, 2.27M) reports in a front page story that four years "after the Iraq war began, the country remains awash in Saddam-era munitions that provide key ingredients for homemade bombs used against U.S. troops, according to administration documents and military officials." More than $1 billion "has been spent to clear about 15,000 sites of the unsecured weapons. To clear the remaining 3,391 sites, the Pentagon says it needs a portion of a $1.2 billion request for items to protect U.S. troops in Iraq." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "estimates that 70% of U.S. casualties in Iraq stem from IEDs."

Ramadi Sheikh Corroborates Story Of Car Bombing. The Washington Post (3/1, A13, Londono, Mehdawi, 690K) reports, "A community leader in the western Iraqi city of Ramadi provided additional information Wednesday about a deadly car bombing earlier this week that U.S. officials said did not occur." Raad Sabah al-Mukeilef, "a sheik who said he lives about 500 yards from where the bomb exploded Monday, said in a telephone interview Wednesday that he believes members of the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq set off the bomb near a playground after being unable to get past a checkpoint that leads to his house, which is near a government building." Mukeilef's account "corroborated information provided Tuesday by Col. Tariq al-Alwani, the security supervisor in Anbar province in western Iraq. Both men said the blast killed 16 children and three women, one of whom died Wednesday from her wounds. Ramadi is the provincial capital."

Sunni Insurgents Still Greatest Threat To US In Iraq. McClatchy (3/1, Brown) reports Sunni Muslim insurgents "remain by far the biggest threat to American troops in Iraq, despite recent U.S. claims that Iran is providing Shiite Muslim militia groups with a new type of roadside bomb, a review of American casualty reports shows." While US military officials "have held briefings to publicize their concerns about the potent bombs known as explosively formed projectiles (EFPs) or penetrators, casualty reports suggest that such weapons in the hands of Shiite militias are responsible for a relatively small number of American deaths." US officials have "said that attacks with such weapons increased 150 percent in the past year. But a review of bombings by location shows that less than 10 percent of attacks that killed at least two American service members in the past 14 months were in areas where Shiite militias are dominant."

Carney Calls US Post-Iraq Invasion Policies "Incompetent."

AFP (3/1) reports Ambassador Timothy Carney, the new US coordinator for Iraq's economic development, Wednesday said the US policy in Iraq following the 2003 invasion was "incompetent, foolish, dubious." In an interview with NPR, Carney said the US policy to exclude Iraqis from governing the country in the two years following the invasion was "an enormous foolishness" which contributed to the deterioration of security and lengthened the conflict in the country. "We don't need to go into detail on that, but I think words such as incompetent, foolish, dubious in all of its aspects are the most charitable way to look at that period," he said.

However, NPR (3/1, Garrels) reports Carney says the situation in Iraq is improving. "The big difference now is that Iraqis are inviting us into their councils to try to help use our resources to actually get things done," Carney said. But "with American reconstruction money drying up,' Carney's "biggest job will be to help Iraqis spend their own money, primarily from oil revenues." In part, Carney will "rely on the State Department's provincial reconstruction teams, known as PRTs."

UN Official Says Saddam Execution Prompted Reevaluation Of Death Penalty.

The Washington Times (3/1, Pisik, 88K) reports Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, yesterday "said she senses a global interest in revising the death penalty, triggered in part by the public execution of former Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein." Arbour said she does not expect to see a "spontaneous uprising or outcry" against capital punishment, but the executions in Iraq of Saddam and two of his associates "may have created an environment in which people are asking a lot of serious question" about the need for a review of capital punishment.

NATO Officials Had Intelligence Of Afghan Bombing Threat.

ABC World News (2/28, story 2, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Officials in Afghanistan said today, the attack outside the military base where Vice President Cheney was staying, did not come as a total surprise. NATO's top spokesman in Afghanistan said there has been recent intelligence to suggest there was a threat of a bombing in the Bagram area."

The New York Times (3/1, Wafa, Gall, 1.16M) reports the NATO spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, said "NATO and American forces knew that a suicide bomber was at large in the Bagram area before the suicide bomb attack on Tuesday that killed 23 people at the main gate of the United States air base where Vice President Dick Cheney was staying." But despite "the vice president's presence, the Afghan police chief in the area said he had not been informed of the possible threat." The Afghan "police chief of Bagram district, Muhammad Salem Ehsas, said Wednesday that he had been unaware of any threat of a suicide bomber in the area, suggesting a lack of coordination between the security forces on the ground even while Mr. Cheney was present."

The Washington Post/AP (3/1, A14, Straziuso) reports intelligence reports "indicated that the Taliban had the ability to carry out suicide attacks near the main U.S. base in Afghanistan even before a deadly bombing during a visit by Vice President Cheney, NATO said Wednesday." The attacker "never tried to penetrate even the first of several U.S.-manned security checkpoints at Bagram, instead detonating his explosives among a group of Afghan workers outside the base." Collins said, "The Taliban's claims that they were going after the vice president were absurd."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/28, Matthews), Michael Sheehan, a former State Department coordinator for counterterrorism, said the suicide bombing at Bagram Air Base was an attempt to assassinate Vice President Cheney: "I don't think it was a coincidence they attacked the gate on that particular day. It was a well-timed quick operation, which shows a lot of capability by the Taliban and al Qaeda to launch a suicide terrorist on very short notice. They probably knew the Vice President was there, but they weren't good enough to really get a good shot at him." Asked if Pakistan was an ally in the war on terrorism, Sheehan said, "Pakistan is definitely our ally, but a troubled ally. Pakistan has a long history of meddling with some of the wrong folks in that area. The army's intelligence, known as the ISI, has supported the Taliban previously, prior to 9/11. They support Kashmiri separatist groups that are intertwined with al Qaeda. So they're playing a dangerous game in that area. Musharraf would like to control it, but it's very difficult for him to do politically and militarily. They're an ally but they're in a lot of trouble in that region."

Video Documents Afghan Suicide Bomber's Preparations. ABC World News (2/28, lead story, 3:10, Ross, 8.78M) reported a newly released video "does provide a rare look at who the enemy is for US troops" in Afghanistan, and "how easy it seems to be for them, to mount a deadly attack. This is the suicide bomber. A young Afghan man in a beat-up Toyota loaded with explosives. The ease with which his bomb was prepared is documented on the tape, released on the internet by Al Qaeda's propaganda arm this week." The tape "shows the suicide bomber building his own bomb, arranging the mortars and land mines in a metal chest." Alexis Debat, Senior Fellow, The Nixon Center: "This is a very, very compelling statement for how simple it is for the Taliban to hurt us in Afghanistan. The child is making the bomb, that is about to kill him. And yet he has such an amazing, peaceful look on his face." Ross: "The number of such attacks in Afghanistan is up almost five-fold in the last few months. While the Army says no one attack means much strategically, the cumulative impact is enormous and growing."

NBC Nightly News (2/28, story 3, 2:10, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "The Al Qaeda video dated last October but recently posted on the Internet shows the young Taliban fighter chanting in preparation for his own death. The video appears to show him assembling the bomb before it is loaded into a car and driving off for his mission. Complete with English subtitles, the video also shows the Taliban's most ruthless commander, Mohamed Dadullah, claiming the Americans are defenseless against the new wave of young suicide bombers. Suicide bombs, usually the weapon of choice for al Qaeda, have taken a deadly toll in Afghanistan, nearly 140, up five fold in the past year. For the first time, Dadullah claims he is preparing to send thousands of Taliban suicide bombers against US troops in the upcoming spring offensive in Afghanistan."

Pakistan Rejects US Claim It Hosts Bin Laden, Al Qaeda Camps. The AP (3/1, Ahmad) reports Pakistan Wednesday "rejected a claim by the US intelligence chief that Osama bin Laden and his deputy were hiding in northwestern Pakistan, and that al-Qaeda was setting up camps near the Afghan border." President Gen. Pervez Musharraf, however, "acknowledged that foreign militants were in Pakistan's tribal regions along the Afghan border and warned them to leave," the state-run news agency reported. Musharraf's remarks follow statements made by DNI Mike McConnell Tuesday that al-Qaeda is trying to set up training camps and other operations in Pakistan tribal areas near Afghanistan. In an interview with the AP, Pakistani Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao said, "We deny it," referring to McConnell's remarks.

Taliban Official Says Bin Laden Alive. The AP (3/1) reports a senior Taliban commander says Osama bin Laden is "alive and in contact with leaders of Afghanistan's Taliban insurgents," according to an interview aired on British television. Mullah Dadullah said he had not met bin Laden since the U.S.-led invasion of Afghanistan in 2001, but "we know he's still alive." Dadullah, commander of Taliban operations in eastern and southeastern Afghanistan, told the

UK's Channel 4, "Only his comrades see him," but "we exchange messages with each other to share plans."

LATimes Says US Should Keep Pressure Up On Musharraf. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, 850K) says in an editorial, "Since 9/11, the United States has been trapped in an increasingly loveless marriage with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Like many a miserable mate, the Bush administration has been known to rue the failings of its partner in private. Yet it has always defended Musharraf in public, arguing that whatever his shortcomings, the alternative is far worse." But "such forbearance may be changing. For the first time, the Bush administration this week let Islamabad know, through Vice President Dick Cheney, that it is unhappy with Pakistan's performance in fighting the resurgent Taliban. And it hinted that if things don't improve, the White House might not be able to keep the Democratic-controlled Congress from cutting U.S. aid to Pakistan. This burst of candor is long overdue — and so is an overhaul of U.S. policy toward Pakistan."

US Troops In Philippines "Defy Old Stereotypes." The Christian Science Monitor (3/1, Montlake, 59K) reports when US troops arrived in the Philippines in December 2001, "critics assailed the move," predicting "a return of permanent US camps in its former colony, and a repeat of the sleazy bars and clubs still surrounding its former bases near Manila." And "more alarming to US ears were dire warnings of resistance from Muslims." However, "Today, these warnings mostly ring false." About 450 US soldiers are still based in the Philippines, "but the expected nightlife boom hasn't happened. Nor have militants taken the fight to the foreigners deployed here."

DOJ:

Democrats To Seek Testimony From Fired US Attorneys As Controversy Widens. The AP (3/1, Kellman) reports, "Democrats are moving to compel some of the eight U.S. attorneys who have been ousted to tell their stories publicly, under oath, after a federal prosecutor claimed he was fired for political reasons." The AP continues, "A House subcommittee is slated to vote Thursday on subpoenas for four of the eight dismissed U.S. attorneys. The Senate Judiciary Committee, meanwhile, will send letters to those fired before voting next week on compelling their testimony, according to officials with both panels. … The prosecutors have privately told both committees that they would not testify voluntarily but would honor a congressional subpoena, according to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and an official close to the House subcommittee on commercial and administrative law." The AP adds, "House subcommittee Chairwoman Linda Sanchez said her panel will vote on subpoenas for fired prosecutors Carol Lam of California, David Iglesias of New Mexico, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Washington. … 'In order to get the full picture of why these U.S. attorneys were fired, we need to hear from the Justice Department and the U.S. attorneys themselves,' said House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich." The AP notes, "Schumer, in a telephone interview Wednesday with The Associated Press, said: 'If they say they won't come voluntarily, Senator Leahy will authorize subpoenas.' The Senate panel is expected to vote on whether to issue the subpoenas next week, said Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt. … Spurring the developments was a new report that one of the eight, New Mexico's David Iglesias, claims to have been forced out after refusing a request by two congressmen to rush an indictment that might have helped Republicans in the 2006 election. In the story and a subsequent interview with the AP, Iglesias refused to identify the members of Congress. … The Justice Department staunchly denied the charge that Iglesias or any of the eight federal prosecutors were dismissed for political reasons. … 'The suggestion that David Iglesias was asked to resign because he failed to bring an indictment ... is flatly false,' Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said in a statement. 'This administration has never removed a United States attorney in an effort to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a public integrity investigation.' … As to why Iglesias was dismissed, Roehrkasse said: 'We made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns.'"

The New York Times (3/1, Johnston) reports, "David C. Iglesias, who was dismissed as the United States attorney in New Mexico, has said he believes that he was ousted because he resisted pressure before the 2006 elections to bring corruption charges against a Democrat in his state, a Democratic senator said on Wednesday." The Times continues, "Mr. Iglesias has told Congressional aides that two federal lawmakers had separately called him in mid-October asking about the status of an inquiry involving a statehouse construction contract and a former Democratic state lawmaker, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York said in a statement Wednesday on the Senate floor. … Mr. Schumer did not identify the lawmakers who made the calls either by name or party affiliation, but he suggested that they wanted Mr. Iglesias to move quickly with indictments before the November elections to help Republicans." The Times adds, "Mr. Iglesias's account of the calls was first reported on Wednesday by the McClatchy Newspapers, which said the prosecutor would not identify the lawmakers because he feared retaliation. But in that report, he described the contacts as 'appalling.' … The former United States attorneys were not given explanations for their dismissals at the time of their removals, but senior Justice Department officials have said that most were asked to step aside because of job performance problems — an accusation that has angered several and that some have publicly denied. … Mr. Iglesias could not be reached on Wednesday. But The Associated Press reported that at a news conference in Albuquerque on Wednesday, his last day in office, Mr. Iglesias said his dismissal was unrelated to his office's work. … 'I know it's not performance-related,' Mr. Iglesias told The Associated Press. 'I know it's not misconduct. What does that leave? Politics.'"

The Washington Post (3/1, A10, Eggen) reports, "A political tempest over the mass firing of federal prosecutors escalated yesterday with allegations from the departing U.S. attorney in New Mexico, who said that two members of Congress attempted to pressure him to speed up a probe of Democrats just before the November elections." The Post continues that Iglesias "said he received the calls in October and believes that complaints from the lawmakers may have led the Justice Department to fire him late last year. … Iglesias also responded to allegations from Justice officials that he had performed poorly and was too often absent, citing positive job reviews and data showing increasing numbers of prosecutions. He also noted that he is required to serve 40 days a year in the Navy Reserve." The Post adds, "Iglesias declined to name the lawmakers who called him, but he said in an interview: 'I didn't give them what they wanted. That was probably a political problem that caused them to go to the White House or whomever and complain that I wasn't a team player.'" The Post notes, "Spokesmen for Rep. Steve Pearce (R-N.M.) and the state's two Democratic lawmakers, Sen. Jeff Bingaman and Rep. Tom Udall, said the lawmakers and their staffs had no contact with Iglesias about the case. The offices of New Mexico's two other Republican lawmakers, Sen. Pete V. Domenici and Rep. Heather A. Wilson, did not respond to repeated requests for comment. … In briefings about the firings on Capitol Hill, Justice Department officials had said that Iglesias was the target of complaints from members of Congress, according to several sources familiar with the meetings, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss personnel issues. The Justice briefers did not specify the nature of those complaints, the sources said."

McClatchy Newspapers (3/1, Taylor) reports, "Democrats in both the House of Representatives and the Senate vowed to hold a new round of hearings to determine if partisan politics played a role in the firings of eight U.S. attorneys across the country. The House is set to vote Thursday on whether to issue subpoenas to four of the prosecutors. The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to ask the U.S. attorneys to testify voluntarily before it decides whether to subpoena them." McClatchy continues, "Justice Department officials have defended the firings of the U.S. attorneys as legitimate administrative decisions meant to improve the workings of the attorneys' offices. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate last month that most of the forced resignations were motivated by 'performance-related' reasons. … However, McClatchy Newspapers reported last month that five out of the six attorneys that McNulty mentioned had received positive job evaluations." McClatchy adds, "Iglesias acknowledged that he had no proof that the pressure from the members of Congress prompted his forced resignation. But he said the contact violated one of the most important tenets of a U.S. attorney's office: Don't mix politics with prosecutions. … 'I was appalled by the inappropriateness of those contacts,' Iglesias said of the calls." USA Today (3/1, 8A, 2.27M) briefly mentions the story.

More Commentary. In a column for the Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/1), John L. Smith writes, "For no good reason any credible source can name, (Nevada US Attorney Daniel) Bogden was unceremoniously sacked a few weeks ago in an apparent bit of nervous housecleaning by the Department of Justice." Smith continues, "Beyond a respectable win-loss record in prosecuting some of the biggest federal cases in recent Las Vegas history, Bogden can take solace in the fact that he's not alone. Six other Western U.S. attorneys were also notified that their services were no longer needed. … Because the Department of Justice and the Bush administration have done such a terrible job spinning this case, the terminations have given rise to several theories, all of them unflattering to the suits in Washington." Smith adds, "There's the belief that some of those being ousted weren't willing enough to use the death penalty. … And there's the hypothesis that they were terminated because they failed to carry the anti-illegal immigration banner high enough to suit the administration. … Then there's the one about letting those solid veteran prosecutor/administrators go to bring in a group of well-connected neophytes whose resumes would benefit from a line stating 'U.S. Attorney.'" Smith adds, "As of Monday, federal sources still had heard nothing about a possible replacement for Bogden. Will Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wait until the day Bogden leaves to name his replacement? … Through it all, Bogden has taken the high road, maintained his composure, and commented little on the turn of events. … For now, the real reason behind the decision to let him go remains unclear."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US To File Charges In Insider Trading Probe. The Washington Post (3/1, D3, Johnson) reports, "Federal authorities plan to file criminal and civil charges as early as today against one or more UBS employees for providing traders with advance notice of stock-rating adjustments in exchange for cash payments, according to sources familiar with the case." The Post continues, "The charges mark the latest attempt by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission to stanch the flow of improper tips to traders, including hedge funds and private equity firms, who seek to collect information that helps them profit in advance of notable corporate announcements." The Post adds, "Representatives for the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Southern District of New York and the SEC declined to comment yesterday on the months-long probe, as did a spokesman for UBS. The possible charges were reported by the online editions of BusinessWeek. … Sources briefed on the case spoke on condition of anonymity because the charges had yet to be publicly filed. The sources said at least one UBS worker had provided multiple traders with tips that UBS analysts had decided to upgrade or depress their ratings on a stock. Access to such information before it is disseminated to the public could allow a favored group of traders to profit at the expense of average investors."

Former McGuire Woods Partner Charged With Securities Fraud. The New York Law Journal (3/1, Lin) reports, "A former New York law firm partner who allegedly made almost $18 million trading in the securities of his clients has been arrested on fraud charges." The Journal continues, "Louis W. Zehil, until Feb. 16 a partner in the New York office of Richmond, Va.'s McGuireWoods, allegedly used his position as issuer's counsel in seven private placement transactions occurring between January 2006 and last month to accumulate millions of discounted shares, absent the sale restrictions such discounts generally entail. He allegedly sold the stocks at a vast profit." The Journal adds, "Zehil, 41, now faces up to 20 years in prison and millions in fines on fraud charges brought by the Southern District U.S. Attorney's Office. He is also facing a civil suit brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is seeking disgorgement of his allegedly ill-gotten gains. … The ex-partner was arraigned Wednesday before Southern District of New York Magistrate Judge Henry Pitman but not required to enter a plea. He was released on a $250,000 personal recognizance bond. Andrew M. Lawler, Zehil's lawyer, declined to comment on the case Wednesday." The Journal notes, "The case has unfolded swiftly. According to the criminal complaint issued Wednesday, Zehil's actions were first uncovered by a McGuireWoods associate, who reported them to firm management on Feb. 9. The firm then conducted an internal investigation, contacted clients, sought Zehil's resignation and referred the matter to the SEC. … 'The actions described in today's filings are totally inconsistent with the high standards of ethics and integrity that are the very foundation of our firm,' McGuireWoods chairman Richard Cullen said in a statement Wednesday. He added that Zehil had apparently acted on his own benefit and that the 750-lawyer firm would continue to cooperate with authorities in the matter."

DOJ To Appeal Dismissal Of Enron Broadband Charge. The Houston Chronicle (3/1, Hays) reports, "The Justice Department will seek to preserve through an appeal one of five jury convictions won last year against the former finance chief of Enron's broadband division, according to a court filing." The Chronicle continues, "Prosecutors filed a notice this week saying they will appeal U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore's late January decision to erase Kevin Howard's conviction of falsifying books. That appeal would go before the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which already tossed out convictions in a separate Enron case because of the same issue that prompted Gilmore to wipe Howard's record clean. … Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch declined comment beyond the filing. Jack Zimmermann, one of Howard's attorneys, declined to comment." The Chronicle adds, "Gilmore threw out all five convictions that prosecutors won against Howard in a retrial last year. His first trial alongside four other ex-broadband executives ended in 2005 with a few acquittals and jurors hung on dozens of other counts. … Last year, the government conceded that Howard's four convictions of conspiracy and wire fraud should be erased because they were unlikely to stand up on appeal. … Prosecutors based that concession on an August 2-1 ruling from a 5th Circuit panel that overturned most convictions of four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in a 2004 Enron-related trial. … In that ruling, the panel said prosecutors improperly presented jurors with a theory that the executives deprived Enron of their honest services when they helped push through a deal that the government said was a loan disguised as an asset sale."

SEC Complaint Details McAfee Options Plan. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A11, Forelle, Hughes) reports, "The former chief executive of McAfee Inc., George Samenuk, knew about a change to a 2002 stock-option grant made in his favor by a subordinate, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint filed yesterday in federal court." The Journal continues, "The complaint charged Kent H. Roberts, McAfee's former general counsel, with fraud for his alleged role in options manipulations at the computer-security software vendor. It follows a criminal indictment of Mr. Roberts handed up Tuesday. … The complaint notes that Mr. Samenuk, who wasn't charged by either the grand jury or the SEC and wasn't identified by name in either complaint, participated in email traffic in which the manipulated grant was discussed. … 'George Samenuk hasn't been charged, and we don't expect him to be,' Elliot Peters, Mr. Samenuk's lawyer, said in a statement." The Journal adds, "On Jan. 15, 2002, the compensation committee of McAfee's board approved a grant of 420,000 options to purchase shares at that day's closing price, $27.19, the SEC complaint says. That day, Mr. Roberts sent an email to Mr. Samenuk and another executive confirming the grant and its price, it says. … The next day, the SEC charges, shares of the Santa Clara, Calif., company fell, and Mr. Roberts sent a note to Mr. Samenuk and the second executive: 'Let's price the 420,000 option shares at today's closing price of $25.43.' That change would have a big effect, increasing Mr. Samenuk's potential profit from the grant by $739,200. (Mr. Samenuk was paid $714,922 in salary in 2001.) … The next week, according to the SEC, Mr. Samenuk wrote back to the two executives: 'On January 16 it appears that the stock price finished at $25.43...is this the price that the new options will be set at?? Is that the low for those days after the Board Meeting??' … Mr. Roberts, the SEC said, replied that the figure was 'the right price.' According to the agency, Mr. Roberts wrote up false board minutes saying that the grant was intended to be made Jan. 16. … Mr. Roberts' lawyer, Stephen Neal, wrote in a statement that he intends to 'vigorously defend against the charges against Mr. Roberts,' but he didn't comment further."

Cox's Views Said To Be Shifting Away From Those Of Investor Groups. The New York Times (3/1, Labaton, 1.16M) reports, "In his first year as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Christopher Cox confounded both supporters and detractors by taking a more moderate and nuanced position than they had predicted on a variety of regulatory issues, based on his record as a conservative Republican lawmaker. In recent weeks, however, Mr. Cox has begun to send signals, both directly and through aides, that he may be swinging the pendulum more toward business and Wall Street interests and against investor groups." The Times adds, "Some investor advocates and securities law experts say that Mr. Cox, by not pushing for tighter regulation of hedge funds and by urging the Supreme Court to adopt a tougher standard for investors in lawsuits, has begun moving closer to the business view that the administration overreacted to the corporate scandals that began with the collapse of Enron in 2001." They "have also criticized his recent decision to appear at the Chamber of Commerce in two weeks just as it is to issue a report criticizing the Bush administration and the S.E.C. for being too hard on companies." Cox "strongly disputes that view, noting, for instance, that his appearance before the chamber should not be perceived as a change in the tilt of the agency."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jurors Continue To Deliberate. Jurors continuing to deliberate in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby sent their first question to the judge, prompting "a lot of head-scratching" but shedding "little light on their progress," the AP (3/1) reports. The jurors "had sent a note" to US District Judge Reggie Walton late Tuesday, seeking clarification, and Walton "and nearly a score of defense lawyers and prosecutors spent part of Tuesday evening in their offices and a portion of Wednesday morning in court puzzling over what the jurors were asking and how to respond. Judge Walton remained uncertain, so he sent the jurors a note late Wednesday morning asking them to clarify their question. By that time, the jurors had resolved their difficulty on their own and moved on. 'After further discussion, we are clear on what we need to do,' the jury wrote back. 'No further clarification needed. Thank you. We apologize.'" The episode "set off a welter of speculation among lawyers and reporters over what it might reveal about the jurors' deliberations since they got the case at midday last Wednesday. Only one thing could be said for certain: They had not told the court they were deadlocked."

USA Today (3/1, Willing, 2.27M) says that in the note "jurors asked whether the lying charge referred to the 'content' of Libby's statement or the fact that the statement was made." The Washington Post (3/1, A3, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) adds that the jury "completed its sixth day of deliberation without reaching a verdict." The New York Times (3/1, Lewis, 1.16M) also summarizes the episode.

Federal Officials Cracking Down On "Sex Tourists." USA Today (3/1, Leinwand) reports, "U.S. travelers who book trips to countries that are hot spots for child prostitution will begin this month to see ads, brochures and billboards warning that sexual adventures abroad could land them in prison here." USA continues, "The warnings, written and distributed by religious organizations, child-welfare groups and the federal government, are a sign of a new assault by the Bush administration on the international child sex trade. They also reflect a new law intended to catch U.S. residents who engage in or promote sex with children overseas. … 'People assume they can go out of the country and get away with exploiting children in this horrific way,' says Mike Garcia, assistant secretary of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement. 'We're sending a message. We have the power to (arrest them), and we have the will.'" USA notes, "In the past six months, U.S. authorities have arrested two men from Washington state who are accused of having sex in Cambodia with underage boys, and an 85-year-old Los Angeles man is accused of trying to fly to the Philippines for sex with two preteen girls. … Another man, Richard Schmidt, 61, of Baltimore, arrives in the USA today to face charges that he traveled to Cambodia and the Philippines for sex with children. An indictment unsealed Wednesday charges him with molesting eight boys. Schmidt, a former teacher, has been convicted three times of molesting children in the USA. He was released from prison in July 2000. Schmidt fled to the Philippines in June 2002 after Maryland authorities issued an arrest warrant for parole violations, U.S. Department of Justice officials said Wednesday. … Investigators from Immigration and Customs Enforcement have more than 20 other cases underway, including 11 American men who were arrested by Mexican authorities and are awaiting extradition. … The arrests were made under a child-protection law President Bush signed April 30. It includes a provision that U.S. law enforcement officials say gives them a new tool to prosecute hard-core pedophiles and 'sex tourists' who want to engage in sex with children. … Although it had been illegal since 1986 to go abroad with the intent to have sex with someone under 18, prosecutors say the crime was difficult to prove in court. To get a conviction under the new law, prosecutors do not have to prove that U.S. residents left the country specifically to have illegal sex — only that they had illegal sex or tried to do so."

US Attorney Subpoenas New Jersey Governor's Office. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/1, Ung, Moroz, 385K) reports New Jersey US Attorney Christopher Christie subpoenaed records from the office of Gov. Jon Corzine, "part of a widening investigation into whether lawmakers personally profited by steering money to certain causes. The subpoenas delivered to the offices of the governor and his chief counsel demand all documents regarding grants that legislators have put in state budgets since 2004." An attached letter from Christie "requests, in particular, e-mail relating to 'grants and assistance, popularly known as 'Christmas Tree items.' That phrase refers to last-minute grants secured as officials finalize the state budget each year," also "commonly called 'pork.'" The investigation into the"closed-door, late-night budget process grew out of a federal criminal probe of State Sen. Wayne Bryant." The US Attorney's Office "is investigating whether Bryant was paid a part-time salary at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey to do nothing other than use his chairmanship of the Budget and Appropriations Committee to steer money to the school."

The Newark Star-Ledger (3/1, Whelan) reports the period under the subpoena "spans the administrations of governors James E. McGreevey, Richard Codey, and Corzine, who are all Democrats. While the grants are initiated by lawmakers in a secretive process, the governor must approve them or use his line-item veto to strike them from the budget or reduce them." The AP (2/28) also reports on the subpoenas.

WNBC-TV New York (2/28, 6:02 p.m.) reported, "A rare move by federal investigators today: Subpoenas were served on the office of Gov. Jon Corzine as part of an ongoing corruption probe. A single FBI agent served the papers earlier today. … An unidentified FBI agent having just served a subpoena on the governor's lawyer walks across the state house hall way to serve another subpoena in the governor's main office. It is a shockwave in an investigation that began with the financial dealings" of Bryant.

"Volley Of Subpoenas" Hit New Jersey Lawmakers Last Month. Newhouse News Service (3/1) says the "volley of subpoenas" that were "served on both Democratic and Republican leaders in the Senate and Assembly" two weeks ago "were reportedly part of a rapidly expanding corruption investigation into the Statehouse" by Christie. The subpoenas, "delivered by FBI agents as lawmakers were heading home" on Friday, February 16, "left many in Trenton thunderstruck. 'Trenton is on fire,' declared Assemblyman Kevin O'Toole, R-Wayne, as news of the subpoenas broke. 'This is equivalent to Rome burning.'"

State Senator's Fraud Trial Postponed Following DUI Charge. The AP (2/28) reports US District Judge Curtis Collier "has delayed state Sen. Jerry Cooper's fraud trial two months, agreeing to give the Morrison Democrat until June 4 to recover from a wreck that got him charged with driving under the influence." Before the February 7 "single-vehicle accident," Collier "had refused Cooper's request to delay the March 5 trial until after the legislative session ends in May. Cooper was seriously injured when his sport utility vehicle overturned several times on Interstate 24 in Rutherford County after he attended three legislative receptions in Nashville. The DUI charge follows a blood-alcohol test by the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation lab." The Chattanoogan (3/1) also reports on the delay.

Tennessee Highway Patrol Denies Favoritism In Handling Of Case. The AP (3/1, Poovey) reports that when Cooper "overturned his sport utility vehicle after attending three legislative receptions, the Tennessee highway patrol commander rushed to the wreck behind working patrol officers and emergency responders. A Department of Safety spokesman initially said preliminary reports showed no alcohol in the Morrison Democrat's vehicle, but at least one witness who stopped on Interstate 24 the evening of Feb. 7 said there was an empty Jack Daniel's bottle nearby." TBI "rushed Cooper's blood-alcohol test and gave the results to the Department of Safety" and Cooper "was charged with driving under the influence and speeding," but "three weeks after the wreck, the results of the test still haven't been released to the public. The department also has refused to say how fast Cooper was driving." The handling of the "wreck and subsequent DUI charge has raised questions about whether the lawmaker got special treatment because of political favoritism." Tennessee Highway Patrol Commander Col. Mike Walker, who is "still trying to shake off a political favoritism scandal," said Cooper "has received no preferential treatment from him or the Highway Patrol."

Philadelphia Imam Sentenced On Weapons Charges. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/1, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "A West Philadelphia imam who argued that he was entrapped by federal agents investigating unfounded terrorism suspicions was sentenced yesterday to eight years and four months in prison on weapons charges. Wayne Hogue, who is also known as Imam Wadir and Shaheed Bay, was secretly recorded selling 11 guns, including three assault rifles, to an FBI informant working for the Joint Terrorism Task Force. In early 2002, terrorism task-force agents had asked the informant, Hezekiah Salone, to keep 'his ears and eyes open' for trouble at Hogue's mosque, at 52d and Chestnut Streets in West Philadelphia, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Zaleski. Salone did not find evidence of terrorism or drug-dealing." US District Judge Timothy Savage, "who has privately reviewed secret FBI files in the case, said yesterday that the mosque was not suspected of any wrongdoing. However, after spending more than a year developing Hogue's confidence, the informant was able to record 11 gun sales in a 10-month period."

Two Plead Guilty In Trash-Hauling Racketeering Scheme. The Westchester Journal News (3/1, O'Connor) reports, "Two former managers at a Mount Kisco trash transfer station have pleaded guilty to their part in a reputed mob-backed racketeering effort to control the garbage-hauling industry in southern Connecticut and parts of the Lower Hudson Valley." Scott McGowan and Jeremy Everett "pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven, Conn., to conspiring to commit racketeering. The crime carries a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison. But federal sentencing guidelines will likely call for a much lesser sentence." Last June, a New Haven federal grand jury indicted 29 people "in what federal prosecutors said was a scheme by some trash haulers to carve up territory, inflate prices, and not compete against each other for contracts. The alleged conspiracy was backed by mob muscle, federal authorities said, as a means to persuade haulers to play by the scheme's rules."

Alleged Florida Mobster Pleads Guilty To Racketeering. The Miami Herald (3/1, Waller) reports, "Albert Facchiano, a 96-year-old Miami man believed to be the oldest person ever indicted by federal authorities, pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges of racketeering, loan sharking and intimidating a witness who was poised to testify against the Genovese crime family." The Herald continues, "Facchiano appeared in federal court in Fort Lauderdale and used headphones to hear the judge and his attorneys. … Because of back troubles, he sat, instead of standing, to enter his guilty plea." The Herald adds, "He could face up to 20 years for federal conspiracy and racketeering charges filed in Florida, and up to 10 more for federal charges of witness tampering filed in New York. … Facchiano, who turns 97 this month, sees a doctor four times a week and 'couldn't have withstood two trials,' said his lawyer, Brian McComb. … Prosecutors said Facchiano, nicknamed 'The Old Man,' supervised associates who committed crimes including extortion, robberies, money laundering and bank fraud. … Federal prosecutors in both states, along with the U.S. Department of Justice, have recommended that Facchiano be sentenced to house arrest."

Witness Intimidation Keeps Prosecutors From Bringing Charges. The New York Times (3/1, Kocieniewski) reports from Newark, NJ, "When Yusef Johnson, a 15-year-old honors student, was killed outside an apartment complex here so gang-infested it is known as Crazyville, a witness came forward within days and told the police she knew the man she had seen fire the fatal shots. … In another case three months later, in November 2005, officers found two people who identified a street gang leader as the man they saw kill a marijuana dealer named Valterez Coley during a dispute over a woman. … And when Isaiah Stewart, a 17-year-old wearing an electronic monitoring bracelet from a recent brush with the law, was gunned down that December, another Newark teenager sketched a diagram of the crime scene, correctly identified the murder weapon and named a former classmate as the person he had watched commit the crime." The Times continues, "They seem like slam-dunk cases, but none of the three suspects have been arrested. It is not that detectives are unsure of their identity or cannot find them. Rather, it is because so many recent cases here have been scuttled when witnesses were scared silent that the Essex County prosecutor has established an unwritten rule discouraging pursuit of cases that rely on a single witness, and those in which witness statements are not extensively corroborated by forensic evidence." The Times adds, "The 3 are among at least 14 recent murders in Newark in which witnesses have clearly identified the killers but no charges have been filed, infuriating local police commanders and victims' relatives. … In 8 of the 14 cases, according to court documents and police reports, there was more than one witness; in two of them, off-duty police officers were among those identifying the suspects. But in a DNA era, these are cases with little or no physical evidence, and they often involve witnesses whose credibility could be compromised by criminal history or drug problems, or both. … The tension between the police and prosecutors here over the evolving standards of evidence required to authorize arrest warrants is a stark example of the profound effect witness intimidation is having on the criminal justice system in New Jersey and across the country." The Times notes, "Surveys conducted by the National Youth Gang Center, which is financed by the federal Department of Justice, have found that 88 percent of urban prosecutors describe witness intimidation as a serious problem. … In both Baltimore and Boston, where "stop snitching" campaigns by rap artists and gang leaders have urged city residents not to cooperate with the authorities, prosecutors estimate that witnesses face some sort of intimidation in 80 percent of all homicide cases."

Maryland Prosecutor Wants To Emulate Federal Approach To Securing Witness Testimony. The Washington Post (3/1, T03, Castaneda) reports that Maryland "State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey said he is considering emulating the methods federal prosecutors used to obtain the testimony of fearful witnesses. Ivey said he distributed copies of a news article about the convictions to prosecutors in his office to get them to start thinking about using the federal approach." The Post examines examples of witness intimidation in a recent federal drug trial and reports that "federal prosecutors overcame that with a straightforward approach and some old-school technology, said Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein. … When his office wins an indictment, a lead prosecutor and a case agent (from the FBI, in this instance) are assigned, and it is their responsibility to stay in touch with witnesses and make sure they appear in court, Rosenstein said." The Post adds, "Federal prosecutors also make it clear to witnesses that they can face legal consequences if they do not appear for court. … 'We are very aggressive in assuring that witnesses show up,' Rosenstein said. 'If they don't show, we get an arrest warrant, and they can be prosecuted for contempt of court or obstruction. If they take the stand and testify falsely, they can be prosecuted for perjury.' … To guard against witnesses who at trial suffer sudden memory loss or deviate from their grand jury testimony, federal prosecutors often record the grand jury testimony of government witnesses, Rosenstein said."

Ney, En Route To Prison, Thanks Friends For Support. The Hill (3/1, Kucinich) reports former Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), "who will report today to federal prison in West Virginia, issued an emotional goodbye e-mail yesterday to friends and colleagues. He thanked them for their support over the past six months and told them he had 'gained a higher power' to help him through his incarceration." The e-mail "closed with a quote from Garth Brooks's "The Dance": 'And now I'm glad I didn't know/ The way it all would end, the way it all would go/ Our lives are better left to chance/ I could have missed the pain/ But I'd have had to miss the dance.'" Ney "will serve a sentence of 30 months on federal bribery charges. He resigned from Congress in November after pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy and making false statements."

New Jersey Lawmakers Consider Bill Targeting Online Sex Offenders. The AP (3/1, Hester) reports from Trenton, NJ, "Amid growing concern about child safety on the computer, New Jersey lawmakers are considering a measure to prohibit released sex offenders from using the Internet and to impose new rules for online dating sites. … 'We're living in some very scary times,' said Senate President Richard J. Codey, who is spearheading New Jersey's effort. 'No matter how much you trust your kids, no matter how much you think you know what they're doing, there are some sick people out there who will stop at nothing to prey on them.'" The AP adds, "Released sex offenders caught using the Internet would face up to 18 months in jail and fines of up to $10,000. Sex offenders caught using the Internet to solicit a child would face a mandatory five years in jail, rather than the three years they face under the current law. … The measure also requires online dating sites to tell New Jersey residents whether they do background checks. … No federal law imposes Internet restrictions on convicted sex offenders, though Florida and Nevada have laws imposing computer restrictions on sex offenders. … The plan is to be considered soon by the state Senate, but already has raised constitutional questions. Internet companies like Yahoo!, AOL, eHarmony and Match.com are also concerned about the online dating rule." The AP notes, "A 2000 U.S. Department of Justice survey of youths ages 10 to 17 found that about one in five received a sexual solicitation or approach over the Internet in the prior year. The concern has prompted several states to take steps against child solicitation through the Internet. … The New Jersey proposal would apply to sex offenders subject to Megan's Law registration, community supervision for life and those on probation or parole."

SCOTUS Rules Cross-Examination Rule Not Retroactive. The AP (3/1, Sherman) reports, "The Supreme Court unanimously reinstated a Nevada child molester's conviction Wednesday in a decision that continued the justices' refusal to apply recent rulings on criminal procedure to older cases." The AP continues, "Marvin Bockting was convicted in 1988 on the strength of his stepdaughter's statements to police. But then-6-year-old Autumn Bockting did not testify at Bockting's trial, so his lawyers never had the opportunity to question the child." The AP adds, " In 2004, the Court ruled that defendants have a constitutional right to cross-examine witnesses against them. … The question in this case was whether that rule would apply to older cases like Bockting's. Justice Samuel Alito, writing for the Court, said it would not. The 2004 case 'did not effect a change of this magnitude,' Alito said." The AP notes, "The Supreme Court has refused a dozen times over 17 years to apply new rules of criminal procedure to older cases. … Alone among federal appeals courts, however, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the rule should apply retroactively and overturned Bockting's conviction. … Nevada and the Bush administration urged the justices to conclude that the San Francisco-based court got it wrong. Among other things, they said courts would be burdened by defendants whose convictions depended on out-of-court statements that were not subject to cross-examination."

LAPD "Most-Wanted" Gang Suspect Arrested In Guatemala. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Winton, McGreevy) reports, "An alleged 18th Street gang member named three weeks ago as one of the Los Angeles Police Department's 10 most wanted gang members has been captured in Guatemala and deported back to Texas, officials said today." The Times continues, "Angel Zevallos, an alleged 18th Street Westside member who goes by the name 'Spanky,' was captured last week and deported by Guatemalan authorities, said Chief Inspector John Clark of the U.S. Marshals Service in Los Angeles. … Zevallos will appear before a judge in Texas and then face extradition back to California to face an attempted murder charge, Clark said." The Times adds, "Police Chief William J. Bratton confirmed the arrest as the first success of a new program in which the department released a list of its 10 most wanted gang members. … The listing of gang fugitives and of the 11 worst gangs is part of a new campaign to reduce gang violence, which increased more than 15% citywide last year. Bratton has redeployed more than 200 officers to the crackdown on gangs. … Zevallos allegedly wounded a man in a bar fight in Los Angeles."

Two Picasso Painting Stolen In Paris. The New York Times (3/1, Riding) reports from Paris, "Two important paintings by Picasso estimated by the police to be worth a total of about $66 million have been stolen from the Left Bank home of his granddaughter Diana Widmaier-Picasso, the authorities announced Wednesday." The Times continues, "Paris police officials said the two oils, 'Maya With Doll' from 1938 and 'Portrait of Jacqueline' from 1961, were taken from Ms. Widmaier-Picasso's house on the Rue de Grenelle in the city's chic Seventh Arrondissement sometime overnight between Monday and Tuesday. … The police said that two drawings, one by Picasso, were also stolen, but this could not be confirmed by the Picasso family lawyer, Céline Astolfe." The Times adds, "In a telephone interview Ms. Astolfe said that Ms. Widmaier-Picasso and her mother, Maya, the daughter of Picasso's longtime mistress Marie-Thérèse Walter, were asleep in the house when the theft occurred. … The lawyer said the theft appeared to be the work of professionals because the home's alarms were neutralized and there were no signs of a break-in. … Although the paintings formed part of the Picasso family's private collection, they are nonetheless well known and, art experts said, would be difficult to sell on the open market. Ms. Astolfe said their value might exceed the police estimate."

$80 Million Sought For DC Law Enforcement Museum. The Washington Post (3/1, B1, Ruane) reports, "You're a cop. You've been summoned to an alley behind a strip mall that's a known drug hangout. You hail a man and two women lounging by an old car. … The man, a beefy guy in a plaid work shirt, gets belligerent and starts toward you. One of the women grabs his arm to hold him back, and as you focus on them, the other woman slips a pistol from her pocket and opens fire. … Bang. You're dead." The Post continues, "This big-screen interactive simulation of an eight-second slice in the virtual life of an everyday cop was demonstrated yesterday as the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund kicked off the money-raising campaign for a new museum, planned to open in 2011 near Judiciary Square. … Nearly $30 million has been raised for the museum, which is designed to showcase police work and the history of American law enforcement. Yesterday's event began a drive to raise the rest of the $80 million cost, with officials previewing some of the attractions. … The police training simulation, in which participants must make snap shoot-or-don't-shoot decisions, is one of several interactive features. Visitors also will be able to attend a simulated autopsy -- which will be 'instructive, not gross' -- do realistic forensic and detective work, and see a word-class collection of police memorabilia, according to museum officials." The Post notes, "The fundraising drive was launched at the National Press Club with a boost from former presidents Bill Clinton and George H. W. Bush, who spoke via video recording, and former U.S. attorneys general John D. Ashcroft, Dick Thornburgh and Edwin A. Meese, who spoke in person. Several local officials also attended, including D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, D.C. Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier, Prince George's County Police Chief Melvin C. High and Fairfax County Police Chief David M. Rohrer."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Hears Arguments On Faith-Based Initiative Legal Challenges. USA Today (3/1, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "Supreme Court justices appeared ready Wednesday to limit taxpayers' ability to challenge government funding of groups with religious affiliations. Several justices were skeptical of a lower court decision allowing a Wisconsin group, the Freedom From Religion Foundation, to sue the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives." The foundation "says the White House office -- created by President Bush to help religious groups compete with secular ones for federal social services grants -- aims to support an unconstitutional government endorsement of religion." Some justices, including Chief Justice John Roberts and Antonin Scalia, "suggested that if the lower court's decision were affirmed, taxpayers would bring frivolous lawsuits challenging government spending that touches religion. … More sympathetic to the challengers, Justice Stephen Breyer said that 'people become terribly upset when they see some other religion getting the money from the state.'"

The Financial Times (3/1, Washington) says "a federal appeals court in Chicago sided with the atheist group but the US Justice Department says the ruling should be overturned on the grounds that it could lead to a flood of taxpayer lawsuits challenging all sorts of government spending."

The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Savage, 850K) reports, "US Solicitor General Paul Clement said taxpayers who believe the White House is unconstitutionally promoting religion should not be accorded legal "standing" to sue in court. It would be too 'intrusive on the executive branch' to permit lawsuits contesting how the president and his advisers conduct their affairs, he said." The Times adds, "Overall, the nine justices seemed split during the hour-long argument. If they adopt the administration's view, the ruling could make it harder for critics to sue officials who use public money in ways that support religion. If the justices rule in favor of Freedom From Religion, the group would still have to prove its case in court."

The Wall Street Journal (3/1, Anderson, 2.04M) also describes the courts as "sharply divided…along conservative and liberal lines, with Justice Anthony Kennedy, a moderate conservative, controlling the outcome. … A wild card in the outcome could be…Scalia, who appeared troubled with Supreme Court precedents limiting when Establishment Clause suits could be brought and concerned with making it easy to challenge a variety of government activities."

The Washington Post (3/1, A6, Barnes, 690K) notes Roberts "wondered whether opponents of the administration's initiatives would extend their concerns to the court itself, which opened yesterday's session, as it always does, with a marshal appealing for God to 'save the United States and this honorable court.'" Alito, Scalia and Roberts "seemed most sympathetic to the government's argument, and Justice Anthony M. Kennedy worried about the courts 'supervising the White House.'" Justice Clarence Thomas did not ask questions, but has written in the past that he does not think that the establishment clause gives rise to individual complaints."

The New York Times (3/1, Greenhouse, 1.16M) says that for Clement, "the most helpful hand was that of Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. As the solicitor general batted back tricky hypothetical questions, Justice Alito asked him whether the lines he was drawing 'make a lot of sense in an abstract sense' or were 'the best that can be done' under existing precedents. 'The latter, Justice Alito,' Mr. Clement said, evoking laughter. 'I appreciate the question.'"

The AP (3/1, Frommer) reports, "At issue is whether a Wisconsin-based group of atheists and agnostics have legal standing, by virtue of being taxpayers, to bring their complaint in the federal court system. … Taking one extreme, Justice Stephen Breyer asked a lawyer for the White House whether a taxpayer would be able to challenge a law in which Congress sets up a church at Plymouth Rock. … ' would say no,'responded Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, but he added that such a church could be challenged in other ways — just not on the basis that a taxpayer has been injured. Clement is representing the Bush administration, which is trying to prevent the taxpayer suit over its aggressive promotion, through the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, of federal financial aid for religious charities. … Taking the opposite extreme, Justice Antonin Scalia asked a lawyer for the Wisconsin group, Andrew Pincus, whether taxpayers would be able to sue over the use of security money for a presidential trip where religion is discussed. … Pincus said that taxpayers would not have standing to do so, arguing that in such a case the money spent would be "incidental," and not central to the issue."

The Legal Times (3/1, Mauro) reports, "Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer looked skyward Wednesday as he tried to come up with a 'more amazing' hypothetical during arguments in a key church-state case. With or without divine intervention, he found one: Could the federal government fund churches and ministers of a single religion nationwide 'dedicated to the proposition that this particular sect is the true sect,' without fear of taxpayer lawsuits against it? … 'Horrible hypothetical,' growled Solicitor General Paul Clement, but he went on to say yes. 'The bottom line is that there would not be taxpayer standing.' With a helpful suggestion from Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., Clement qualified his point by asserting that adherents of other religions could file suit against such a program on the basis that they were being discriminated against. But Clement held firm on the point that taxpayers, merely as taxpayers, could not challenge a network of government-funded churches." The Times adds, "That exchange may prove crucial in determining the outcome of the case before the Court, Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation. The Wisconsin-based foundation filed a taxpayer lawsuit against the Bush administration's funding of faith-based initiatives, claiming that conferences sponsored under the funding program favor religious groups. The government defended the program, claiming the plaintiffs did not have standing, but the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the foundation could continue with its suit. … The case is an important test not only for the faith-based initiative but also for a 39-year-old precedent that has treated First Amendment establishment-clause cases differently when it comes to standing. … In other contexts, taxpayers can't challenge government programs in court solely on the grounds that their tax dollars are being misused. To prevent trivial lawsuits, the high court has required plaintiffs to show a more direct injury or a bigger stake, such as a violation of rights or a denial of benefits. … But in the 1968 case of Flast v. Cohen, the Court made an exception. It ruled that taxpayer status alone was enough to achieve standing when the claim is that a congressional expenditure violates the First Amendment's bar against establishment of religion."

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (3/1, Skiba) reports, "Anne Gaylor, Wisconsin's best-known atheist, has fought to keep church and state separate for almost 30 years. But the 80-year-old Gaylor marked a first Wednesday when a lawsuit she brought was heard by the United States Supreme Court." The Sentinel continues, "Attorneys said the case, the subject of hourlong arguments Wednesday, is the first challenge to the Bush administration's faith-based initiatives to reach the high court. … The separation-of-church-and-state case, also the first of its type to be heard under Chief Justice John Roberts, hinges on a narrow but key legal question: Can the average taxpayer allege violations of the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, which states: 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion . . . '" The Sentinel adds, "Gaylor, who lives in Madison, was on hand with other officials of the Freedom from Religion Foundation, which she founded in 1978. The dispute arose when Gaylor and her foundation filed suit against the Bush program in federal court in Wisconsin in 2004. … A judge tossed out the case, saying the plaintiffs lacked standing, which is a legal concept establishing whether someone has the right to appear in court to pursue his or her claims. The judge said the case failed a test established by the Supreme Court in that the plaintiffs' case involved the executive branch, not Congress' taxing and spending powers. … The Chicago-based 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed with the lower court. Its 2-1 majority said the foundation's suit should go forward because 'there is so much that executive officials could do to promote religion in ways forbidden by the establishment clause.' … That prompted the director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives to ask the Supreme Court to weigh in. "

FEC Fines Anti-Kerry 527 Group. The Washington Post (3/1, A8, Cillizza, Mosk, 690K) reports, "The Federal Election Commission levied one of its largest fines ever yesterday against the Progress for America Voter Fund, a conservative group that raised $44 million to help undermine Democrat John Kerry's 2004 presidential bid." The fine "was the latest in a series of FEC penalties imposed on high-profile independent groups that operated on both sides of the 2004 presidential elections. The FEC is trying to send a message to the '527' organizations, FEC Chairman Robert Lenhard said in a statement." Progress for America "agreed to pay the $750,000 fine as part of the deal, which did not require the group to admit wrongdoing."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI May Reopen 1968 South Carolina Civil Rights Slayings. The (SC) State (3/1, Brundrett) reports, "The FBI might reopen an investigation into the 1968 slayings by police of three black students at S.C. State College — known as the Orangeburg Massacre — and two other civil rights-era deaths in South Carolina." The State continues, "The S.C. cases are among about 100 death cases nationwide the FBI said it will re-examine in partnership with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, National Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller on Tuesday announced the 'Civil Rights-Era Cold Case Initiative' with leaders of the civil rights organizations." The State adds, "Cleveland Sellers, who was among 30 people shot during the Feb. 8, 1968, incident at the S.C. State College campus, said Wednesday an investigation of the Orangeburg case is 'certainly overdue.' … 'The Orangeburg Massacre is, in fact, a litmus test for racial relations in South Carolina,' said Sellers, 63, now head of the African-American studies department at the University of South Carolina. 'I want the incident to be thoroughly investigated and the truth to come out.'" The State adds, "Lonnie Randolph, president of the state NAACP conference, said his organization recommended the Orangeburg case to the FBI after polling member branches statewide. … 'Our goal always is for justice to prevail,' he said. 'To kill three people — it's hard to think justice has been served when individuals are shot in the back.' … Former Gov. Robert McNair, who has been criticized by black leaders for his handling of the incident, said Wednesday in a prepared statement that any decision by the FBI and U.S. Department of Justice to reopen their investigation is 'certainly up to them.' … 'Immediately after the tragedy at Orangeburg, we requested that the FBI and Department of Justice conduct a full and comprehensive investigation of all of the events surrounding this incident since we felt very strongly that the state of South Carolina could not investigate itself,' said McNair." The State notes, "The initial FBI probe led to federal charges against eight state troopers and another police officer. They were acquitted later by a mostly white jury. … Besides that incident, the FBI said this week it also will re-examine the death of a 13-year-old Edisto Island boy whose body washed ashore in Charleston County in 1960, and the 1965 shooting death of a man in an area of Allendale County where civil rights demonstrations were held. Both victims were black. … Most of the cases referred to the FBI are from the South. Georgia, for example, has 13 cases, and North Carolina, three. … Thom O'Neill, spokesman at the FBI office in Columbia, said Wednesday the decision whether to formally reopen any of the three S.C. cases will be made by Brian Lamkin, special agent in charge of the FBI's S.C. operations. No deadlines have been set to complete investigations, he said."

Louisiana Victims Among Civil Rights Cold Cases To Be Reopened. The Shreveport Times (3/1) reports, "Nine Louisianans are included in a list of 76 suspicious or criminal deaths in the 1950s and 1960s that spurred the FBI to reopen investigations into possible civil rights abuses from that turbulent time." The Times continues, "Bureau officials on Tuesday announced the investigations amid a Justice Department focus on cracking unsolved cases from the nation's civil rights era. … The high-priority cases, which FBI Director Robert S. Mueller described as numbering between 10 and 12, are among an estimated 100 that investigators nationwide are looking at as possible civil rights-related murders." The Times adds, "None of the nine Louisiana cases in the list maintained by the Alabama-based Southern Poverty Law Center occurred in the immediate Northwest Louisiana area. But several did take place in Ruston and Monroe, including one 1960 shooting rampage where four people were killed. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged that many of the cases may be beyond the boundaries of what the federal government can legally prosecute. But they "remain on our radar," he said. … 'Much time has passed on these crimes,' Gonzales told reporters in Washington. 'The wounds they left are deep, and still many of them have not healed. But we are committed to re-examining these cases and doing all we can to bring justice to the criminals who may have avoided punishment for so long.' … Addressing civil rights violators, Gonzales said: 'You have not gotten away with anything — we are still on your trail.'"

More Commentary. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (3/1) editorializes, "The LeFlore County (MS) grand jury has decided not to issue any indictments in the 1955 slaying of Emmett Till. That may be disappointing to those who have worked to bring justice in this case. But the grand jury did its job. The tragedy is that it took so long for the case to be fully considered." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "District Attorney Joyce Chiles of Greenville should be commended for reviewing the 8,000 pages of evidence and presenting it. Only time seems to have killed chances for prosecution, not lack of diligence today. … The Aug. 28, 1955, slaying of Till remains a pivotal moment in the civil rights movement. Till was killed after he reportedly whistled at a white woman, Carolyn Bryant, the last known living suspect. Her then-husband, Roy, and his half-brother, J.W. Milam, admitted they killed Till after an all-white jury had acquitted them. Both have since died. … But the case is also noteworthy, since it: … Is one of 29 killings from the civil rights era since 1989 reopened, leading to 28 arrests and 22 convictions; … Should spur a 'cold case' unit of the Justice Department to investigate unsolved civil rights killings in a bill before Congress. … Justice can come still."

DOJ Meets With NAACP, Connecticut Officials. The Connecticut Post (3/1, Mason) reports from Ansonia, CT, "For the second time in as many months, city officials and officers with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People met with staff from the U.S. Department of Justice. … As was the case after a similar January meeting, attendees were vague about what was discussed with officials from the Department of Justice's Community Relations Service, designed for resolving conflicts dealing with race, color and national origin. … The two-hour meeting, held in the Erlingheuser Room at City Hall, was closed to the public and the media." The Post continues, "Attending Wednesday's session were Mayor Jim Della Volpe, Police Chief Kevin Hale, Corporation Counsel Kevin Blake, local NAACP President Greg Johnson, Housing Authority Executive Director Jim Finnucan, former alderwoman Ralphine Ford and Riverside Apartments tenant leader Naomi Wallace. Johnson did not elaborate on concerns brought up at the meeting; he only said that he thought the meeting offered plenty of positives. … 'It was to discuss strategies and ways to improve the quality of life for all citizens of Ansonia,' Johnson said. 'It was a very productive meeting.' … He said 'a gamut of things' was discussed. … Johnson said the group will meet again, but he did not say when."

Justices To Hear Case Regarding Schools' Powers To Limit Student Speech. USA Today (3/1, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports the U.S. Supreme Court will hear on March 19, a case involving "students' speech rights" and the ability of schools to limit "such rights to try to maintain order in schools." The case involves Joseph Frederick, who as a high school senior in Juneau, Alaska produced a sign reading "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" in an attempt to get TV coverage while the Olympic torch was traveling through the city. He was suspended for ten days by Juneau-Douglas High School Principal Deborah Morse for being in violation of the "school's anti-drug policy." School officials are expected to be "watching for signs of whether the justices will make it more difficult to enforce a range of campus speech regulations that have been imposed in recent years." The National School Boards Association argues in a brief supporting Morse that "it's important for administrators to be able to regulate slogans dealing with particularly controversial issues." Morse "is appealing a federal appeals court's ruling that she is liable for money damages to Frederick because past rulings 'clearly established' that she was not entitled to tear down the 'Bong Hits' sign."

Meehan Proposes Repeal Of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." The Washington Times (3/1, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Democratic Rep. Martin T. Meehan "yesterday said he will introduce legislation repealing the military's 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' policy that allows homosexuals to serve in the armed forces." Meehan said "public opinion has changed since the policy began 14 years ago under the Clinton administration, and that allowing homosexuals to openly serve will help the military retain specialized members, including linguists fluent in Arabic." A 2005 Government Accountability Office report "says more than 10,000 members of the armed services, including 750 service members with specialties 'critical' to the war on terror, have been discharged since the policy was implemented." Meehan said, "It will still be an uphill climb. But the November election can only mean good things for my bill."

Longtime Black Residents Stay Separate From Latino Newcomers In Maryland Neighborhood. The Washington Post (3/1, B1, Parker) reports, "Ask older residents of historic North Brentwood their recollections of the town, and they go into a reverie about kids playing house-to-house and about how the town was self-contained with businesses and shops. Mostly, it was black, and the generations who had lived there gave the place its essence. … But 'change comes,' said Eleanor Traynham, 71, who was born and raised in the town, in Prince George's County, and returned in 1992. And 'you have to be able to adapt to change.'" The Post continues, "On a late afternoon, children run across the lawns of modest three-bedroom homes, young mothers carry groceries, and fathers in coveralls arrive home from work. These families are Latino. A few yards away, much older residents are checking mail or working on their cars or greeting each other with late-day banter. They are black. … In a town changing without overt rancor, they are neighbors without the neighborliness, separate groups leading lives that don't touch, even though their property lines do. It's a new challenge for this historic place -- re-creating community." The Post adds, "It's a challenge that plays out against a backdrop of seismic demographic shifts. In 2003, Latinos overtook African Americans as the nation's most populous minority. Fueled by a boom in construction and low-wage service jobs, the Washington region had the ninth-largest Latino population gain in the country from 2000 to 2004. … In Prince George's, most of the Latino population, which doubled from 1990 to 2000, is concentrated inside the Beltway in the northwestern part of the county. As more Latinos graduate to homeownership, the relative affordability of housing in communities there has accelerated the pace of change. … In North Brentwood, population nearly 500, off Rhode Island Avenue just outside the District line, these shifts play out door-to-door. Since 2000, the historically black town has become 25 percent Hispanic." The Post notes, "Some black residents are concerned about what these changes mean for their community, even as they worry about seeming intolerant. Newer Hispanic residents say they get along with everyone, and if there is subtle awkwardness to their brief hello-goodbye exchanges with black neighbors, they're too busy working and raising their families to notice."

Sharpton Revelation Said To Show Relevance Of Slavery. In his New York Times column (3/1), Bob Herbert says that as the Rev. Al Sharpton's revelation that his family was owned by relatives of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond shows, "The days of slavery are closer than we tend to think, and they were crueler than we tend to realize. Mr. Sharpton's great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton, was sent with his wife and two children from South Carolina to Florida so a woman named Julia Thurmond Sharpton could send them out as laborers to pay off debts left by her late husband." Slavery is "such an uncomfortable subject that the temptation is to relegate it to the distant past and move on. But the long tentacles of that evil institution are still with us. Slavery was the foundation of the thriving consumer society that we have today and the wellspring of the racism that still poisons so many white attitudes and black lives."

In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (3/1), the Rev. Al Sharpton says, "Words cannot fully describe the feelings I had when I learned the awful truth. Not only am I the descendant of slaves, but my family had to endure the particular agony of being slaves to the Thurmonds, the symbol of everything about America that I have fought to change. I felt humiliated and prideful; reflective and angry; oppressed and uplifted." America's "shame is that I am the heir of those who were property to the Thurmond family."

ANTITRUST:

Sirius Chief Takes Push For Radio Merger To Capitol Hill. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, C8, Boles) reports, "Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.'s chief executive, Mel Karmazin, told lawmakers the company would cut consumer prices if federal authorities approve its merger with XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc." The Journal continues, "Mr. Karmazin tried to allay concerns that subscribers' costs would rise after the $11.4 billion merger of the two struggling satellite-radio operators, telling the House Judiciary Committee's antitrust task force the merger would lead to a decline in prices. For basic monthly service, subscribers to both radio operations pay $12.95 a month. 'The idea of raising prices to compete with free radio is bizarre and doesn't work," he said. "We are committed to not raising prices and, in fact, are committed to lowering prices.'" The Journal adds, "Rep. John Conyers (D., Mich.), chairman of both the Judiciary Committee and the task force, was skeptical. 'We don't have too good a record of satellite companies keeping their promises,' Mr. Conyers said. '"Trust me" isn't going to work here, not just today, but in the longer-term examinations you will be going through.'" The Journal notes, "Democratic Rep. Rick Boucher of Virginia said the merger should get a green light as long as the companies agree to a series of conditions and to freeze prices. . … The conditions he suggested were outlined by Gigi Sohn, president of Public Knowledge, a public-interest group with a focus on communications. In her testimony before the task force, Ms. Sohn said the companies would have to allow consumers to subscribe on a channel-by-channel basis or tiered programming. She added they should agree to make 5% of capacity available to noncommercial, educational purposes and freeze prices for three years once the merger is approved."

The Washington Post (3/1, D4, Babington) reports, "The nation's two satellite-radio companies promised yesterday to refrain from raising prices, for a time at least, if they are allowed to merge. But some lawmakers and consumer groups appeared dubious." The Post continues, "Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, told the House Judiciary Committee's antitrust task force that consumers would benefit if the government allowed his company to merge with rival XM Satellite Radio Holdings. 'We are committed to not raising prices, and we are committed to lowering prices,' said Karmazin, who would be chief executive of the new company." The Post adds, "Karmazin said Sirius and XM might accept conditions if the Federal Communications Commission and Justice Department were to approve the merger. But he declined to say how long they might agree to cap subscription prices, now set at $12.95 a month by both companies. XM and Sirius have said a merged company would offer various levels of content, presumably at varying prices, but they have declined to provide details. … Owners of free, over-the-air radio stations strongly oppose the merger, and the president of their association sharply challenged Karmazin at the hearing. The government cannot trust XM's and Sirius's promises, 'given their long track record of breaking FCC rules,' including causing signal interference with local radio stations, said David K. Rehr, president of the National Association of Broadcasters."

USA Today (3/1, 2B, Davidson) reports, "To win approval of their blockbuster merger, the nation's two satellite radio companies would accept government-mandated conditions guaranteeing consumers lower prices and more channels, the head of Sirius Satellite Radio told lawmakers Wednesday. … 'We will give people more choice than they had before and lower prices and less confusion,' Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin told the House Judiciary Committee's new antitrust task force." USA adds, "The hearing served up the first public airing of the proposed link-up between Sirius and XM Satellite Radio since it was announced last week. Wednesday's debate underscored the complexities of the merger, with divisions within the ranks of public-interest advocates and each political party on whether consumers would be helped or hurt. … Critics such as the National Association of Broadcasters say the merger, which requires approval from the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission, would forge a monopoly satellite radio provider that would raise prices and limit choice. Karmazin says that would never happen because satellite radio competes with traditional radio, Internet radio, iPods, music on cellphones and digital radio. … Noting that there are some 10 million subscribers to both services, Karmazin said, 'Why would people who don't subscribe at $12.95 subscribe at $14.95?' … The companies, which each charge about $13 a month for more than 100 channels, have lost billions of dollars between them while competing to sign up high-priced talent such as Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey. By combining, Karmazin said, customers could get both Major League Baseball and the NFL, for instance, on the same radio service. And the new giant could use cost savings to cut prices."

The Washington Times (3/1, Rowland) reports, "Federal lawmakers, kicking off their probe of the proposed $13 billion merger of rivals XM Satellite Radio Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc., yesterday quizzed both Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin and one of the deal's most vocal opponents. … 'We've come to this hearing with an open mind, but we also recognize that the companies have the obligation to convince Congress, regulators and most importantly, the American people that this combination will improve the competitive playing field and benefit consumers,' said House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat." The Times adds, "Mr. Karmazin said a combined entity would be open to government-imposed conditions, including an agreement not to raise subscription prices for a certain period of time. … 'If in order to get the deal done we have to make a concession, we're prepared to make a concession,' he said. … But David Rehr, president of the National Association of Broadcasters and an outspoken critic of the deal, said the merger would create a 'government-sanctioned monopoly.' … 'Two companies that have a pattern and practice of violating their FCC licenses cannot be trusted with monopoly power,' said Mr. Rehr, whose organization represents traditional AM/FM radio stations."

The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Puzzanghera) reports, "Karmazin, who would run the new company if federal regulators approve Sirius' proposed merger with XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc., tried to overcome those hurdles by promising not to hike for an unspecified period the $12.95 monthly subscription rate that both companies charge. … The reason for the concession is simple, Karmazin said, and is the heart of the case Sirius and XM are trying to make: They now compete with a host of technologies that don't charge a cent — including broadcast radio, iPods and music that streams over the Internet." The Times adds, "Price is a major concern for several members of the committee's antitrust task force. Congress doesn't have to approve the deal, but its views could influence officials at the Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission, which must bless the merger. … 'Why would we eliminate one of the two competitors here?' said Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte (R-Va.). 'I believe prices are going up if you are the only one.' … His fears were echoed by Mark Cooper, director of research at the Consumer Federation of America. … 'Competition is the consumer's best friend,' Cooper told the committee, warning that 'a tsunami of mergers will ripple through the digital space' if regulators agree to the market definition urged by Sirius and XM." The Times notes, "Conyers also questioned what effect the potential deal might have on future mergers. … But some lawmakers agreed with Karmazin that the marketplace had changed and indicated they would support the merger with certain conditions, such as requiring a lower-priced option for a limited number of channels. … 'Music is music, and it really doesn't matter much the source of it,' said Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.) "

The New York Times (3/1, Labaton) reports, "Karmazin…repeatedly and angrily contested charges by opponents, including the major trade group for broadcasters, that merging his company with XM Satellite Radio Holdings would simply transform a duopoly into a monopoly. … 'There is no monopoly or duopoly,' he said. 'That's the most bizarre thing I have ever heard.'" The Times adds,. "He maintained that the relevant market for the services offered by the two satellite radio companies includes all terrestrial broadcasters, Internet radio and other popular listening devices, including iPods and other portable music players. … With so much competition from other sources, he said, satellite radio lacks the sway of a dominant industry power. … But as he tried to sell the proposed deal to Washington, he also acknowledged the major challenges he faced in persuading policy makers that it would not be anticompetitive. He made it clear that he was willing to embark on the same kind of deal-making with the regulators that has been a hallmark of his career as a broadcast executive."

Dow Jones Newswires (3/1) reports, "The Department of Justice's antitrust task force would have to approve the merger and FCC rules would have to be changed to allow the deal before it could get final approval." Dow Jones continues, "The NAB, which represents mainly smaller radio and television broadcasters across the U.S., fiercely opposes the deal. … 'The proposed merger must be rejected,' said Rehr in his opening statement. 'Public policy should never allow one entity to acquire state-sanctioned, monopoly control over the 25 megahertz of spectrum allocated to satellite-radio service.' … Taking a somewhat less strident view was Gigi B. Sohn, the president of public-interest group Public Knowledge. … In her opening statement, she said that the merger should be given the green light only if it meets three conditions. … It must make available pricing choices such as channel-by-channel subscriptions or tiered programming; it must hand over 5 percent of its capacity to noncommercial educational programming; and it should agree to not raise prices for three years after the merger is granted approval."

CNET News (3/1, Broache) reports, "Karmazin said a combination of the sole two satellite radio players would lower, or at least cap, its prices and provide more programming choices. … For example, one network carries Major League Baseball games, and the other carries the National Football League games, but neither carries both. Sports fans would no longer have to pay to subscribe to both services or buy two different radio receivers if the entities merged, he said. Karmazin also pledged that existing radio receivers for each service would continue to work after the melding of the companies. … 'We are absolutely convinced that this merger is going to be in the consumer's best interest,' said the Sirius chief and former Viacom president." CNET adds, "Attitudes toward the proposed deal, worth about $13 billion, did not appear to be split along party lines among members of the newly created House task force, which has 10 Democrats and nine Republicans. Many opened their questioning on Wednesday with vows to keep an "open mind" about the deal but went on to question the deal's necessity and its benefits to consumers. … One hurdle already lies in the licenses granted to the companies by the Federal Communications Commission. In hopes of ensuring competition, the FCC stipulated at the time that there had to continue to be more than one licensee in the satellite radio sphere. XM and Sirius would have to persuade the regulators to waive that decision." CNET notes, "Citing the FCC's policy decision, Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), the former chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, challenged XM and Sirius executives' repeated assertions that the merged entity would not constitute a monopoly. … 'What you appear to be advocating is to make your merged company somewhat akin to an old regulated gas company, and I don't see where the consumer ends up benefiting in that,' Sensenbrenner said. … He also questioned how the XM-Sirius plan was any different than a proposed merger between EchoStar Communications' Dish Network and Hughes Electronics' DirectTV that the FCC blocked on the grounds that it amounted to a 'regulated monopoly.' … Karmazin said his companies' situation was different because the satellite TV business competes with cable and not with free services like terrestrial and Internet radio. Throughout the hearing, he repeatedly challenged any suggestion that the merged companies would have incentive to raise their prices by saying, 'We compete with free.'"

Bloomberg (3/1, Rowley, Stern) reports, "The companies contend there is more competition for listeners now than when the original satellite licenses were granted, from devices such as Apple Inc.'s iPod, terrestrial radio and new high-definition stations. … 'We are going to have to convince them that it is not anticompetitive,' Karmazin said, referring to Justice Department and U.S. Federal Communications Commission regulators. He was speaking on behalf of XM as well as Sirius." Bloomberg adds, "Rehr drew his own critics, including Democrats Anthony Weiner from New York and Rick Boucher from Virginia. … 'I would like the panel to oblige me by stop throwing around the word monopoly,' Weiner said. … Boucher agreed with XM and Sirius's contention that the companies compete in a broad audio entertainment market that includes broadcast radio. … 'The very presence of Mr. Rehr here happens to confirm the argument that the relevant market is all of radio,' Boucher said." Bloomberg notes, "Lawmakers and regulators have promised to look closely at the deal because of concerns that it would create a satellite radio monopoly. House Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell, a Democrat from Michigan, said yesterday that he planned his own inquiry in to the deal. The Senate Judiciary Committee's Antitrust Subcommittee also may to hold a hearing."

The Politico (3/1, By:, Glass) reports, "An overflow crowd of industry executives, lawyers and lobbyists packed the hearing room in the House Rayburn Office Building as Karmazin, one of five witnesses, debated the merits of letting his money-losing company combine with XM Radio in a deal that has been valued at $13 billion. … The two firms contend there is more competition for listeners now than when the original satellite licenses were granted. Whether or not the merger goes through, he added, satellite radio, with its 14 million customers, will continue to compete with an increasing array of audio outlets, including AM, FM and multi-channel HD radio, the Internet and a host of download-based music players, such as Apple's iPod." The Politico adds, "Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Tex.), the ranking member on the full committee, noted that 'we are at the beginning of a long process,' a point echoed by Karmazin during his own remarks." The Politico adds, "Some of the most pointed exchanges occurred not with the members but at the long witness table between Karmazin and Mark Cooper, research director of the Consumer Federation of America, an advocacy group. Cooper held that, 'The argument that consumers will be better off with a benevolent monopolist than competition is absurd. Cost savings will not be passed to consumers. It is competition that is the driver of innovation in this economy, and competition is the best form of protection for consumers.' … Karmazin said his people had told him not to get excited and to keep his hands folded at the table. But Cooper, he felt, had gone too far. The monopoly charge, he said, 'is the most bizarre thing I've ever heard… We are not looking to bankrupt our companies. We are not doing anything that stupid. And we'll give back some of that saving (to our customers)'"

The AP (3/1) reports, "When satellite radio was licensed a decade ago, Sirius and XM were granted the only two licenses. In exchange, Federal Communications Commission rules stated that the two wouldn't be allowed to merge in the future. … Sirius and XM have argued that in the ensuing 10 years, the market has changed substantially and they are no longer just competing against each other."

Corporate Attorneys Seek More Clarity In Antitrust Law. The Legal Times (3/1) reports, "Top lawyers for General Electric Co. and Eastman Kodak Co. told federal regulators last month that companies need more clarity in antitrust laws when it comes to the sale of products bundled in a discounted package deal, and to the sale of services and parts for a product. … 'Companies are concerned that the rules aren't clear,' Ronald Stern, vice president and senior counsel for antitrust at General Electric, said in an interview after the hearing." The Times continues, "Testifying in Chicago at a panel organized by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division, the attorneys said regulators should help companies better understand when they might be stepping over the antitrust line in the two areas. … Previous court rulings have left the law ambiguous on when corporate behavior may violate Section 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act and make companies vulnerable to lawsuits by competitors, the lawyers said. … They encouraged the agencies to file amicus briefs in court cases or to issue additional guidelines to make the law clearer. … 'These two areas are a clear problem for companies like Kodak,' Patrick Sheller, the chief compliance officer at Eastman Kodak, said in an interview after the hearing." The Times notes< "David Balto, a former Federal Trade Commission policy director and a lawyer in Washington, agreed that amicus briefs could shed light on how companies are expected to follow the law, especially because most antitrust decisions occur in lower courts. … The price-bundling issue has come up in the courts more frequently than the aftermarket issue and therefore has created greater potential for liability, said Herbert Hovenkamp, an antitrust professor at University of Iowa College of Law. … Sheller told the panel that the line between the legal 'bundling' of products and the illegal 'tying' of products has been blurred."

House Bill Would Stiffen Penalties For Gas Price Gouging. The AP (3/1, Hebert) reports, "Although gasoline prices have dropped sharply from last summer, 79 lawmakers sought to send a message Wednesday, introducing a bill that would impose stiff penalties on oil and gas companies for price gouging." The AP continues, "With prices at the pump rebounding in recent weeks, Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said he's worried 'this summer prices may once again exceed $3 a gallon.' … The bill introduced by Stupak and 78 other members of the House would establish the first federal law against price gouging by oil and gas companies, imposing criminal penalties and fines of up to $150 million for corporations and $2 million on individuals. … The House passed a similar bill last year, but it died in the Senate." The AP adds, "The Federal Trade Commission would be given authority to investigate price gouging in the sale of crude oil, home heating oil, propane and natural gas. … 'The FTC has never brought a gas price gouging case to court,' said Stupak. … In fact, the agency has no authority to do so since there is no federal energy price gouging law. FTC investigations into crude oil or gasoline pricing have focused on whether companies have colluded in violation of antitrust laws." The AP notes, "Last year, FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said a federal law against oil company price gouging would be difficult to enforce and could hurt consumers by causing fuel shortages. … She said price gouging is difficult to define and courts have refused to address the question of what is a "reasonable" price in a free market. She maintained it may be difficult to determine what price hikes are legitimate."

DOJ Subpoenas Genworth Financial Unit In Bid-Rigging Probe. Market Watch (3/1, Boessenkool) reports, "Genworth Financial Inc. disclosed Wednesday that a subsidiary received two subpoenas in November related to probes into the sale of guaranteed investment contracts to municipalities." Market Watch continues, "The subpoenas, a grand jury subpoena from the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Justice Department and a subpoena from the Securities and Exchange Commission, require the unit to turn over information related to investigations into alleged bid-rigging involving the sale of the investment contracts, according to Genworth's annual report filed with the SEC. … Genworth said it doesn't issue these contracts to municipalities. But the insurance company said that from January 2004 to December 2006, the subsidiary provided management and administrative services to a third party that does issue the contracts to municipalities. … Genworth said it plans to cooperate fully with the investigations."

Terex Receives DOJ Subpoena On Equipment Pricing. Market Watch (3/1, Kowsmann) reports, "Terex Corp. disclosed Wednesday that it received subpoenas from the U.S. Department of Justice over some equipment pricing." Market Watch continues, "In its annual report filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Westport, Conn., the manufacturer said the subpoenas relate to the DOJ's investigation into pricing practices in the rock crushing and screening equipment industry. … Terex said it cooperating fully with the investigation. It didn't provide further information."

Marks & Spencer's CEO Mulls Sainsbury Bid. Bloomberg (3/1, Craven, Couch) reports, "Marks & Spencer Group Plc Chief Executive Officer Stuart Rose said he's considering bidding for J Sainsbury Plc, Britain's third-biggest supermarket chain." Bloomberg continues, "Rose, who runs the U.K.'s largest clothing retailer, said he was speaking to customers about an offer for Sainsbury, which has a market value of 8.8 billion pounds ($17 billion). 'You do get quite an interesting response,' he said in a presentation to a London conference held by Retail Week magazine today." Bloomberg adds, "His remarks follow three weeks of speculation that Marks may seek to buy Sainsbury to create a retailer with more than 1,000 outlets. An offer may spark a bidding war with CVC Capital Partners Ltd., Blackstone Group LP and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., which said Feb. 2 they were considering an offer for Sainsbury in what would be Europe's biggest buyout. … 'Assets like this don't come on the market very often,' Rose said today. 'The company is effectively in play. Your shareholders would think you were an idiot if you didn't consider it. Watch this space.'" Bloomberg notes, "Marks said in an e-mailed statement following Rose's remarks that its board had considered bidding for Sainsbury and didn't intend to make an offer 'at this time.' The retailer said it reserved the right to announce a bid or possible bid within the next six months if Sainsbury's board recommends an offer or if a 'firm' approach by the CVC group or another suitor is made."

A&P Parent Negotiating Pathmark Purchase. Market Watch (3/1, Moore) reports, "Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. said it is negotiating to acquire smaller rival Pathmark Stores Inc., as A&P looks to expand its footprint in the competitive supermarket industry. … Under the terms of the proposed deal, announced Tuesday, Pathmark shareholders would receive $12.50 a share in cash and stock." Market Watch continues, "Shares of both companies fell in midday trading Wednesday, after moving sharply higher ahead of the announcement. Pathmark shares were down 2% at $11.71, while A&P saw its shares drop 3.4% to $32.03. … The Montvale, N.J., company , which operates A&P, Waldbaum's and Food Emporium, said no final agreement has been reached. The sale would require shareholder and regulatory approvals, including federal and state antitrust clearances. … 'We have long held that consolidation in the market was necessary and that Pathmark and A&P made the most logical choice for a combination,' Bear Stearns analyst Westcott Rochette wrote in a note to clients, after raising the year-end price target on A&P to $40." Market Watch adds, "Based on the number of shares outstanding when Pathmark reported its third-quarter results, the deal is valued at about $651 million. … Goldman Sachs analyst John Heinbockel said the proposed deal makes sense, but warned against too much optimism. … 'We continue to believe that the combination, while likely to unlock significant cost take-out synergies, carries certain risks,' Heinbockel said. 'These would include systems conversions, banner changes, and the execution of a much-needed, stepped-up capital program.' … News of the negotiations comes as grocery stores are struggling to compete with high-end specialty operators, including Whole Foods Markets Inc. , Trader Joe's and Wegman's, as well as discount giants such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. Last week, Wild Oats Markets Inc. agreed to be acquired by larger rival Whole Foods. See archived story."

Oracle Expected To Announce Acquisition Of Hyperion. The New York Times (3/1, Sorkin, De La Merced) reports, "Oracle is near a deal to acquire Hyperion Solutions, which makes software that allows corporations to analyze and track their performance, for more than $3.1 billion, according to people briefed on the deal. … The acquisition is expected to be announced as early as today, these people said." The Times continues, "The deal would be the latest trophy in a lengthy string of acquisitions by Oracle, the database software giant that has been struggling to grow from within … In December, Oracle posted strong earnings growth for its second fiscal quarter, but its growth in license sales disappointed investors. The company said at the time that it had failed to close some crucial licensing deals during the quarter. License sales rose 28 percent in the quarter, but that was down from 80 percent growth in the previous quarter." The Times adds, "Oracle has long been known as one of the most aggressive acquirers of technology companies. … Led by Lawrence J. Ellison, who sees acquisitions as a tool for growth, the company has at times seemed on the verge of gobbling nearly every rival in the business software market. In the last three years, Oracle spent more than $20 billion on acquisitions, including buying two of its most formidable competitors, PeopleSoft and Siebel. … PeopleSoft, the company Oracle fought over for nearly two years, was its most notable deal. … In December 2004, after a battle for control that grew nasty, Oracle finally acquired PeopleSoft for about $10.3 billion, becoming the second-largest maker of business-management software. … The day after completing the deal, Oracle fired four top officers of PeopleSoft. … Since that deal, Oracle's appetite has been unsatiated. In 2005, the company bought a stake in I-flex Solutions, a maker of financial software based in Mumbai, India, for a reported $909 million."

Record Industry Targets College Students In Piracy Crackdown. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Chmielewski, Puzzanghera) reports, "If they don't quit illegally downloading music, some USC students may end up having to fight on … in court." The Times continues, "The record industry's main trade group said Wednesday that it was mailing letters to 20 of the school's students whom it had identified as bootleggers. … The letters warn that an expensive lesson awaits if the students don't stop the practice. Settle, the dispatches say, or be sued." The Times adds, "The mailings are part of a stepped-up legal fight by the Recording Industry Assn. of America against music downloading amid indications of a dramatic increase in the number of songs exchanged illegally via the Internet. … The association said that overall it was sending 400 warning letters to students at 13 universities and that it expected to sue several thousand students. … 'We'd rather not be doing these lawsuits … but the fact remains that the college environment is one that has rampant piracy,' said association Chairman Mitch Bainwol."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/1, B5) reports, "The move comes as the industry seeks to stamp out what it is says is rampant music piracy on campuses. … The group intends to send hundreds of such pre-litigation letters to university computer users every month. … 'The theft of music remains unacceptably high and undermines the industry's ability to invest in new music,' said Mitch Bainwol, chairman and CEO of the association. 'This is especially the case on college campuses.' … The letters targeted students at Arizona State University, Marshall University, North Carolina State University, North Dakota State University, Northern Illinois University, Ohio University, Syracuse University, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, University of Nebraska, Lincoln, University of South Florida, University of Southern California, University of Tennessee, Knoxville, and University of Texas, Austin."

Northeast Power Producers To Merge. Bloomberg (3/1, Polson) reports, "Astoria Generating Co. and EBG Holdings, closely held owners of power plants in New York City and Boston, said they will merge in a move designed to capitalize on rising regional power demand and limited supply." Bloomberg continues, "The newly formed entity, U.S. Power Generating Co., will be run from New York by Astoria Chief Executive Officer Jacob Worenklein, the companies said today. Hedge funds that own EBG will get 54 percent of the closely held company. Astoria owners, including Madison Dearborn Partners LP and the Hunt Oil family, will get 46 percent. Other details of the agreement weren't disclosed. … The combined value of the plants held by the two companies may be worth $4.25 billion to $5 billion, analysts said. Combined output will be about 5,000 megawatts." Bloomberg notes, "Astoria Generating's three plants supply 20 percent of New York City's power supply and EBG's five plants meet half the electricity needs of Boston, the companies said. U.S. Power Generating expects to benefit from tariffs regulators plan to impose on power customers to encourage costly construction of plants and power lines as both metropolitan areas grow. … Rising electricity demand and planned plant retirements may leave the New York City area short of generating capacity needed to meet demand on the hottest days as early as next year, the New York Independent System Operator, which runs the state's power grid, said in August."

EU To Probe European Central Bank Settlement Platform. The Financial Times (3/1, Buck) reports, "A controversial plan by the European Central Bank to set up and operate a new system for settling share and bond trades in the European Union will come under close scrutiny by the region's top antitrust watchdog." The Times continues, "In an unusual move that adds to the uncertainty surrounding the new regime, the European Commission told EU finance ministers this month that the central bank was not exempt from antitrust laws. … It also told them that the Commission's competition department would carefully examine the so-called Target 2 Securities system - a process that could delay the introduction of the new platform." The Times adds, "Though the Commission does not have concrete concerns at this stage, a probe would most likely focus on whether the ECB system constituted a restrictive business practice or an abuse of monopoly power in violation of EU antitrust rules. … 'Economic activities are subject to competition law irrespective of whether they are undertaken by private companies or by public authorities and other institutions,' the spokesman for Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, said. 'We have informed the financial services committee [the body that prepares meetings of EU finance ministers] that the ECB is not exempt from competition rules.' … He added: 'The ECB proposal has not been finalised, and we would not necessarily find the system incompatible with EU competition rules. It could turn out to be pro-competitive. But we would want to examine it carefully.'"

EU Clears Sale Of BAWAG To Cerberus Group. The AP (3/1) reports, "EU regulators on Wednesday cleared the sale of Austria's BAWAG, the troubled bank linked to collapsed commodities broker Refco, to a consortium headed by private equity fund Cerberus Capital Management." The AP continues, "The European Commission automatically cleared the deal after identifying no antitrust problems and receiving no complaints from rivals within a deadline of 25 working days. … Cerberus and others agreed in December to pay 3.2 billion euros ($4.23 billion) for the bank, Austria's fifth largest." The AP adds, "The bank's current owner, trade union federation OeGB, will get 2.6 billion euros ($3.44 billion) of that with the rest serving as an injection of capital for BAWAG P.S.K. … The consortium -- which includes Wuestenrot, the Austrian branch of Assicurazioni Generali SpA, Oesterreichische Post and a small group of industrialists linked to Hannes Androsch, a former Austrian finance minister -- plans to expand the bank throughout Europe. … BAWAG, formally known as the Bank Fuer Arbeit und Wirtschaft AG, lost more than a billion dollars in soured currency speculation deals in the Caribbean and has been under investigation for loaning Phillip Bennet, the former CEO of Refco Inc., several hundred million dollars just before the brokerage filed for bankruptcy protection last year."

Patent Dispute Between Broadcom And Qualcomm Continues. The Orange County (CA) Register (3/1, Gittelsohn) reports, "The semiconductor giants settled four patent disputes out of court last week, but are far from resolving other property battles, attorneys for both companies said in interviews with the Orange County Register on Tuesday." The Register continues, "Broadcom Corp. and Qualcomm Inc. settled four patent disputes out of court last week, but the Southern California semiconductor giants are far from resolving their antitrust and intellectual property battles, attorneys for both companies said in interviews with the Orange County Register on Tuesday. … 'That was just a piecemeal separate peace,' said Lou Lupin, executive vice president and general counsel for Qualcomm, the San Diego telecom chipmaker." The Register adds, "Broadcom and Qualcomm still have five outstanding patent infringement cases and three antitrust actions in U.S. federal courts, the European Community and South Korea. One of the next cases is scheduled for opening arguments in federal court in Santa Ana in May. … In addition, Broadcom still has 12 patent disputes against Qualcomm, and Qualcomm still has six against Broadcom, said David Rosmann, Broadcom's vice president for intellectual property litigation. 'It's just a paring down,' he said." The Register notes, "Irvine-based Broadcom launched the legal war in 2005 amid frustration over negotiating licensing agreements for technology in 3G or WCDMA mobile phones, a new generation of phones that perform multiple tasks such as transmitting high speed video. Qualcomm pioneered the technology that became the industry standard. … In its antitrust cases, Broadcom argues that Qualcomm wants to monopolize the next generation of mobile phones by charging excessive royalties. Broadcom's attorneys say Qualcomm employed the same tactic to control more than 90 percent of the chips in the current generation of mobile phones used by such companies as AT&T, Sprint and Verizon."

Writer Argues Against "Big Is Bad" Attitude In Antitrust Law. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (3/1), Cécile Philippe, director general of Institut économique Molinari, a think tank in Brussels and Paris, writes, "The world's No. 1 chipmaker, Intel, has been the target of a series of antitrust probes and lawsuits around the globe. Among them is a five-year investigation by the European Commission that has included raids on the company's European offices and may yet lead to formal legal proceedings. Japan's Fair Trade Commission has already condemned Intel for 'unfair' practices and urged it to change its ways. Authorities in South Korea and the U.S. are also probing the California-based company. … The concomitant nature of these cases owes nothing to serendipity. They were all triggered following antitrust complaints filed by Intel's arch-rival, Advanced Micro Devices Inc. AMD alleges that Intel's practice of inviting its major customers to sign exclusive contracts in exchange for significant rebates and discounts is anticompetitive. In the European Commission, AMD has an audience that has been sympathetic to such accusations before, as in the cases of the pharmaceutical firm Hoffmann-Roche in 1979 or the tire manufacturer Michelin in 2003." Philippe continues, "These commercial tactics are actually common practice. Intel's case, however, is allegedly different in that the firm enjoys a 'dominant position' in the market for microprocessors, with 80% of sales by unit volume. It is because of this 'dominant' status that competition regulators might regard Intel's practices with suspicion and ordain that it end them. … The legal premise is that a company with such a large market share can use its size to put competitors out of business, perhaps by lowering its prices to a point at which they cannot compete, and then foist higher prices upon helpless customers. The soundness of this theory is debatable even on philosophical grounds -- if the new monopolist suddenly raises prices, why would its old competitors not get back into the game? -- but there is empirical evidence that Intel's practices have not made it immune to competition." Philippe argues that "there's an inherent contradiction in this 'big is bad' application of competition law. Firms are allowed to use certain practices in order to grow their business and reach the top of their industry. But then, suddenly, these practices become illegal once their goal has been achieved. How can this be right? From an economic point of view, the intensity of competition should not be measured by market share alone. The most important thing is to see that entry into the market remains free -- that is, that regulatory measures do not impede companies from joining the fray. … In weighing Intel's business model and practices, it is vital that regulators leave room for the free play of competition and, even more important, let the market judge the management decisions of the different players in a given industry. There is no guarantee that Intel's strategy will prove to be the best one, especially if AMD or other firms provide better value to consumers. What is anticompetitive is the worrying trend of companies' asking regulators to level the playing field, rather than trying to win in the marketplace."

Federal Suit Seeks To Block Arizona Marina. The Arizona Republic (3/1, Wong) reports, "The owner of the lone marina at Lake Pleasant sued two high-ranking federal officials in U.S. District Court Tuesday in an effort to halt construction of a new marina at the far north Peoria lake." The Republic continues, "Paradise Valley businessman David Maule-Ffinch and his Pensus Group filed suit against Robert W. Johnson, commissioner of the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation, and Dirk Kempthorne, secretary of the U.S. Department of the Interior. … The lawsuit came on the same day the $20 million marina cleared its largest bureaucratic hurdle. Reclamation officials on Tuesday said they determined Scorpion Bay Marina & Yacht Harbor would have no significant impact on the environment and that the agency would not undertake a complete environmental review of the project." The Republic adds, "In his 13-page suit, Maule-Ffinch claimed that Reclamation — the arm of the Interior Department that owns Lake Pleasant and other waterways — broke federal law when it failed to require that Maricopa County conduct a competitive bidding process for the construction and management of the new marina. … A provision in a 2002 request for proposal banned Pensus and other potential bidders that had any business interests next to or around Lake Pleasant Regional Park, which the county manages. … 'The Bureau of Reclamation has an independent duty to make sure a federal asset is given out to a profit-making organization who has complied with all of the rules,' Andrew Federhar, an attorney for Maule-Ffinch and Pensus, said Wednesday. 'We don't believe (Reclamation) ensured this federal asset is being appropriately used.'" The Republic notes, "Maule-Ffinch filed a similar suit last April in Maricopa County Superior Court against the county and Lake Pleasant Marina Partners, a limited liability group of investors in the project. The court decided not to hear the case; neither did the state appellate court upon appeal. … Bruce Ellis, who heads the Reclamation division that issued a draft environmental review of Scorpion Bay, said he had no comment about the federal suit. A spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice said the agency has not been served and would not have any comment until it reviews the matter."

Judge Approves Settlement Over Texas Coal-Fires Power Plant. The Austin American-Statesman (3/1, Price) reports, "A long-challenged Central Texas coal-fired power plant appeared to get a green light for construction from a federal judge Tuesday." The A-S continues, "The plant had been held up by legal challenges from environmental groups and, for a period, the federal Department of Justice. … But in November, the federal government offered a settlement that would allow Alcoa Inc. and TXU Corp. to use an old permit at the site instead of having to apply for a new, stricter permit." The A-S adds, "The settlement offer, approved by U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks in Austin late Tuesday, eases a deal between the aluminum giant and the state's largest energy company for control of the plant, which powers an aluminum smelting operation in Rockdale, about 60 miles northeast of Austin. … The plant's new unit, known as Sandow 5, is one of three coal-fired units TXU proposes to build. Plans for eight other units were withdrawn after the company was approached in a $45 billion buyout deal last week. … The unit, slated to come online in 2009, will have 581 megawatts of capacity, or enough to power 300,000 homes." The A-S notes, "Citizens and environmental groups accused Alcoa in a lawsuit of illegally releasing more than 1 million tons of air pollution from the plant during a 17-year period. … As part of the settlement reached in 2003, Alcoa was required to pay a $1.5 million fine, spend $2.5 million on environmental mitigation projects in Central Texas and replace its three coal-powered generating units at the plant with a single cleaner-burning, coal-powered unit by 2007."

The AP (3/1) reports, "The Justice Department had joined environmental and citizen groups in challenging plans for the new plant. But the government came to terms with Alcoa and TXU in November, and on Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks approved the settlement. … The Rockdale plant is one of three Texas coal-fired units proposed by TXU. Private equity firms working to buy TXU said earlier this week that they would scrap plans for eight other proposed coal plants." The AP adds, "Opponents of the Rockdale plant had sued Alcoa alleging the company released illegal amounts of air pollution from the plant during a 17-year period. … Alcoa reached a settlement with the groups in 2003 that required Alcoa to pay fines, spend millions on environmental cleanup and replace its three coal units with a single cleaner unit by 2007."

EPA IG Says Defunct Nonprofit Should Return Federal Funds. Bloomberg (2/28, Roland) reports a government audit has concluded that the nonprofit America's Clean Water Foundation, which "sponsored national clean-water events with the Smithsonian Institution before shutting down over accounting irregularities," should return $25.2 million in EPA grant funds. The EPA Inspector General said the group "overstated costs" on EPA grants and "failed to keep appropriate records." EPA Grants Administrator Richard Kuhlman said the foundation "failed for years to detect an employee's $500,000 embezzlement of its funds." The FBI "has been investigating the crime, he said. FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman declined to comment. It also failed to document its expenses, didn't have its books audited for three years, and awarded all its contracts without competition among potential bidders, the audit said."

Energy Department Launches Cellulosic Ethanol Effort. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "The Department of Energy has kicked off a technological horse race to see which among six companies can produce a transportation fuel that is an alternative to corn-based ethanol, in commercial quantities, at a cost of around $1 a gallon. Companies successful in producing low-cost ethanol could have first crack at a new fuel market that offers a domestic alternative to gasoline." Until then, DOE "says it will pony up as much as $385 million to help the competitors ... . 'This effort is a big deal,' said Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, who estimated that the companies will commit a total of at least $1.2 billion to their ventures." Because "Congress has been slow in appropriating the agency's budget, an additional prize, promised by a $2 billion loan-guarantee program, has yet to be established." Congress "approved aiding makers of so-called cellulosic ethanol in the Energy Policy Act of 2005. ... President Bush has since made the program part of his goal to introduce 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels into the transportation sector."

The New York Times (3/1, Barrionuevo, 1.16M) reports, "Dozens of ethanol refineries that use corn are planned for construction over the next two years. But Mr. Bodman acknowledged yesterday that corn alone would not be enough to achieve the ambitious goal of taming what Mr. Bush has called America's 'oil addiction.'" The Times adds, "Ethanol made from corn has a small effect on greenhouse gases, but ethanol from cellulose cuts those gases sharply."

"Operation Imperial Emperor" Nets Dozens Of Arrests, Tons Of Drugs. There are nearly 200 media references to arrests and drug seizures made in connection with Operation Imperial Emperor. Most reports cite the AP story. The AP (3/1) reports that dozens of people "accused of working for a Mexican drug cartel were arrested Wednesday in a multistate bust that has netted more than $45 million in cash and tons of cocaine, heroin and marijuana. At least some of the drugs were carried over the U.S.-Mexico border on a bridge made from sandbags partially submerged in the Colorado River outside of Yuma, Ariz.," according to authorities. … The 20-month sting, code-named 'Operation Imperial Emperor,' so far has swept up 402 of the cartel's suspected lieutenants and foot soldiers, including 66 on Wednesday who were arrested in California, Arizona and Illinois." The AP adds, "Among the cache collected by the Drug Enforcement Administration were 27,229 pounds of marijuana; 9,512 pounds of cocaine; 705 pounds of methamphetamine; 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine, or 'ice;' 11 pounds of heroin; $6.1 million in property and assets; and an estimated 100 weapons and 94 vehicles." FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Houston Chronicle, Denver Post, Kansas City Star, and Boston Globe are among the news outlets that used the AP story.

The Washington Times (3/1, Seper) reports, "A long-term federal investigation into a Mexican drug-trafficking organization and its U.S.-based distribution cells has resulted in more than 400 arrests nationwide, including 66 who were taken into custody yesterday in California, Arizona, New York and Illinois." Rusty Payne said the investigation "accounted for $6.1 million in property and assets, as well as 100 weapons and 94 vehicles." The Times reports Karen Tandy said, "The Cazares-Gastellum drug empire that rose to such heights of power in only two years, fell today at the hands of DEA and our partners. This sprawling drug domain, headquartered in Mexico, penetrated deep into all corners of this country."

USA Today (3/1, Leinwand) reports federal agents "arrested 66 people Wednesday in a multi-city sweep of an alleged drug ring that is accused of bringing five tons of cocaine a month into the USA. The Drug Enforcement Administration said leaders of the Cazares drug operation, headquartered in Mexico, have been indicted on charges of laundering money and trafficking in massive amounts of cocaine, marijuana and methamphetamine from Colombia, Venezuela and Mexico." The investigation "began in 2005 when federal agents in Imperial County, Calif., stopped a pickup packed with marijuana, the DEA said. The find led federal agents to Victor Cazares-Gastellum, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said." USA Today reports court papers indicate Cazares and his operatives "moved cocaine from Venezuela and Colombia through Central America and into Mexicali."

Bloomberg (3/1, Schmidt) reports the investigation "targeted the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum cartel, which supplied cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana across the U.S." Bloomberg reports Karen Tandy said, "Today we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure."

The AP (3/1, Spagat) reports, "Dozens of people accused of working for a Mexican drug cartel were arrested Wednesday in a multistate bust that has netted more than $45 million in cash and tons of cocaine, heroin and marijuana, federal officials said." The AP continues, "At least some of the drugs were carried over the U.S.-Mexico border on a bridge made from sandbags partially submerged in the Colorado River outside of Yuma, Ariz., authorities said. All the narcotics were sneaked into the country through the porous Southwest border exploited by cartel kingpin Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum, they said. … The 20-month sting, code-named 'Operation Imperial Emperor,' so far has swept up 402 of the cartel's suspected lieutenants and foot soldiers, including 66 on Wednesday who were arrested in California, Arizona and Illinois. … 'Today's operation is a serious blow to one of the largest and most significant trafficking organizations,' said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a news conference in San Diego." The AP adds, "Cazares-Gastellum, also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar, was indicted in the sting but remains in Mexico and was not arrested, officials said. … Authorities said the cartel employed U.S. citizens and Mexican nationals, who distributed the drugs in 23 states. They will face either federal or state charges."

Fox News (3/1, Porteus) reports, "The organization has also laundered millions of dollars generated from this illegal activity, according to the Justice Department. … 'Today's actions deal a significant blow to the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, whose members are accused of importing and distributing multi-ton quantities of cocaine and other illicit drugs to communities across the country on a monthly basis,' Gonzales said. 'These arrests demonstrate what can be achieved when domestic and international law enforcement partners team up against a common foe.'" Fox News notes, "Federal or state charges were unsealed Wednesday morning against 139 defendants in California, Arizona, Illinois and New York. … The 20-month investigation led by the Drug Enforcement Administration and aided by more than 100 federal, state, local and foreign law enforcement agencies, has so far resulted in the seizure of approximately $45.2 million, 27,229 pounds of marijuana, 9,512 pounds of cocaine, 705 pounds of methamphetamine, 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine or 'ice,' and 11 pounds of heroin. … The investigation has also netted $6.1 million in property and assets, as well as roughly 100 weapons and 94 vehicles. The drug ring is based in Sinaloa, Mexico."

California Newspaper Coverage. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/28, Martinez) reported the ring "supplied cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana monthly to its distributors by air, land and sea. Officials said it also laundered millions of dollars profited from the drug trafficking. … The investigation resulted in the federal indictment of 19 individuals in federal court in San Diego. Those indicted include Mexican nationals and others with residences in Calexico and El Centro, officials said." The Union-Tribune says the organization "acquired drugs from Colombia and Venezuela to Central America, then smuggled them into the United States from Mexico. Once in the U.S., the drugs were broken down into smaller shipments in such cities as Los Angeles and San Diego and disseminated to distribution cells in various states."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (3/1) today reports, "A little-known Mexican drug trafficking organization, which operated without the notoriety of more violent rivals like the Arellano Félix gang, was taken down yesterday during a multistate bust announced in San Diego." The Union-

Tribune quotes Karen Tandy saying, "Today we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure ... and tossed it into the dustbin of history." The Union-Tribune adds, "In San Diego – the base of the drug distribution network – five suspected Cazares cartel members were arrested yesterday in Otay Mesa and Paradise Hills at homes and a business, and agents seized three guns and five vehicles, said DEA Special Agent Dan Simmons. Fourteen others were taken into custody in the Imperial Valley, with $50,000 and 17 vehicles seized, Simmons said."

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/28) reported, "The investigation -- spearheaded by the DEA's Oakland office and dubbed 'Operation Imperial Emperor' -- targeted drug distribution cells and money-laundering networks of an organization led by Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar of Mexico, the DEA said. … The case began in February 2006 when DEA agents identified a number of Bay Area residents as having ties to an international ring. … Investigators served search warrants in Tracy, King City, Modesto, Fairfield, Pinole, Hayward and San Leandro."

The Contra Costa Times (2/28) reported a Pinole man "was among dozens arrested in a nationwide investigation of a Mexico-based drug cartel in which more than $45 million worth cocaine, methamphetamine, heroin, and marijuana were seized. Luis Manuel Sanchez-Aceves, 26, of Pinole, was among nine people arrested statewide, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Arizona Newspaper Coverage. The Arizona Republic (3/1) reports seven drug-smuggling suspects "were arrested and about $12 million worth of narcotics was seized in Arizona as part of a nationwide crackdown aimed at a Mexican smuggling cartel that crisscrossed the sand dunes near Yuma and built a submerged bridge across the Colorado River to avoid law enforcement. Ramona Sanchez, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman in Phoenix, said seizures in the Yuma area included 28,000 pounds of marijuana, 93 pounds of cocaine, 4 pounds of methamphetamine and about 2 pounds of heroin. … The enforcement in Arizona was tied to a nationwide campaign known as Operation Imperial Emperor, directed against a cartel headed by Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum, identified by the Justice Department as an international drug kingpin."

The Yuma (AZ) Sun (3/1) reports forty agents "executed eight search warrants at residences in Yuma, Somerton and San Luis, Ariz., arresting five people on federal charges and two on state charges. The seven men operated in two separate distribution cells here for the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Liz Barrick. … The DEA was proclaiming victory over the drug ring after Wednesday's operation, known as Operation Imperial Emperor."

TV Coverage. On its Web site, ABC News (2/28) reports investigators "claim the smugglers stashed drugs and money in hidden compartments in cars and trucks, as well as in toys and musical instruments. In an aggressive move, the smugglers built a bridge made of sand bags across the Colorado River near Yuma, Ariz., which allowed them to simply drive across the waterway. … Tandy said the Cazares Organization rose to power quickly, but by attacking the agency where it hurt the most, the government was able to cripple the cartel."

On its Web site, Fox News (2/28, Porteus) reports, "Justice special agent-in-charge Steven Robertson told FOXNews.com. 'This organization had cells, which are little distribution sub-groups based throughout the U.S.' Robertson, who said the bust is the largest in about a decade in terms of amount of drugs and assets seized, as well as number of arrests, said law enforcement is seeing a disturbing new trend in the world of narcotics. In the past, meth was cooked in small toxic labs here in the United States, 'where literally you could cook it on a hotplate in your apartment,' Robertson said. … Drug cartels are cooking meth in what are called 'super labs' outside of the country, then smuggling the drugs into the United States through regular smuggling routes along the southern border."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/28, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "We have an exclusive look at an early-morning raid by drug enforcement agents in Los Angeles. The targets are members a vicious drug cartel based in Mexico." Reporter: "As the city of angels sleep, the DEA is gearing up. Final preparations for an early-morning raid on a suspected U.S. Branch of a lethal Mexican drug cartel. CNN was granted exclusive access." Reporter: "Silently the team moves in. Surrounds a house in East L.A. It's a scenario simultaneously playing out in 15 cities from southern California to Chicago. The culmination of nearly two years of investigative work. … Including today's raid, the DEA says this investigation has netted more than 700 pounds of meth, 4,000 kilograms of cocaine, 27,000 of pounds of marijuana, and more than $45 million in cold hard cash. The man allegedly responsible for getting those drugs into the United States, Victor Emilio Salazar. Indicted by a grand jury, he's believed to be in Mexico."

NBC SanDiego.com (2/28) reports, "Feds targeted the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, a rival to the Arellano Felix Cartel. Cazares-Gastellum, also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar, was indicted in the sting but not arrested. … The DEA believes most of the drugs were smuggled across the border from Mexicali using vehicles with hidden compartments as opposed to drug tunnels."

KPBS, San Diego (2/28) reports on its Web site that federal authorities "arrested 66 people in California and other states Wednesday in connection with a Mexican drug-smuggling cartel. Law enforcement authorities say the alleged cartel leader remains at large. … Federal court documents say the cocaine-smuggling cartel rose to power in Mexico during the last two years."

BBC News (3/1) reports, "The authorities in the United States say they have arrested more than 400 people and seized 18 tons of drugs. … The news comes as the United Nations reported that Mexican cartels now dominate drugs trafficking in the US."

Pharmacists, Athletes, Celebrities Accused In Investigation Of Fraudulent Internet Drug Sales. Reporting on an Orlando pharmacy raid continues, now with more than 650 media references to the raid reported to be linked to a long-term investigation into illegal steroid and human growth hormone sales. The New York Times (3/1) today reports the "arrests of four people in Florida on Tuesday and the indictments of at least six doctors around the country linked to a pharmacy in Orlando, Fla., present striking evidence that authorities in several states have opened a new front in the war against illegal online sales of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs. Albany County prosecutors, working with federal investigators and Florida officials, have linked 11 doctors to the pharmacy. Six face felony charges that they wrote prescriptions to patients they had never met." The arrests in Florida, which "involved at least 20 branch offices of state, local and federal law enforcement agencies, were only one prong of a series of overlapping investigations into the underworld of Internet drug sales."

The Albany (NY) Times Union (2/28, Iorizzo) reported Tuesday's raid of an Orlando, Fla., pharmacy "accused of trafficking performance-enhancing drugs over the Internet may prove to be one of the most significant steroids busts in history," according to a leading expert. Sources "said the investigation…revealed that Signature Pharmacy customers included several former and current professional athletes. Among those linked to the company were former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley and a team doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers."

The Orlando Sentinel (2/28) reported the four people "arrested as part of a raid on two Orlando pharmacies face a court appearance on Thursday morning." The Sentinel adds, "Central Florida's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Internal Revenue Service, New York State Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement and other federal and state health and law-enforcement agencies participated in the daylong search at Signature Compounding Pharmacy."

In Orlando, McClatchy Newspapers (2/28) reported, "With BALCO still churning on the West Coast, a new front on the steroid war opened in the East on Tuesday when law-enforcement officers raided two Orlando pharmacies and seized steroids, human growth hormone and records that could connect those drugs to dozens of athletes. In a raid led by the Albany (N.Y.) County District Attorney's office, officers from several Florida and national agencies arrested four employees of Signature Compounding Pharmacies Tuesday and charged them in an alleged scheme to provide steroids and growth hormone over the Internet. … Several raids and arrests were pending, one source close to the investigation said, adding, 'This is really the first of two waves.'"

In a widely reported story, the AP (3/1) writes, "The West Coast had BALCO. Now the East Coast could be in the midst of its own steroid scandal. An illicit steroid distribution network, which may be responsible for Internet sales of performance-enhancing drugs nationwide, has been targeted by an upstate New York prosecutor. Customers reportedly included Los Angeles Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield and former baseball star Jose Canseco."

In a separate story, the AP (3/1) writes, "Testing for performance-enhancing drugs can only go so far -- and nab so many people. Bring state and federal law-enforcement officials in, and it could change the landscape of the anti-doping fight. Illicit steroid distribution networks, which may be responsible for Internet sales of performance-enhancing drugs nationwide, have been targeted by prosecutors in upstate New York and Rhode Island." Testing may "expose athletes who cheat, but it does little to punish those who make, market and distribute performance-enhancing substances, let alone stop the flow of drugs. That's why these new investigations have the potential to be so significant." Authorities "are targeting those who supply steroids to big-name and no-name users alike across the country."

Sports Illustrated (3/1) writes, "Ironically, Holyfield's name does not appear in the law enforcement documents we reviewed. However, a patient by the name of 'Evan Fields' caught investigators' attention. 'Fields' shares the same birth date as Holyfield -- Oct. 19, 1962. … When we called the phone number that, according to the documents, was associated with the 'Fields' prescription, Holyfield answered." Sports Illustrated continues, "Rather than using the Internet and receiving the prescriptions through the mail, 'Fields' allegedly picked them up from a private Georgia urologist whose offices were raided as part of this ongoing investigation. But authorities tell us the drugs came from Applied Pharmacy, the Mobile, Ala., compound pharmacy the DEA raided last fall."

Report: Abuse Of Prescription Drugs Expected To Exceed Use Of Street Drugs. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/1, Fuoco) reports, "After treating more than 2,000 people for OxyContin addiction since 2000, Dr. Neil A. Capretto, Gateway Rehabilitation Center's medical director, wasn't surprised by the findings of the United Nations-affiliated International Narcotics Control Board that abuse of prescription drugs is about to exceed the use of illicit narcotics worldwide. … In a report yesterday, the International Narcotics Control Board said abuse of prescription drugs is about to exceed the use of illicit street narcotics worldwide. The shift has spawned a lethal new trade in counterfeit painkillers, sedatives and other medicines potent enough to kill."

The AP (3/1) reports, "In the United States alone, the abuse of painkillers, stimulants, tranquilizers and other prescription medications has gone beyond 'practically all illicit drugs with the exception of cannabis,' with users increasingly turning to them first, the Vienna-based group said. And unregulated markets in many countries make it easy for traffickers to peddle a wide variety of counterfeit drugs through courier services, ordinary mail and the Internet."

ATF Expands Bomb Training For Military Technicians. The Chicago Tribune (2/28, Zajac) reports, "Struggling for more effective responses to the suicide and roadside bombings that have wreaked havoc in Iraq and increasingly in Afghanistan, the Defense Department has beefed up an explosives training program with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." The Tribune continues, "Military bomb technicians will receive additional training in countering homemade explosives and in identifying bomb components after a blast, under the expanded program to be run in six sessions annually at the ATF's training center in Ft. A.P. Hill in Virginia." The Tribune adds, "About 180 technicians from all branches of the armed forces will be trained in a course that has been expanded to one week, according to Steven Beggs, ATF chief of explosives training. Previously, about 90 technicians, mostly from the Army, received three days of training." The Tribune notes, "Homemade roadside bombs, also called improvised explosive devices, have exacted a devastating toll on American troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. This month the government alleged that sophisticated variants of the devices used in Iraq are being supplied by a branch of Iran's armed forces. … Suicide bombs have been employed against both military forces and civilians. … A suicide bombing Tuesday at the gates of Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan killed at least 23 people, including two Americans. Vice President Dick Cheney was on the base at the time but was unharmed."

US Files New Charges Against Alabama Bomb Suspect. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (2/28, Kirby) reports, "A Flomaton (AL) man whose federal trial on bomb charges ended in a hung jury last month faces new charges under an indictment handed down last week by a grand jury in Mobile." The Press-Register continues, "At the January trial in U.S. District Court in Mobile, jurors could not agree about whether Gregory Wendell Nichols was guilty of possessing a bomb. The new federal indictment accuses him of two bomb-related charges formally known as possession of an unregistered firearm and making a firearm. … Nichols is scheduled to be arraigned on the charges today. … 'It is a separate offense to actually make a firearm,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Vicki Davis, who has taken over as lead prosecutor in the case." The Press-Register adds, "During Nichols' trial, senior federal appeals Judge Emmett 'Rip' Cox, who presided over the trial, dismissed one of two counts against the defendant -- possession of a firearm in violation of law -- on grounds that it duplicated the other charge, possession of an unregistered firearm. … 'They're just retreading the indictment,' said Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden, who added that his client intends to plead not guilty. 'A count was dismissed. Now, they're trying to add another one.'" The Press-Register notes, "Agents for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5 after getting a tip. Nichols permitted the agents to search his pickup truck; they reported finding five homemade explosive devices. … Nichols admitted that he made the devices using spent carbon dioxide cartridges from BB guns. He told jurors last month that he packed the cylindrical canisters -- which were about 2 inches long -- with a black powder substitute called Pyrodex. He then sealed it with plumber's tape and electrical tape, and attached a firecracker fuse."

Federal Judge Blasts Role Of Politics In Marshals Selection. The Boston Globe (3/1, Murphy) reports, "A federal judge in Boston has blasted the US Marshals Service as a "second rate" agency because it is headed by a patronage appointee, and called on Congress to 'professionalize' the law enforcement agency." The Globe continues, "Judge William G. Young , in an unusual addendum to a ruling in an employment discrimination case last week, went out of his way to criticize the way marshals are appointed throughout the country. … The appointees 'are all direct political patronage appointments. These are not executive department policy-making positions; they are vital law enforcement positions,' Young wrote. … 'Surely here in America direct command of law enforcement officers in harm's way could never be entrusted to political patronage appointees,' he wrote. 'How smug we are -- and how wrong.'" The Globe adds, "Young's remarks were striking, in part because federal judges work closely with the marshals, who are responsible for securing courthouses, protecting judges, juries, witnesses, and other court officials. They also play a role in capturing fugitives and transporting prisoners. … Young wrote that it was unimaginable that another federal law enforcement agency, such as the FBI or the Drug Enforcement Agency, would put a political appointee in charge of a regional office. He said Congress has professionalized those agencies. … 'Until Congress does the same for the Marshals Service, it will always be considered a second rate political agency in the eyes of true professionals,' Young wrote." The Globe notes, "Traditionally, the marshal's job has gone to a prominent political figure from the same political party of the president in office. The White House has usually allowed local political figures in the 94 marshal districts to reach a consensus on a candidate for the job. … Reed Hillman , last year's unsuccessful Republican candidate for lieutenant governor and a former State Police commander, is expected to be nominated for the presidential appointment."

IMMIGRATION:

Rep. Rohrabacher Presents New Evidence In Shooting Involving Former Border Patrol Agents. The El Paso (TX) Times (2/28) reported, "Eight months after he was shot...by two former El Paso Border Patrol agents, a Mexican drug smuggler delivered $1 million worth of marijuana to a stash house in El Paso County, according to an investigative report by the Drug Enforcement Administration now in possession of a California congressman. U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., held a news conference in Washington, D.C. … and held a redacted copy of the document up for reporters." The Times says it "is not clear what the DEA report will mean for the agents as it is not directly related to the February shooting, but Rohrabacher said he smeared the character of the smuggler as the prosecution's star witness. Rohrabacher said that prosecutors ignored the DEA report to 'promote the false image of the smuggler' during trial."

The Fort Worth (TX) Star-Telegram (2/28, Montgomery) reported the "disclosure of the report, dated Oct. 25, 2005, sparked new demands for a congressional inquiry into the prosecution of agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Compean. Each of the agents was sentenced to more than a decade in prison for shooting Mexican national Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila in the buttocks after he abandoned a van loaded with marijuana near Fabens, outside El Paso. According to the previously sealed DEA report, Aldrete-Davila came to the attention of federal agents after being granted limited immunity to testify as the key witness against the two agents. … The DEA report, which began circulating on Capitol Hill on Wednesday, raised new questions about the government's handling of the case — particularly why Aldrete-Davila remained free after being tied to further trafficking activities."

The Washington Times (3/1, Seper) reports DEA documents, which "remain under seal, show that Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila was the focus of a drug investigation into his reported stashing of 750 pounds of marijuana in a van at a house in Clint, Texas, in November 2005 -- nine months after he was shot in the buttocks near Fabens, Texas, while running from agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean. … Mr. Rohrabacher's spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, confirmed yesterday that her boss had a copy of the reports but said he had no intention of disclosing information from them that could be damaging to an ongoing investigation. She said he sought only to establish Aldrete-Davila's suspected involvement in a second drug-smuggling incident."

Fox News (3/1) reports on its Web site that the DEA "found that Aldrete-Davila brought in another vanload of drugs into the United States while he waited to testify against the agents. Some reports say he stashed up to 750 pounds of marijuana at a house in Clint, Texas."

Gutierrez, Chertoff Say Bush Committed To Reforming Nation's Immigration System. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Schreck, 850K) reports, "President Bush is committed to working with Congress on an overhaul of immigration laws, two Cabinet officials told a Senate panel Wednesday, but they hedged on the contentious issue of whether people who come to the US illegally have a right to citizenship." Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez told the Senate Judiciary Committee that "the administration's priority is to secure the nation's borders and convince the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to 'come out of the shadows.'" Meanwhile, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "stressed that any changes in the law should not amount to amnesty. 'We cannot give those who are here illegally because they've broken the law a leg up and an advantage over those who have played by the rules,' he said." The hearing "follows a renewed behind-the-scenes push by the White House to pass a comprehensive overhaul before 2008 presidential and congressional campaigning swings into high gear. At least in broad terms, Bush agrees with congressional Democrats that the immigration laws -- last revised on a large scale in 1986 -- need significant retooling."

Reporting on the testimony by Gutierrez and Chertoff, USA Today (3/1, Kiely, 2.27M) says Bush "waded gingerly back into the debate over immigration Wednesday," adding that "last year's election improved the bill's chances for passage by putting Democrats in charge of both the House and Senate and ousting several leading Republican critics of the Senate immigration bill, such as J.D. Hayworth of Arizona and John Hostettler of Indiana."

The New York Times (3/1, Swarns, 1.16M) notes that "last year, the Senate passed bipartisan immigration legislation that would have provided citizenship to most illegal immigrants who paid fines and back taxes and learned English. … But on Wednesday, Mr. Gutierrez and Mr. Chertoff declined to endorse the measure. Mr. Gutierrez said many illegal immigrants might prefer working here for several years and returning home," and Chertoff "noted that only about a third of the illegal immigrants granted legal status as a result of legislation passed in 1986 actually ended up applying for citizenship." The Times adds, "It was unclear whether the officials were simply trying to ease conservative concerns about the citizenship question or whether Mr. Bush had actually shifted his position." Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, "said Mr. Bush still supported a path to citizenship that would include payments of fines back taxes and a requirement to learn English, among other things. But it seemed unlikely that the two cabinet secretaries would make such remarks without first consulting the White House."

The CBS Evening News (2/28, story 7, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported GOP Sen. John McCain and Democrat Ted Kennedy "could unveil comprehensive new immigration bill as early as next week."

Reporting on that bill, The Hill (3/1, Schor, Swanson) says it "exposes a minefield of political hazards for the six senators chasing their parties' presidential nominations. Senate leaders on both sides of the aisle have expressed readiness to restart the debate over combining border enforcement with a path to earned citizenship for illegal immigrants in the country." But "Democrats now face high expectations on immigration after campaigning on last year's failure to reach a conference on comprehensive reform, and the Senate GOP's two 2008 candidates face their own backlash over backing the bill last year." The Hill adds, "The White House contender most openly staking his electoral fortunes on immigration" is McCain, "who is putting the finishing touches on this year's edition of the reform bill he offered last year with…Kennedy."

Kennedy "Secret Work" Said To Threaten Chances For Immigration Reform's Passage. The Washington Times (3/1, Dinan, 88K) reports that "Kennedy's secret work on an immigration bill threatens the chance of passing any guest-worker program this year, warned Sen. Arlen Specter, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee." Specter

"cautioned" Kennedy and McCain, "saying Mr. Kennedy has broken a promise to consult with other senators' staffs on a new bill. That bill, details of which were first reported by The Washington Times, would grant citizenship rights to most illegal aliens already in the US"

Immigration Fees To Increase. USA Today (3/1, Welch, 2.27M) reports the Citizenship and Immigration Service has proposed a "set of fee increases," which it says "will allow it to hire more staff and upgrade its creaky system so applications can be approved faster. Among its proposals is to raise the application fee for citizenship from $330 to $595 and the fee for legal permanent residency from $325 to $905. Advocates for immigrants say the cost may price out the poor from becoming citizens."

Colorado May Use Convicts To Fill Immigrant Labor Shortage. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Riccardi, 850K) reports, "Ever since passing what its Legislature promoted as the nation's toughest laws against illegal immigration last summer, Colorado has struggled with a labor shortage as migrants fled the state. This week, officials announced a novel solution: Use convicts as farmworkers." Under a pilot program that may be launched this month, low security risk prisoners "may choose to work in the fields, earning 60 cents a day." They "will be watched by prison guards, who will be paid by the farms. The cost is subject to negotiations, but farmers say they expect to pay more for the inmate labor and its associated costs than for their traditional workers. Advocates on both sides of the immigration debate said they were stunned by the proposal. … Farmers said they weren't happy with the solution, but their livelihoods are on the verge of collapse."

TAX:

IRS Finds Errors In Nonprofit Tax Reports. The New York Times (3/1, Strom) reports, "Some 600 charities and foundations have had to file amended tax forms after an Internal Revenue Service study found flaws in the way they reported payments to executives and other employees." The Times continues, "The I.R.S. has also asked 40 individuals to pay a total of $20 million in excise taxes, which is the penalty it imposes when it determines a nonprofit executive has been paid excessively. … 'We found some problems,' said Steven T. Miller, the commissioner in charge of the I.R.S. division overseeing tax-exempt and government entities. 'Whether they were due to confusion, poor design of the tax forms used by these organizations or something more nefarious, I can't tell you.'" The Times adds, "He said the results of the inquiry, which found flaws in the tax forms of a third of the 1,800 charities and foundations examined, convinced the agency that it needed to do more in the area of compensation at nonprofits. … The names of the affected organizations and executives were not released. … Organizations that had to file amended returns either failed to report, or reported incorrectly, perquisites like an executive's personal use of an organization's vehicles, travel payments for spouses of executives or other payments and reimbursements, I.R.S. officials said. … Those whose executives have been asked to pay penalties may have failed to use comparable figures from similar organizations in setting compensation or otherwise failed to justify executive pay levels."

Telephone Excise Tax Refund Scam Tops IRS List. The Washington Post (3/1, D2, Singletary) reports, "Every year the Internal Revenue Service announces the top 12 tax scams. This tax season, topping the latest Dirty Dozen are fraudulent schemes connected with the one-time telephone excise tax refund available to most taxpayers." The Post continues, "The excise tax refund is available only on your 2006 federal income tax return and is intended to refund the tax collected on long distance telephone service. It's available for anyone who paid such taxes on a land line, fax, computer or cellphone for the period following Feb. 28, 2003, and before Aug. 1, 2006. … To make it easier for taxpayers, the IRS set a standard refund amount ranging from $30 to $60, based on the number of exemptions claimed on your return. … You don't need to present proof to take the standard refund amount. However, you can figure the refund using the actual amount of tax paid, based on your phone bills and other records." The Post adds, "Because taxpayers can request a refund for the exact amount of the taxes collected, unscrupulous tax preparers have persuaded people to claim a higher refund than they are entitled to. In some cases people are asking for thousands of dollars. Others are requesting what looks to be the entire amount of their phone bills for the period in question. In the most egregious cases, some individuals have asked for a refund of $30,000, which means they would have had a long-distance bill of $1 million from the end of February 2003 until the beginning of August last year. That 41-month period covers the time the 3 percent excise tax was collected. … To stop the abusive use of the telephone excise tax refund, the IRS is conducting site visits with tax preparers across the country to stop inflated requests. The visits started with 22 tax preparers who have handled more than 1,500 returns. … 'We are taking this unusual step to confront blatant abuse of this important refund program,' said IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson. 'We want tax preparers to prepare accurate tax returns. If they don't, we will move swiftly to impose civil penalties and, where warranted, seek criminal sanctions.' … Everson said individuals requesting what appear to be inflated refunds will have those refunds frozen and they may be subject to an audit."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Jefferson Seeks Records Seized In Probe. The AP (3/1, Jordan) reports, "Attorneys for Democratic Rep. William Jefferson asked a federal appeals court Wednesday to force the Bush administration to return all documents that were seized during an FBI raid last year on the congressman's office." The AP continues, "In their 52-page request, lawyers for Jefferson, D-La., argued that the Justice Department violated Congress' right to withhold certain information from the executive branch when it conducted the unprecedented 18-hour search last May 20-21. … The raid was part of a 16-month international bribery investigation of Jefferson, who allegedly accepted $100,000 from a telecommunications businessman — $90,000 of which was later recovered in a freezer in the congressman's Louisiana home." The AP adds, "Jefferson's attorneys said nearly 19,000 pages of documents and electronic files seized by prosecutors and the FBI are covered by Congress' separation of powers privilege to shield certain legislative material from executive review. … But the FBI 'inspected every document in the office suite and copied every computer hard drive or other electronic storage device they could find,' the attorneys wrote in their request filed Wednesday with the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia. 'Once that occurs, the privilege is breached.' … 'Because this case involves the first time in United States history that a search warrant has been executed on a congressional office, it is vital that the remedy imposed be sufficiently stringent to deter future searches that exceed constitutional boundaries,' Jefferson's team concluded. 'The only remedy that will vindicate and protect the fundamental principles of separations of powers and legislative independence ... is return of all of the seized materials.' … The Justice Department had no immediate comment."

House GOP Seeks Floor Vote On Jefferson Appointment. The Washington Post (3/1, A4, Layton) reports, "House Republicans plan to force a floor vote on the appointment of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), who is the subject of a federal bribery investigation, to a seat on the Homeland Security Committee." The Post continues, "0The decision to put Jefferson on the panel was made by Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), and House Democrats endorsed the move at a private meeting Tuesday night, but his appointment must be confirmed by a vote on the House floor. Such an action would normally be a formality, but Republicans said yesterday that they would pursue a rarely used maneuver to force a recorded vote on the matter. … 'This is a terrible mistake by the Democratic leadership, to take someone with serious ethical allegations against him and put him on one of the most sensitive and important committees in Congress,' said Rep. Peter T. King (N.Y.), the ranking Republican on the committee." The Post adds, "Pelosi ousted Jefferson from his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee in June after federal investigators raided his Capitol Hill office. In an earlier search of his home, $90,000 was found in a freezer. The money allegedly was accepted in a bribery sting involving an African technology company. Jefferson, who has not been charged, has maintained his innocence and was elected to a ninth term in December after a runoff election. … A spokesman for Pelosi said she opted to place Jefferson on Homeland Security because the panel oversees the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Jefferson had been a vocal critic of FEMA's performance during Hurricane Katrina, which affected thousands of his constituents. … But his appointment must be formally approved by the House, and Republicans said they would take the rare step of challenging the vote and requiring members to record their votes so Democrats will be forced to go on the record in their support of Jefferson."

Roll Call (3/1, Davis, Yachnin) says Republicans are "breaking with longstanding but unwritten rules of comity in the House." In a statement Wednesday evening, "Jefferson said the GOP's tactics were simply 'politics as usual' and that his district 'desperately needs a voice' on the Homeland panel."

White House Confirms Bush Would Veto Labor Bill. The AP (3/1, Abrams) reports, "President Bush would veto legislation championed by Democrats and labor groups that would make it easier to organize unions by eliminating employer rights to demand secret-ballot elections, the White House said Wednesday." The House "is to vote on the legislation Thursday and, with help from pro-labor Republicans from the Northeast, it is almost certain to pass. But the margin of support is expected to fall well short of the two-thirds needed to overturn a presidential veto." The Employee Free Choice Act, "also known as the card check bill, is the top legislative goal of labor groups eager to reassert themselves with the emergence of the Democratic majority." The White House, in a statement, said "the measure 'would strip workers of the fundamental democratic right to a supervised private ballot election.' Substituting a card check mechanism under which unions would get bargaining rights as soon as a majority of workers at a plant sign approval cards, 'would turn back the clock 60 years and return us to a failed system.'"

LATimes Opposes Bill. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, 850K) editorializes that the legislation "would do away with a secret ballot in so-called organizing elections, making it easier for union leaders to pressure co-workers in what should be a free choice. Instead of having the option of insisting on a secret ballot election, employers would have to accept a union formed on the basis of authorization cards signed by workers -- not by a secret process." Unions "once supported the secret ballot for organization elections. They were right then and are wrong now. Unions have every right to a fair hearing, and the National Labor Relations Board should be more vigilant about attempts by employers to game the system. In the end, however, whether to unionize is up to the workers. A secret ballot ensures that their choice will be a free one."

WSJournal Says Bill "Strips Away" Democrat's Moderate "Mask." In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/1, 2.04M) says, "Big Labor has been agitating to ease union-formation requirements for more than a decade. And prior to last year's election, the AFL-CIO, AFSCME and their allies made it clear to Democrats that this vote would be the most important return they expected on their investment in a Nancy Pelosi Speakership. This is payback day. … So far this Congress, Democrats have been trying to present themselves as 'moderates' who won't return to their bad special-interest selves pre-1994. But this union-enabling bill strips away that mask and exposes an anti-business animus out of the 1970s, if not the 1930s. Even if it fails this Congress, this week's vote is a warning about what could become law if Democrats and their union backers hold all the levers of power after 2008."

Price Blasts Democrats, Unions. GOP Rep. Tom Price, a member of the House Education and Labor Committee, writes in the Washington Times (3/1, 88K), "Not even two months into the new Congress, the bipartisan facade of the highly poll-tested, heavily orchestrated first 100 hours is a distant memory. The real agenda of the new Democratic majority is coming to light, and many of the special interests that helped rally support for Democratic candidates during the last election cycle are lining up to cash in. At the front of the line: Big Labor." Price adds that "faced with plummeting membership and an ever-loosening stranglehold on American workers, organized labor isn't about to let bad policy -- or blatant hypocrisy -- get in their way. They're ready for their payback. And congressional Democrats stand ready to deliver. Indeed, it appears that democratic principles and the sanctity of the secret ballot are not the concerns of the new majority party."

Administration, Democrats Seek Trade Deal.

The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A4, Hitt, 2.04M) reports, "The Bush administration and congressional Democrats are attempting to negotiate a grand compromise on trade that would allow several deals to move forward by elevating the importance of labor rights in those agreements." The Journal adds that "after Democrats won control of Congress in November, in part by attacking free-trade agreements, President Bush's globalization agenda seemed all but dead for the rest of his term. Among priorities were bilateral deals with Peru, Panama and Colombia; the Doha round of multilateral talks; as well as renewal of a broad presidential authority to negotiate agreements and push them through Congress, which expires in June." But "the White House and lawmakers have decided to try to find common ground, as Mr. Bush has signaled flexibility on labor standards after years of resisting." The talks "are being led by US Trade Representative Susan Schwab, House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel of New York and Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the ranking Republican on the committee. Much of the negotiations have been at the staff level, but the three principals have played a role, conferring in face-to-face meetings on Capitol Hill or over the phone."

Meanwhile, another Wall Street Journal story (3/1, A1, Solomon) reports that "a common political compromise in Washington involves keeping trade barriers low in exchange for programs compensating those hurt by imports. Free-trade advocates are generally happy to make such a compromise. They figure the winners from trade -- principally consumers who save money on imported goods -- can afford, through the government, to help compensate the losers." But "compensation programs often add bureaucracy without helping many people. Even if the health-insurance assistance program were working well, it would aid only a fraction of those who lose their jobs. The Labor Department must certify that workers have lost their jobs to imports from certain countries or to a shift in production there. Most workers in call centers or other service industries whose jobs are sent overseas don't qualify." The Journal adds, "Another struggling program is wage insurance, designed for workers over 50 who lose their jobs because of trade and then take a lower-paying job."

Democrats See Signs Of New Life In The Administration. The White House Bulletin/US News (2/28) reported Democratic strategists "see some new life in the Bush administration. The strategists had been dismissive of President Bush's ability to revive his political fortunes amid the problems in Iraq and in the aftermath of the Republican drubbing in the mid-term elections last year. But now some Democratic insiders are singing a different tune." They are "impressed with the Administration's new willingness to join the Baghdad government in talks with Iran and Syria, which Bush's spokesmen have rejected in the past. They are pleasantly surprised by all the outreach that the White House has been conducting on domestic issues such as health care, immigration, energy, and education. But is it too late to get compromises with the resurgent Democrats on Capitol Hill?" A senior Democratic strategist who is advising a major presidential candidate told the Bulletin, "President Bush should have done these things a long time ago. Many Americans and many members of Congress don't think he cares about issues other than Iraq, so his credibility is very low."

Top Army Officials Heard Years Of Complaints About Walter Reed. The Washington Post (3/1, A1, Hull, Priest, 690K) reports in a front page story that top officials at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, "including the Army's surgeon general, have heard complaints about outpatient neglect from family members, veterans groups and members of Congress for more than three years." Although a "procession of Pentagon and Walter Reed officials expressed surprise last week about the living conditions and bureaucratic nightmares faced by wounded soldiers staying at the D.C. medical facility," as far back 'as 2003, the commander of Walter Reed, Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who is now the Army's top medical officer, was told that soldiers who were wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan were languishing and lost on the grounds, according to interviews." According to interviews, Kiley, "his successive commanders at Walter Reed and various top noncommissioned officers in charge of soldiers' lives have heard a stream of complaints about outpatient treatment over the past several years. The complaints have surfaced at town hall meetings for staff and soldiers, at commanders' 'sensing sessions' in which soldiers or officers are encouraged to speak freely, and in several inspector general's reports detailing building conditions, safety issues and other matters."

Cheney Blew Own Cover When Speaking On Background. McClatchy (3/1, Hutcheson) reports, "Ever wonder about the identities of those 'senior administration officials' who always seem to get quoted talking about President Bush's policies?" It "wasn't hard to figure out who was doing the talking when the White House released a transcript of a question-and-answer session this week aboard Air Force 2, Vice President Dick Cheney's plane. One big clue: The unnamed official used the pronoun 'I' when discussing Cheney's visit to Afghanistan and Pakistan." The official said, "I would describe my sessions both in Pakistan and Afghanistan as very productive." McClatchy added that even after Cheney "blew his own cover, White House spokesman Tony Snow declined to lift the prohibition against identifying the unnamed speaker." Snow said, "I have spoken with the vice president's office, and the ground rules that were laid out are going to remain in effect." McClatchy adds, "The exchange during Cheney's flight to Oman on Wednesday highlighted the absurdity of a practice that's damaged the credibility of journalists and government officials alike. It's much easier to believe what people say when their names are attached to their words."

The Washington Post (3/1, A2, Kurtz, 690K) also reports on Cheney's press briefing as a "Senior Administration Official": "'Let me just make one editorial comment here,' the SAO said about the vice president's talks with Pakistan's leader. 'I've seen some press reporting says, 'Cheney went in to beat up on them, threaten them.' That's not the way I work. I don't know who writes that, or maybe somebody gets it from some source who doesn't know what I'm doing, or isn't involved in it. But the idea that I'd go in and threaten someone is an invalid misreading of the way I do business.'" The SAO "also said that 'I was very careful' in choosing words to criticize House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) on Iraq strategy." The Post adds, "The first-person pronoun gave away the game. But it also raised the question: Why did Cheney feel the need to speak on a not-for-attribution basis, and why did the seven journalists on the trip go along?"

Sen. McConnell Seen As Bush's "Political Field General." The Washington Times (3/1, Ward, 88K) reports President Bush on Friday "will raise money for his political field general, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, who has stymied Democrats at almost every turn of the Iraq war debate." White House spokesman Tony Snow, "who declined to comment on how Democrats have fared in their attempts to halt the president's surge of troops to Iraq," said, "We think Mitch McConnell is a terrific and able minority leader." The Times adds, "feigning ignorance," Snow said, "You say Democrats are in disarray?" The Times adds with the "congressional debate over the war at fever pitch, Democratic leaders who rode to victory last fall on the promise of bringing the troops home are under fire from virtually every direction. The far left is growing impatient with the lack of progress, while more conservative Democrats are unhappy with the ideas proposed so far." McConnell, "who looks more like a bookkeeper than a power broker, is 'savagely political,' according to one high-placed Democratic source. The Kentucky Republican has twice defeated Majority Leader Harry Reid's attempts to push through an anti-war measure that would have shut out Republican amendments." But McConnell's "effectiveness has drawn attention from far-left Web loggers, as well as calls for the four-term senator to be targeted for defeat in 2008."

Spratt To Unveil Budget Plan The Week Of March 12. The Washington Post (3/1, A15, Kane, 690K) profiles Democratic Rep. John Spratt, the House Budget Committee chairman, who is "in charge of drafting a budget plan that will close a deficit of more than $200 billion within five years. And, as Spratt explained, he has to 'squirrel away a little money' for up to a dozen key Democratic priorities, including big increases for education and children's health care. And he's not supposed to raise taxes to cover the additional spending and eliminate the deficit." Spratt "will unveil his first budget the week of March 12 and submit it for passage by his committee. It's a prospect he's looking forward to with some trepidation: 'Beware the ides of March'" he warned, half joking."

Reports Find Few Schools Show Great Improvement Under NCLB. The Christian Science Monitor (3/1, Teicher, Ben Arnoldy, 59K) reports on a study by the Center on Education Policy which it describes as "a new and cautionary assessment of how challenging it is to reform public schools" under NCLB. The study found that "most schools" that are required to undergo restructuring under the No Child Left Behind Act "have not yet found a way to get out." NCLB "allows several restructuring options: turning the school over to the state or a management company, reopening as a charter, replacing much of the staff, or any other major action that will significantly change school governance." The "any other option" is "too often used as a loophole to avoid significant reforms." The U.S. Department Of Education "proposes taking the 'any other' option off the table."

Chamber Of Commerce Criticizes States' Educational Efforts. The Washington Times (3/1, Fagan, 88K) reports, "US Chamber of Commerce leaders yesterday said states are doing a poor job educating America's children for the future, citing a new report by the chamber that graded each state in areas from academic achievement and teacher quality to how wisely a state is spending its education dollars." The study was "conducted with help from the Center for American Progress (CAP) and the American Enterprise Institute" using "data from other research, the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) and a national survey of teachers." The leading states were Massachusetts, Minnesota and New Hampshire while the lowest were New Mexico, Mississippi and Washington, D.C. CAP President John Podesta pointed out that Massachusetts "showed only 44 percent of fourth-graders proficient in reading and 49 percent proficient in math -- numbers he called 'unconscionable.'" The study also contained recommendations for improving schools including "higher starting salaries for teachers, removing ineffective educators and giving principals more control over budget and personnel."

Brooks Urges Greater Attention To Early Childhood Attachments In Education Policy. David

Brooks writes in his column for the New York Times (3/1, 1.16M), "All the presidential candidates this year will talk about education. The conventional ones will talk about improving the schools. The creative ones will talk about improving the lives of students." These creative candidates will "emphasize that education is a cumulative process that begins at the dawn of life and builds early in life as children learn how to learn" and "students make the most of their natural dispositions when they have a secure emotional base from which to explore." Brooks favors "programs that do work to help young and stressed mothers establish healthier attachments."

Consumer Advocates Call For Hearings On FERC Oversight Of Power Markets. The Hill (3/1, Snyder) reports, "Consumer advocacy groups are pushing Democrats to step up oversight of a federal energy panel that oversees electricity markets and to take a fresh look at electricity-deregulation policies that they argue have raised consumer prices. Deregulation critics sponsored a Washington conference Monday on the health of wholesale power markets that included officials in deregulated states where prices have jumped significantly." The critics asked for "hearings on how effective the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission...is in overseeing wholesale power markets. Tyson Slocum, who directs Public Citizen's energy program, said deregulation has not led to competition in wholesale markets and that FERC has done a poor job of ensuring consumer rates are 'just and reasonable.'" The Hill adds, "Utilities, large commercial energy users and financial giants have formed their own coalition, called Compete, to counter anti-deregulation arguments."

House Measure Would Increase Scrutiny Of Foreign Business Deals. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A3, Hitt, 2.04M) reports, "The House approved legislation that would strengthen U.S. scrutiny of overseas-led business deals, underscoring lawmakers' angst over the frictions caused by the international-investment boom." The measure, "approved yesterday on a vote of 423-0, would require the administration to conduct an extended, 45-day investigation of most deals involving foreign governments, give intelligence agencies a formal role in the review process and increase disclosure to Congress, among other things." The "bipartisan legislation was written in consultation with the White House." The Washington Post (3/1, D3, Abrams, 690K), among other newspapers, also reports the story this morning.

Groups Look To Craft Better Government Proposals For Next Administration. The Washington Post's (3/1, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "With the presidential campaign field taking shape, think tanks and public-service and business groups are preparing to develop policy proposals and ideas for the winning candidate," to help "improve the government's management practices," and the Post notes several such efforts, including the "IBM Center for the Business of Government," which plans "to launch an 'interactive conversation'" today to help find ideas for the next White House." Also, "the Government Performance Coalition," which is sponsoring "a Transitions in Governance 2008 Web site, in hopes of helping shape the agenda for 2008 and beyond." The adds, "Thinking up new ideas for improving government could be challenge, after almost 16 years of 'reinventing government' by the" Clinton-Gore and Bush-Cheney "teams' 'president's management agenda.' Those initiatives were met with some resistance from Congress and were greeted skeptically by many federal employees who perceived them as efforts to downsize and outsource government operations."

Lack Of Attention Given Crandall Medal Award Criticized. In the Wall Street Journal's "Wonder Land" column (3/1), Daniel Henninger says that amid the "mad jumble that makes the news in our time, the White House on Monday held a ceremony for a Medal of Honor recipient," Bruce Crandall, who "earned his medal as a major, flying a Huey helicopter in 1965 in the Vietnam War." But the "Medal of Honor does not occupy the place in the nation's cultural life that it once did. This has much to do with the ambivalent place of the military in our angry politics." In a "less doubtful culture, Maj. Crandall's magnificent medal would have been on every front page, if only a photograph. It was on no one's front page Tuesday." All nations "celebrate personal icons, and ours now tend to be doers of good. That's fine. But if we suppress the martial feats of a Bruce Crandall, we distance ourselves further from our military. And in time, we will change. At some risk."

WPost Criticizes Smithsonian's Board Of Regents. The Washington Post (3/1, A16, 690K) says in an editorial, "A report by the Smithsonian inspector general questioned nearly $90,000 in unauthorized spending by" director Lawrence Small "from 2000 to 2005. Included were charges for private planes, the tab for his wife to go to Cambodia, catered meals and gifts. There was no evidence of fraud or abuse and no denying that many expenditures were related to Smithsonian business. Yet, as The Post's James V. Grimaldi reported, many transactions lacked documentation, violated Smithsonian policies and, in the words of the inspector general, 'might be considered lavish or extravagant.' The 17-member Board of Regents brushed the findings aside; in instances where the spending ran afoul of policy, the board just changed its rules. It's also disturbing that there were efforts to keep the report secret." As "distressing as Mr. Small's actions were, the real problem lies with a board that opted to be more lap dog than watchdog."

Stocks Rebound, Bernanke Says Economy In Good Shape. ABC World News (2/28, story 3, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "If you own stock, mutual funds or a 401(k), you can breathe a bit easier today." A day "after a precipitous drop on Wall Street, it was a calm day in the markets." ABC (Stark) added, "At a budget meeting, lawmakers tried to get Federal Reserve Chairman, Ben Bernanke to explain the plunge." Bernanke was shown saying, "There isn't didn't seem to be any one trigger of the correction we saw yesterday." Bernanke also "declared the stock market working normally. And tried to reassure investors the big sell-off was not a harbinger of dark days to come. The economy remains in good shape."

The CBS Evening News (2/28, lead story, 3:05, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Well, after the markets closed last night, everyone was wondering was that huge drop in prices the beginning of a downturn? Today we got the answer. It looks like it may have been a one-day wonder."

NBC Nightly News (2/28, lead story, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported the Dow "finished the day up more than 52 points [to close at 12,268.63] and NASDAQ gained over eight points [to close at 2,426.13]." The AP (3/1) notes the Standard & Poor's 500 index "climbed 7.78, or 0.56 percent, to 1,406.82."

The Financial Times (3/1, Guha) reports Bernanke "made no reference to the comments" by former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan, "who told investors in Hong Kong early on Monday morning that it was 'possible' the US would end the year in recession." Bernanke "repeated the Fed view that growth was likely to pick up in the second half of this year as the drag from housing and manufacturing fades." USA Today (3/1, Kirchhoff, 2.27M), McClatchy (3/1, Hall), New York Times (3/1, Andrews, 1.16M), Washington Post (3/1, A1, Henderson, Cho, 690K), Washington Times (3/1, Hill, 88K) and Wall Street Journal (3/1, Blackstone, Ives-Halperin, 2.04M) run similar reports.

In his "Washington Sketch" in the Washington Post (3/1, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank notes Bernanke "could not have sounded the alarm any clearer if he had carried a bullhorn and a gong. 'This expansion of debt would spark a fiscal crisis. … The US economy could be seriously weakened. … This is sort of like a snowball rolling down the hill. … This can really get out of control.'" Although his comments about the stock declines on Tuesday received almost all the attention, Bernanke had gone before Congress "not to prop up markets but to scold lawmakers about the need to do head off the coming fiscal crisis. Lawmakers, however, reacted like addicts, either denying their problem or promising to give up the spending habit another day."

The New York Times (3/1, Anderson, Bajaj, 1.16M) credits the market numbers to Bernanke's comments and "a bounce-back in the Chinese markets," while USA Today (3/1, 4B, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Giving investors' the biggest dose of relief was the fact that the Chinese stock market, which triggered the whole mess with its 9% plunge Tuesday, bounced back strongly with a 4% gain Wednesday."

McClatchy (3/1, Hall) says the US and Chinese stock exchanges "returned to a semblance of normalcy Wednesday, but concerns about both economies linger following the worst global sell-off of stocks in more than five years." Bernanke "brought a temporary reprieve, telling lawmakers that financial markets 'seem to be working well.'"

The Wall Street Journal (3/1, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports that although "investors crept cautiously back into the stock market," the "mild recovery didn't calm the market's jitters or come close to recovering Tuesday's 416-point plunge in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. … Typically, a bull market doesn't end quite as abruptly as this, said Phil Roth, chief technical market analyst at New York brokerage firm Miller Tabak. Mr. Roth himself is in the bearish camp, viewing recent market moves as a 'topping' process that will lead to a longer-running decline." But "he doesn't see the decline happening just yet."

The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A2, lp, Whitehouse, 2.04M) says "some economists see a turning point" in Tuesday's market drop. John Lonski, chief economist at Moody's Investors Service, said, "This is a wake-up call. … Unfortunately, if there is an increase in risk aversion, it's taking place exactly when business-investment spending has been much lower than anticipated." The Journal adds, "One of the first places this is showing up is in the market for subprime mortgage loans, those made to less-creditworthy borrowers. As defaults on such loans have risen sharply, investment banks and other financial firms have sharply reduced the creation of new collateralized debt obligations backed by subprime loans. Such CDOs have become a popular way to pool baskets of loans, then redistribute slices with varying degrees of risk and return to a spectrum of investors."

Technological Glitch May Have Contributed To Tuesday's Market Drop. The Washington Post (3/1, D1, Tse, Day, 690K) reports, "It was unclear Wednesday whether the delays were related to a technological glitch that caused the Dow to plummet 200 points in a matter of minutes shortly before 3 p.m. Tuesday. The drop was caused when the system that calculates the average recorded a backlog of trades after the process was switched to a backup computer. Down the street, traders at the American Stock Exchange complained of similar problems, and large brokerage firms also said they had trouble executing trades." Traders "said that generally, when they send buy or sell requests via a handheld device, those orders are reflected almost instantly on trading-floor screens. That was not the case Tuesday. … Because they could not see whether their orders had registered, some traders sent the same order twice, which meant they ended up buying or selling twice as many shares than they wanted."

The Wall Street Journal (3/1, C1, Lucchetti, Scannell, 2.04M) reports "trading problems grew more serious after an error in the calculation in the Dow Jones Industrial Average caused a sudden point drop, which the NYSE says led to a 50% spike in orders. 'It was a mess,' says Steve Swanson, head of Automated Trading Desk LLC, a large brokerage firm based in Mount Pleasant, S.C. 'There was a lack of information. No one was telling us what was going on. The hybrid is new, and we're seeing record volumes, and it's not holding up well.'"

Hubbard Says Economy Remains Strong. On MSNBC's Hardball (2/28, Matthews), host Chris Matthews spoke with Alan Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council. Asked about the 3% decline in the Dow on Tuesday, Hubbard said, "The President feels that the fundamentals of the economy continue to be very, very strong. … You know, we don't get into figuring out whether stocks are overvalued or undervalued. What we care about is, Is this economy creating jobs? Yes, it is. It's created over seven million since the middle of '03, over a half million in the last three months, over 100,000 most months. Unemployment rate's at 4.6 percent, which is lower than it was."

First Quarter GDP Revised Downward To 2.2%. The New York Times (3/1, Porter, 1.16M) reports, "Analysts have been stumped by the apparent resilience of the American economy, which seemed to be bounding ahead at a 3.5 percent pace in the final quarter of last year even as the housing market fell and the Federal Reserve raised interest rates. The paradox has been solved: the economy was not bounding." The Commerce Department "reported yesterday that economic growth inched ahead by 2.2 percent in the fourth quarter of last year, only slightly faster than the 2 percent growth recorded in the third quarter and substantially below the economy's long-term trend rate of growth The downward revision, by 1.3 percentage points, in the preliminary estimate of gross domestic product was almost three times the average adjustment since the early 1980s, which is 0.5 percentage point."

USA Today (3/1, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "With the latest revision, GDP rose 3.3% in 2006, up from 3.2% in 2005 but lower than the 3.9% in 2004." The economy "could grow below 2% in the first quarter, warns David Rosenberg, North American economist at Merrill Lynch."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/1, Scherer, 59K) says the economy "is entering spring with less wind at its back than it has had for the past four years." Although "the slowdown is still not a big concern of most economists," they "warn that an economy that is moving more like a tortoise than a hare is at greater risk of being overrun by some outside event – perhaps one that causes a recession or a period of very slow growth. But a sustainable slow-growth economy does have a bright side: Inflationary pressure is likely to ease, keeping the Federal Reserve from raising interest rates for borrowers."

Likewise, the Wall Street Journal (3/1, A2, Conkey, Aeppel, 2.04M) reports the economy "was considerably weaker than previously thought in the fourth quarter of 2006," and its "growth may remain moderate until the manufacturing sector solves its inventory problems and businesses step up their capital spending."

The Financial Times (3/1, Callan) reports Drew Matus, an economist at Lehman Brothers, said, "The figures suggest the economy is playing out largely as the Fed expected, with a little bit of worrisome weakness in the housing market."

New Home Sales Down 17% In February. The Financial Times (3/1, Callan) reports, "Americans bought far fewer new homes last month, according to government data released on Wednesday that showed sales fell at the fastest rate in 13 years." Sales of newly built homes "fell 17 percent as the backlog of houses standing empty remained stubbornly high, figures from the Commerce Department showed." The drop "was greater than even the most pessimistic Wall Street economists predicted and sent shares in housebuilders tumbling. Home Depot shares also slipped as the DIY store said it expected anaemic sales and lower profits this year." The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A3, Conkey, Lloyd, 2.04M) also reports the story under the headline "Drag From Housing Could Persist."

More Commentary. Lawrence Kudlow, host of CNBC's "Kudlow & Company," writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/1, A13, 2.04M), "The US stock markets were looking for a correction for some time now and on Tuesday they found it: a 3.5% sell-off across the board. The plunge follows a 20% run-up that began last summer, and some analysts believe it was overdue. Indeed, 3% corrections are normal and healthy. … The high-tech, productivity-driven US economy is more durable and flexible than its liberal-left critics will ever admit. It is a private-sector free-enterprise economy, not a government-planned one. Innovation is strong and entrepreneurial spirits are high. The four prosperity killers, a paradigm coined by Arthur Laffer many years ago, all look dormant: inflation, taxes and regulatory burdens are low, while free trade keeps expanding."

The New York Times (3/1, 1.16M) editorializes that Bernanke "managed to calm the market, saying that one could reasonably hope for a stronger economy by midyear if housing stabilized soon, and if manufacturing strengthened. But those are big ifs. The torrent of bad news on housing is only worsening."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/1, A12, 2.04M) says, "One benefit of Tuesday's rout in equities is that it is causing everyone to learn more about the Chinese financial system." According to the Journal, "The lesson here is that the performance of the Shanghai index bears little correlation to China's underlying economic growth." The "far larger threat" from China, its says, "is from US protectionism or lobbying for Beijing to revalue its currency. Either one of those could send the real Chinese economy -- not just the Shanghai stock casino -- into slower growth or deflation or both." However, 'Efforts to impose standardized accounting rules and crack down on corruption help. But the best way to develop China's stock markets is to impose market discipline -- and especially to let average Chinese put their $4 trillion of savings where they may."

Landrieu Expected To Face "Tough Race" If Challenged By "Legitimate Republican." Roll Call (3/1, Duran) reports that with Sen. Mary Landrieu's "narrow victories, the state's displaced, mostly Democratic voters, and the relatively high popularity of President Bush compared with his standing in the rest of the country," Republicans "see a chance to flip yet another Southern Democratic Senate seat in a presidential election year." However, "some Democratic operatives believe that Landrieu is in good shape as she begins her bid for a third term." The senator is "voting center-right, pushing for hurricane relief funds' and reaching out to other parts of the state beyond New Orleans," said "one knowledgeable Democratic strategist who did not want to be named." Roll Call continues, "Undoubtedly Landrieu's biggest coup to date — her involvement in opening a huge swath of the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas production — should earn her plaudits across the state. … Still, even loyal Democrats…concede that any legitimate Republican, including Rep. Richard Baker, who is contemplating running, will give her a tough race."

Draft Issue Could Prove Troublesome In Giuliani's Quest For President. The Washington (DC) Examiner (3/1, Sammon) reports, "If this presidential campaign is anything like the last, John McCain's Vietnam service will inevitably be contrasted with GOP rival Rudy Giuliani's avoidance of a war that he opposed. 'Any suggestion that he was dodging the draft is totally, factually inaccurate,' said a senior Giuliani campaign adviser who spoke on the condition of anonymity. … 'He opposed the war on tactical and strategic grounds.' But as far back as 1993, when he successfully ran for mayor of New York, Giuliani has been dogged by accusations that he pulled strings to avoid the draft. By contrast, McCain has long been feted as a bona fide war hero for his harrowing stint in a Vietnamese prison. … Giuliani, who once said of the Vietnam war, 'I disagreed with it,' obtained an occupational deferment in 1969, when he was a law clerk. Although critics say such deferments were rare, the Giuliani campaign disagrees. 'He wanted an occupational deferment, which was very common at the time, because he wanted to be a lawyer,' the Giuliani adviser said. When Giuliani's deferment expired in 1970, he drew draft number 308, which was never called. His campaign suggests this proves he was not a draft dodger." But "Giuliani has always been politically sensitive to the issue. During his 1993 mayoral campaign, he commissioned a 'vulnerability study' that listed 'draft dodger' as one of the epithets that might be hurled against him."

As Mayor, Giuliani Appointed Numerous Left-Leaning Judges. The Politico (3/1, Smith) reports, "When Rudy Giuliani faces Republicans concerned about his support of gay rights and legal abortion, he reassures them that he is a conservative on the decisions that matter most. 'I would want judges who are strict constructionists because I am,' he told South Carolina Republicans last month. 'Those are the kinds of justices I would appoint -- Scalia, Alito and Roberts.' But most of Giuliani's judicial appointments during his eight years as mayor of New York were hardly in the model of Chief Justice John Roberts or Samuel Alito -- much less aggressive conservatives in the mold of Antonin Scalia. A Politico review of the 75 judges Giuliani appointed to three of New York state's lower courts found that Democrats outnumbered Republicans by more than 8 to 1. One of his appointments was an officer of the International Association of Lesbian and Gay Judges. Another ruled that the state law banning liquor sales on Sundays was unconstitutional because it was insufficiently secular. A third, an abortion-rights supporter, later made it to the federal bench in part because" New York Sen. Chuck Schumer (D) "said he liked her ideology. Cumulatively, Giuliani's record was enough to win applause from people like Kelli Conlin, the head of NARAL Pro-Choice New York, the state's leading abortion-rights group. 'They were decent, moderate people,' she said."

McCain Makes "Preannouncement" Of 2008 Intentions On Letterman. The CBS Evening News (2/28, story 6, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Well, we've been expecting it for some time but today Senator John McCain made it official." Sen. John McCain: "I am announcing that I will be a candidate for President of the United States." Couric: "The Arizona Republican made the announcement during the taping of tonight's Late Show with David Letterman. This will be his second run for the White House. He lost the republican nomination to George W. Bush in 2000."

On CBS' Late Show (2/28, Letterman), McCain said, "The last time we were on this program, I'm sure you remember everything very clearly. … You asked me if I would come back on this show if I was going to announce. I am announcing that I will be a candidate for President of the United States. … I'll be making a formal announcement in April." Letterman: "This is not the formal announcement." McCain: "This is the announcement. You drag this out as long as you can. You don't just have one rendition." Letterman: "You're saying this was not the formal announcement." McCain: "This is the announcement preceding the formal announcement." Letterman: "How do you think that makes me feel?" McCain: "You were first."

The AP (3/1, Franklin, Sidoti) reports McCain "will officially enter the presidential race" with "a formal announcement in early April after a trip to Iraq." McCain "discussed the timing of the long-expected announcement with reporters at an awards reception Wednesday evening a few hours after taping an appearance" on Letterman. He "later told reporters that he would visit Iraq first and that his campaign would be about 'whether I have the vision, experience and knowledge to lead the nation.'" Former New York Gov. George Pataki "introduced McCain to reporters before the Irish-American 10th Annual Awards reception Wednesday night. Asked about polls showing him trailing former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, McCain said: 'We keep doing the best we can. We're very happy with the way things are going.'" The Chicago Tribune (3/1, 617K) also runs the AP story.

The New York Times (3/1, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports McCain's "remarks erased entirely whatever doubt could have existed about his ambitions for the Republican nomination." McCain is "known as something of a free spirit, and his aides suggested that his remarks to Mr. Letterman were, if formal-sounding, extemporaneous rather than a result of careful planning by his campaign. Nonetheless, aides said, his appearance clearly fit into the campaign's effort to stir as much excitement and interest as possible in his plans — a point Mr. McCain himself made as he and Mr. Letterman bantered on."

The Washington Post (3/1, A1, Balz, 690K) reports in a front page story that McCain's "decision to use the program to declare his intentions followed a pattern increasingly common in this presidential contest, as candidates have used multi-step announcement schedules to garner maximum attention for their bids." But McCain "may have additional motives for using the late-night comedian's show, as he tries to rekindle some of the spontaneity and unpredictability from his first campaign." McCain advisers "said the decision to declare that he will join the Republican race was not a direct result of concern that Giuliani has gained ground in the past two months but rather part of a long-planned strategy to make his intentions known around this time."

Ridge To Serve As National Co-Chair For McCain Committee. The AP (3/1) reports former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge "will serve as national co-chair of Republican John McCain's presidential exploratory committee, the campaign said Wednesday." Ridge "praised McCain's leadership in a statement announcing his support for the Arizona senator's bid for the White House 'What sets John apart is his ability to form coalitions around a common, principled cause. Our country is at a crossroads and John McCain is the leader who fundamentally knows what it takes to move us forward and keep us safe,' Ridge said."

McCain Finance Committee Dominated By Californians, New Yorkers. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Morain, 850K) reports McCain "unveiled a presidential campaign finance committee Wednesday dominated by Californians and New Yorkers, including some of the biggest donors to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and President Bush." McCain's 13 national finance committee "co-chairmen include five Californians: Orange County billionaire Donald Bren; investor George Argyros; Univision Chairman A. Jerrold Perenchio; Cisco Systems Chief Executive John Chambers; and San Francisco venture capitalist J. Gary Shansby." Altogether, McCain "named 70 Californians, 68 of them men, to his finance team. They will be expected to raise $100,000 or more for the campaign." Shansby said, "I'd be very disappointed if I didn't raise over $2 million." The Times adds McCain's California list "includes executives in the entertainment, investment, banking, telecommunications, real estate, gambling and alcohol industries, and current and retired politicians." Other co-chairmen "include New York Stock Exchange Chairman John A. Thain; JP Morgan Vice Chairman James B. Lee; New Jersey banker Lawrence E. Bathgate; GOP fundraiser Lewis M. Eisenberg of New York; and former New Jersey Rep. James A. Courter, chairman of the telecommunications firm IDT Corp."

McCain Said To Have "Dissed" CPAC. The Washington Times (3/1, Hallow, 88K) reports Sen. John McCain "is the only major Republican presidential candidate who will not address the nation's premier gathering of conservatives this year." Sponsors of the Conservative Political Action Conference "say the Arizona Republican has 'dissed' organizers by attempting to schedule a private reception for attendees after rejecting invitations to speak at the event." William J. Lauderback, executive vice president of the American Conservative Union, said, "It was a classical McCain move, dissing us by going behind our backs." The Times adds, "Conservative activists have speculated that Mr. McCain did not want to be seen on television 'pandering' to Republican 'right-wingers' but wanted to court those same activists at a reception in the same hotel."

Romney Seeking Bundlers To Raise $250,000 For LA Event. The AP (3/1) reports former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney "wants to sign up supporters who can raise as much as $250,000 for his presidential campaign at a Los Angeles fundraiser in March." The event, "at the home of developer Rick Caruso on March 27, is being co-hosted by California venture capitalist Brad Freeman, a major fundraiser for President Bush, and money manager Robert A. Day." An invitation "for the 'Los Angeles Kick Off' notes that the maximum individual donation for an election is $2,300, but supporters can be named co-chair and 'national founder' by agreeing to raise $250,000 for the event."

In '08 GOP Race, Novak Sees Conservative "Void" Among Frontrunners. In his column in the Washington Post (3/1, A17, 690K) Robert D. Novak relates, "New York-based political consultant Kieran Mahoney's survey of probable Republican participants in the 2008 Iowa presidential caucuses showed this support for the 'big three' candidates: John McCain, 20.5 percent; Rudy Giuliani, 16.3 percent; Mitt Romney, 3.5 percent. Astonishingly, they all trailed" ex-Virginia Gov. James Gilmore, "who had 31 percent. How could that be? Because it was not a legitimate survey but a 'push poll,' normally a clandestine effort to rig the results by telling respondents negative things about some of the candidates. But Mahoney makes no secret that the voters he sampled were told of liberal deviations by McCain, Giuliani and Romney, as well as true-blue conservatism by Gilmore, who is Mahoney's client. Mahoney is trying to prove a point widely accepted in Republican ranks. None of the three front-line candidates is a natural fit for the nation's right-of-center party. Without question, there is a void. The question is whether Gilmore or anyone else can fill it."

Obama Proposes Changes To Homeland Security Funding. The AP (3/1, Pickler) reports, "Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama wants to change the government's formula for giving states money for homeland security, with the early voting states getting a little extra. Obama wants states that have a bigger risk from the terrorist threat to get more of federal homeland security dollars -- also a recommendation from the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks. … Currently, each state gets at least a .75 percent share of the roughly $900 million in the state homeland security grant program. The Senate bill would lower that to .45 percent, and Obama, the Illinois senator, is offering an amendment that would cut it to .25 percent. His office said it expects the Senate to consider the measure next week. A memo by Obama's staff says the senator wants to 'ensure the funding is allocated based on the threats states face, not politics.' But states with big political influence need not worry that they will get short shrift from the candidate's amendment. The biggest benefactors would be Obama's Illinois and other heavily populated states, including White House rival Hillary Rodham Clinton's New York, which would each get more than $1 million in extra funding under Obama's plan versus another Senate proposal." However, "even though they have much smaller populations, the leadoff Democratic primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina would not be harmed under Obama's plan. Iowa would get an additional $119,824; Nevada would get $86,222 more; and South Carolina would receive $175,027 extra."

Polls Show African-American Support Helping Obama Eat Into Clinton's Lead. The Christian Science Monitor (3/1, Feldmann, 59K) reports that Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's (D) "dramatic rise in support among African-Americans signals a shift in the race for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination that is larger than just the black vote." New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "is still on top, but her lead is shrinking. And polls show" Obama "has more room for growth than she does, because of her high negatives. … 'We have a real horserace,' says John Zogby, an independent pollster whose latest data show that Obama leads Clinton among black Democratic voters 36 percent to 27 percent. A Washington Post/ABC News poll released Tuesday showed a similar trend: Obama leads Clinton among black Democratic voters 44 to 30. In both December and January, the Post/ABC poll had Clinton beating Obama among African-Americans 60 to 20. Overall, the latest Post/ABC poll shows Clinton beating Obama 36 to 24, down from a 41-17 split in January. The Post attributes the gains of Obama, who is black, to his rise in support among African-Americans."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/28, Matthews), host Chris Matthews, Eugene Robinson of the Washington Post, and Kate O'Beirne of the National Review discussed Sen. Barak Obama's increased support among African American voters in the latest Post/ABC News poll. Robinson said that in an appearance at Claflin College in Orangeburg, South Carolina, a historically black college: "This was in an African-American crowd. And is he black enough? That's what all the reporters wanted to ask everybody, and people looked at them as if they were crazy. And it was not really an issue for most people. It's interesting. His heritage is interesting. And he's a fascinating guy. He spoke very well. He had the crowd."

Spitzer Not Ready To Endorse Clinton. The AP (3/1) reports New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer "broke bread with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on Wednesday, but unlike other Democrats at the breakfast table, he's not ready to give her a morsel of an endorsement." On a trip to Washington, Spitzer "met with the state delegation — including Clinton, his party's early front-runner in the 2008 presidential race — but when asked later about who he's supporting for president, he kept a professional distance." Spitzer said, "At this point it's premature to be even thinking about questions like that. I'm focused on the state and the budget."

Gore Criticized For Home Energy Use. The Washington Post (3/1, A8, Cillizza, Mosk, 690K) reports, "Fresh off his victory lap at the Academy Awards, former vice president Al Gore -- who has not closed the door on a 2008 bid -- found himself in a more familiar position: on the receiving end of a political attack." The barb "came via the Tennessee Center for Policy Research, a Nashville-based think tank that advocates 'limited government through policy solutions,' according to its Web site." Drew Johnson, in a "release alleging that Gore's house in the Volunteer State uses 20 times as much electricity as the average household nationwide," said, "As the spokesman of choice for the global warming movement, Al Gore has to be willing to walk the walk, not just talk the talk, when it comes to home energy use."

WSJournal Criticizes Gore's Energy "Indulgences." The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A12, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "There is an irresistible quality to the story about Al Gore's energy-hungry Tennessee home, replete with a heated poolhouse that burns more natural gas -- $500 a month worth -- than most of us can afford to use while heating houses that shelter people, as opposed to swimming lanes. Did you know that Mr. Gore's house uses more electricity in a month than the average household does in a year?" Gore is "rich and fortunate enough to be able to afford the 'carbon offset' for his energy indulgences. The middle-class parents who need a gas-guzzling SUV to haul the kids to soccer practice might not be so lucky. They might even settle for an unheated pool."

Gore, Gingrich Seen As "Phantom" Loves Of Respective Parties. On MSNBC's Hardball (2/28, Matthews), host Chris Matthews, Eugene Robinson of the Washington Post, and Kate O'Beirne of the National Review discussed what Matthews called "the love of the phantom in both" the Republican and Democratic parties – non-candidates Al Gore and Newt Gingrich, who had reached double digits in the latest Washington Post/ABC News poll. O'Beirne said, "Except in both cases, both Al Gore and Newt Gingrich, I mean, they tend to trail sort of in single digits as long as their candidacies are not real." O'Beirne later added Gore has "now become this really popular Hollywood figure, and as a colleague of mine said, Hollywood is like a voter repellent to people." Robinson said, "I'm not sure Hollywood hurts him that much, but I don't see him coming back in this race. I don't see him getting it."

Perry Ousts Texas Youth Commission Chairman. The New York Times (3/1, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports, "Gov. Rick Perry removed the chairman of the Texas Youth Commission on Wednesday over charges that the agency covered up the sexual abuse of incarcerated juveniles." Perry also "called for the ouster of the acting executive director, the appointment of an independent inspector general and a shake-up throughout the commission, which runs 13 schools housing 3,000 felons under age 21." The dismissed chairman, Pete C. Alfaro, "is a former mayor of Baytown who was first named to the commission in 1995 by Gov. George W. Bush and was appointed chairman by Mr. Perry in 2004. Mr. Alfaro did not respond to messages seeking comment. His latest five-year term expires in August."

Public Said To Want Partisan Government. In a Washington Post op-ed (3/1, A17), Emory University Professor Alan Abramowitz and Austin journalist Bill Bishop say after the midterm elections, "bipartisanship was all the buzz, and moderation the wave of the future. But something happened on the way to the evening campfire and s'mores. House Republicans started complaining about Democrats riding roughshod into the majority, refusing to consider their amendments to legislation. President Bush announced that he wasn't going to let the opposition of congressional Democrats stop him from sending 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq. Meanwhile, Democratic leaders trashed most of Bush's domestic policy proposals as soon as they were announced in his State of the Union address." One "explanation for all this is that politicians are acting against the will of their compromise-loving constituents. Another is that Republicans and Democrats are simply being good representatives. We think the evidence supports the second interpretation." It may "be comforting to believe our problems could be solved if only those vile politicians in Washington would learn to get along. The source of the country's division, however, is nestled much closer to home."

Schwarzenegger's "Post-Partisanship" Seen As Model For Washington. In his Roll Call column (3/1), Morton Kondracke says, "It used to be said that every American social, political and fashion trend started in California. Let's hope that's true again with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's concept of 'post-partisanship.'" Now, Schwarzenegger is "in the process of trying to put post-partisanship to work to achieve environmental cleanup, road and prison construction -- and, most creatively, a mandatory health insurance plan to cover all Californians, including illegal immigrants." The effort "and the concept behind it -- shared responsibility on the part of individuals, employers, health providers and government -- is one that could achieve a consensus here." But "beyond that, whether it's called post-partisanship or just old-fashioned bipartisanship, what Schwarzenegger is selling philosophically is what every poll indicates the public wants -- an end to partisan combat and attention to problem solving." There is "evidence that some people in Washington have caught the mood. Last week, 10 Senators — five of each party, including some pretty conservative Republicans -- called on President Bush to begin working on health care reform that would 'ensure that all Americans have affordable, quality private health coverage.'"

Government Report Says As Many As 750,000 People Are Homeless. ABC World News (2/28, story 4, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Federal Government…released a sweeping, new report on homelessness. A notoriously difficult problem to track. The latest estimate finds there are more than 750,000 homeless people, in transitional shelters or housing or living on the street. On any given night, there are about 300,000 more homeless people than there are beds for the homeless."

The CBS Evening News (2/28, story 3, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "On any given day, as many as 754,000 people in this country are homeless," and "one-third of the homeless are families with children." CBS (Bowers) added, "This may be the most heart breaking face of today's findings -- the homeless children in America."

The Washington Post (3/1, A6, Brubaker, 690K) says HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson "trumpeted the study -- the first of its kind by the agency -- as a 'huge leap forward in our understanding of not only how many people are homeless but also what their needs are.'" Jackson "called this report 'a powerful tool to help all of us at the federal, state and local level design more effective responses to homelessness and better help those who are living in shelters and on our streets.'" But "Michael Stoops, acting director of the National Coalition for the Homeless, criticized the government for 'spending more time on counting homeless people than finding housing for them.'"

Mehlman Joins Akin Gump. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A5A, Harwood, Mullins, 2.04M) reports, "President Bush's 2004 campaign manager has a new client, and it isn't one of the 2008 White House hopefuls courting the Republican Right." Ken Mehlman, "most recently chairman of the Republican National Committee, is setting out to advise US businesses on coping with political winds shifting against his party. And the challenges he sees looming are hardly touchstones of the Bush political agenda." Moving to the Washington law firm of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP, Mehlman "becomes the latest political figure to enter a niche in the capital's influence business. Instead of traditional lobbying centered on relationships with officeholders, many former officials pursue careers counseling business about political trends and helping them meet challenges with quasipolitical campaigns that blend strategic advice, public relations and mobilization of targeted constituencies."

Iran, Syria Agree To Attend Iraq Summit. NBC Nightly News (2/28, story 4, 1:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Iran, Syria and the US have all apparently agreed to sit at the same table at a regional security conference on Iraq hosted by the Iraqis." Tehran accepted the invitation "very cautiously" to what "could be a diplomatic game changer." Iran, however, "will be there if it is in the best interest of Iraq," but "want to avoid" the summit "turning into a session of finger pointing, accusations relating to their arming of Shi'ia militias."

The CBS Evening News (2/28, story 4, 1:20, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported the date has been set for the conference, and "it looks now like this conference is going to take place in two stages. The first one will be in Baghdad. And as you say, ambassadors from Syria, Iran and the US, among others, will meet March 10. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad will represent the US." Meanwhile, a second meeting could take place "as soon as mid-April somewhere in the region, but outside Iraq, that would involve Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and foreign ministers."

The New York Times (3/1, A12, Oppel, 1.16M) reports Iranian national security official, Ali Larijani, "indicated Wednesday that Iranian officials would take part in a regional security conference on Iraq, setting the stage for the highest-level contact between American and Iranian officials in more than two years." The "willingness of American officials" to attend the conference with Syrian and Iranian officials "has been widely seen as reflecting a decision by the Bush administration to yield to critics who have argued that it should no longer avoid high-level contacts with Tehran."

The Financial Times (3/1, Dinmore, Smyth) reports when asked if Tehran "ran any risks in meeting the Americans," Larijani replied, "One should not commit suicide because one is afraid of death." The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Mostaghim, 850K) also report Larijani's comments.

In an interview with the AP (3/1, Abdul-Zahra, Lederer), Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said Wednesday the Iranians agreed to participate in a meeting with the other neighbors but "they have some questions" about a separate session that would be held the same day with the five permanent council members. His comments "seemed to indicate that Iran was at least partly unhappy with the arrangements for the conference, and weighing the extent of its own participation."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/1, Murphy, 59K) says the Bush administration's decision to participate in the summit "indicates that the days of working from an 'our-way-or-the-highway' stance may be over." Meanwhile, analysts say that Iran "won't miss the chance to sit down with the US" as "America's apparent belief that Iran can help fix the problems of its neighbor opens up the slight possibility of a quid pro quo -- less pressure on nukes in exchange for more help on Iraq." Like Iran, Syria "will see the meeting as a chance to get a 'foot in the door' with the US."

Washington Rules Out Direct Talks With Iran. The Washington Times (3/1, Sands, 88K) says US officials yesterday "were at pains to reject the idea that the decision to sit down with Syria and Iran reflected an about-face in US policy." The Financial Times (3/1, Dinmore, Smyth) reports the Bush administration Wednesday "dismissed suggestions that it might engage directly with Iran or Syria" at the conference. While "European allies and domestic critics have broadly welcomed" the announcement by Secretary Rice Tuesday, the White House Wednesday "stepped in to 'clarify' the situation and explicitly ruled out" direct talks with Tehran. White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "There will not be bilateral talks between the United States and Iran or the United States and Syria, within the context of these meetings." Some analysts interpreted the "mixed signals" as "evidence that the Bush administration was more interested in using the appearance of diplomacy to appease domestic critics and get its supplemental Iraq war budget through Congress, rather than adopt one of the key findings of the Iraq Study Group." However, other analysts believed that Rice "was in fact trying to shift the US position in the direction of engagement with Iran, as has happened in recent weeks with North Korea."

In an analysis, the AP (3/1, Gearan) says although the Bush administration "says it's not going soft on Iran," the summit in Iraq "could crack the door for other discussions with the last holdout among President Bush's old axis of evil." The announcement Tuesday "wasn't exactly an olive branch, but Rice's mild overture looked dramatic after escalating US allegations that Iran is contributing to the spreading chaos in Iraq and a calculated show of US military might in the Persian Gulf."

McCain Urges Talks With Iran. Sen. John McCain said on CBS' Late Show (2/28, Letterman), "I think it's terrible that the Iranians are" assisting the Iraq insurgency, and "we've also got another problem with the Iranians, and that is that they're building nuclear weapons. … As a country and as two parties, we've got to sit down together and work out some of these strategies together in a bipartisan fashion."

US Participation In Summit Welcomed. In an editorial, the Washington Post (3/1, A16, 690K) welcomes the Administration's decision to participate in the summit as "a welcome way to strengthen US diplomacy at a crucial moment in the Middle East." Although the talks "aren't likely to settle any of" the regional "crises," the Post says "they are a necessary part of any solutions." By "participating and opening the way for conversations with the Syrian and Iranian governments, the Administration will extract itself from a diplomatic corner and gain some fresh opportunities."

Similarly, Victor Davis Hanson, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, writes in a USA Today (3/1, 12A, 2.27M) op-ed that the US "should attend regional talks," but warns that it "should not negotiate directly" with Iran and Syria "until they cooperate with ongoing United Nations investigations and cease trying to destroy neighboring democracies."

Russian FM Warns US Against Striking Iran. The AP (3/1, Isachenkov) reports Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov "warned Washington not to use force against Iran and criticized what he described as the United States' unilateral approach to other global crises" in an interview published Wednesday. The Russian daily Rossiyskaya Gazeta report Lavrov said Russia was worried about Vice President Cheney's recent comment that "all options are on the table" to stop Tehran from becoming a nuclear power. Lavrov was quoted as saying, "We are concerned about the possibility of a military scenario. We are observing a US military buildup in the Persian Gulf. Such a buildup of forces always threatens to trigger a military conflict, even by accident."

New UN Sanctions May Target Iranian Bank. The Financial Times (3/1, Dombey) reports diplomats are "debating whether to increase pressure on Tehran's nuclear program by targeting Bank Sepah, a leading Iranian bank," with new U.N. sanctions. Such a move "would follow a campaign by the US to persuade European nations to follow its example and take steps against Sepah that would exclude it from international markets."

US Intelligence Officials Express Uncertainty Over Scope Of Pyongyang's Nuclear Program. On its front page, the New York Times (3/1, A1, Sanger, Broad, 1.16M) reports that "for nearly five years, though, the Bush administration, based on intelligence estimates, has accused North Korea of also pursuing a secret, parallel path to a bomb, using enriched uranium." But now, American intelligence officials "are publicly softening their position, admitting to doubts about how much progress the uranium enrichment program has actually made," leading to "new questions about the Bush administration's decision to confront North Korea in 2002." The "public revelation" of the intelligence agencies' doubts, "which have been brewing for some time, came almost by happenstance." In "a little-noticed exchange" Tuesday at a hearing at the Senate Armed Services Committee, Joseph DeTrani, the DNI's mission manager for North Korea, told Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island that "we still have confidence that the program is in existence -- at the mid-confidence level." DeTrani's disclosure "underscores broader questions about the ability of intelligence agencies to discern the precise status of foreign weapons programs."

In a similar report, the Washington Post (3/1, A1, Kessler, 690K) says the Bush administration is "backing away from its long-held assertions that North Korea has an active clandestine program to enrich uranium, leading some experts to believe that the original US intelligence that started the crisis over Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions may have been flawed." In addition to DeTrani's remarks Tuesday, the Post notes Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, "told a conference last week in Washington that it is unclear whether North Korea ever mastered the production techniques necessary for such a program."

US Discusses Release Of Frozen North Korean Funds. The New York Times (3/1, A13, Weisman, Greenlees, 1.16M) reports China and the US "are close to an accord to let North Korea regain some of the $25 million in its funds frozen in a bank in Macao now that it has agreed to start dismantling its nuclear arms program," American officials said Wednesday. The officials said arrangements for North Korea "to get a portion of the funds frozen at Banco Delta Asia," could be announced "in the next few weeks." Meanwhile, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill Wednesday told the House Foreign Affairs Committee he had "no doubt that freezing the funds compelled North Korea to negotiate."

US, North Korea Talks Set For March. The AP (3/1) reports the State Department announced Wednesday Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill will meet with North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan in New York on March 5-6 "to discuss initial steps toward normalizing relations."

The Washington Times (3/1, A1, Kralev, 88K) reports on its front page that the State Department yesterday "ruled out 'immediate results' from" next week's talks. In confirming the date of the talks, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack yesterday warned, "I would caution you that this meeting is just a first step. … Don't look at it as a meeting that is going to produce immediate results."

Latest US Diplomatic Overtures Said To Reveal "New Respect For Pragmatism." In a front-page analysis piece titled "In US Overtures to Foes, New Respect for Pragmatism," the New York Times (3/1, A1, Cooper, 1.16M) notes that "in the span of just two weeks," the US "has agreed to hold high-level contacts with Iran and Syria, and to start down the path toward formal diplomatic recognition of North Korea," leading to the question, "Has the Bush administration gone soft on its foes?" Although Administration officials "insisted Wednesday that the new overtures…did not mean there had been a change" in policy, "foreign policy experts, administration critics on Capitol Hill and former diplomats disagreed, saying the Administration appeared to have recognized the extent to which it had tied its own hands by insisting on talking only to friends." Even Secretary Rice, it notes, called the opening to Tehran and Damascus a "diplomatic initiative."

Diplomacy May Define Bush's Second Term. USA Today (3/1, 10A, 2.27M) reports, "It happened to Ronald Reagan, and it is happening to George W. Bush. With less than two years left in office, Bush is talking to countries he once shunned." Bush's "new flexibility" is seen as a result "of his desire to salvage his Iraq policy and tamp down other crises around the globe," says Richard Haass, head of the Council on Foreign Relations. In addition, personnel changes, including the departure of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, within the Administration might also have "smoothed the way."

Egyptian Governance Seen Stifling Opposition. On its front page, the New York Times (3/1, A1, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "Cairo is home to 15 million and often described as the center of the Arab world, an incubator of culture and ideas. But it is also a collection of villages, a ruralized metropolis where people live by their wits and devices, cut off from the authorities, the law and often each other." This "social reality" also plays a role "in the nation's style of governance," which many residents say "is not there to better their lives; advancement is based on connections and bribes; the central authority is at best a benign force to be avoided." The system has also "stifled political opposition and allowed a small group to remain in power for decades."

Sarkozy Outlines Foreign Policy. The New York Times (3/1, A8, Sciolino, 1.16M) reports French presidential candidate Nicolas Sarkozy "wants to toughen sanctions against Iran, keep Turkey out of the European Union, create an independent European defense strategy and have a friendly but not a submissive relationship with the United States." In an unveiling his foreign policy Wednesday, Sarkozy, who is the interior minister, called the US-led invasion of Iraq a "historic mistake" and thanked President Jacques Chirac for his "lucidity" in keeping France out of it. At the same time, Sarkozy was "vague" about what the US should do in Iraq, warning that withdrawing American troops too soon would "lead to chaos," while avoiding a withdrawal would lead the Iraqis to "react with more violence, and that would benefit the terrorists."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Rules Padilla Competent To Stand Trial. The New York Times (3/1, Sontag, 1.16M) reports Federal District Court Judge Marcia Cooke has found Jose Padilla "competent to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges Wednesday, granting a significant victory to the government in the high-profile criminal case" of a US citizen "initially designated an 'enemy combatant' and held without charges." Cooke ruled after "three and a half days of an intensely argued hearing," rejecting the argument of Padilla's attorneys that their client should be "sent to a hospital for psychiatric treatment so that he could be 'healed' from what they said was post-traumatic stress disorder caused during his three years and eight months in military detention."

The AP (3/1, Anderson) reports, "Padilla's lawyers had asked Cooke to order that their client be treated for post-traumatic stress disorder, which they contend stems from years of isolation and interrogation while in military custody. … Cooke said testimony in the competency hearing showed that Padilla understands 'legal nuances' of pretrial motions and noted that he had signed a document verifying the truth of allegations made by the defense that he was tortured and mistreated during his years in a Navy brig in Charleston, South Carolina. … 'At some time, the defendant was able to discuss some things with his lawyers,' Cooke said. 'The defendant's situation is unique. He understands that.'" The AP adds, "Bush administration officials vehemently deny that Padilla was mistreated, and Cooke said her decision on competency should not be read as a ruling on those claims. 'That discussion is for another day,' she said."

The Washington Post (3/1, A3, Whoriskey, 690K) reports the ruling "leaves aside for now the question of whether Padilla, accused of being an al-Qaeda operative, was mistreated during his 3 1/2 -year confinement in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. … Instead, the ruling found that whether or not he was abused, Padilla is currently capable of understanding the legal proceedings and their consequences, and that he can assist his attorneys. That is enough under legal standards to find him fit for trial." The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Williams, 850K) adds that Cooke "prefaced her ruling by saying she might conduct another hearing at which she would take testimony on the torture allegations before Padilla's trial, set to begin April 16."

NYTimes Condemns US Behavior In Padilla Case. The New York Times (3/1, 1.16M) editorializes, "There were so many reasons to be appalled by President Bush's decision to detain people illegally and subject them to mental and physical abuse. The unfolding case of Jose Padilla reminds us of one of the most important: mistreating a prisoner makes it hard, if not impossible, for a real court to judge whether he has committed real crimes. … The government's arguments at the hearing sounded ridiculous and shameful. Prosecutors said Mr. Padilla always seemed fine to his jailers, but it was his jailers who did things like standing on his bare feet with boots so they could shackle him. … When a psychologist testified for the defense that Mr. Padilla was 'an anxiety-ridden, broken individual,' the prosecution said her tests were invalid -- because the jailers had kept Mr. Padilla handcuffed throughout. … So far, this trial has been a reminder of how Mr. Bush's policy on prisoners has compromised the judicial process. And it has confirmed the world's suspicions of the United States' stooping to the very behavior it once stood against."

Bush Convenes Bipartisan Terror Working Group. The Washington Post/AP (3/1, A7) reports, "Despite initial wariness from Democrats, President Bush finally convened a bipartisan working group to advise him on terrorism, sitting down at the White House yesterday to discuss the deteriorating conditions in Afghanistan with senior lawmakers from both parties." In January, when he unveiled his new Iraq policy, the President "mentioned his interest in forming such a group as a way of improving relations with Congress. Democrats initially balked out of concern that Bush would be dictating the subject and the people present, congressional aides said. What now appears to have emerged is a plan to have regular meetings to discuss key national security issues with an evolving cast of participants from Capitol Hill, according to congressional and White House aides."

Judge Denies Request To Declassify FBI Evidence On Muslim Charity. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Krikorian, 850K) reports US District Judge A. Joe Fish of Dallas "has denied a request to declassify thousands of pages of FBI evidence in the prosecution of a Muslim charity, but said it was disturbing that a recently unsealed document falsely accused charity officials of anti-Jewish slurs. In his ruling against lawyers for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development," Fish "concluded there was insufficient evidence to show the inaccuracies were part of a 'widespread problem' with the government's evidence. At the same time, Fish advised defense lawyers to return to court if they found more government summaries that were 'significantly inaccurate or misleading.' The now-defunct Muslim charity and seven former officials face criminal charges alleging financial ties to the Islamic militant group Hamas."

The Dallas Morning News (3/1, 500K) adds that Fish "said there was no justification for a defense request to declassify almost 10 years' of surveillance based on the apparent fabrications found in the government's April 15, 1996, surveillance summary. The document claimed that two of the Holy Land officials now facing trial made remarks that are not in the actual transcripts of surveillance. The alleged remarks included one Holy Land official calling Israel 'the government of the demons' and telling a colleague: 'Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests…the sons of snakes and scorpions.' The judge said he found it 'disturbing' that the government summary included inflammatory language not found in the transcript. Defense attorneys, like prosecutors, had no comment on Tuesday's ruling. But in their original motion, defense attorneys said they only recently had received declassified summaries representing about 10 percent of the conversations recorded by the government in court-authorized surveillance. They signaled that additional discrepancies might exist."

US Will Not Send CIA Defendants To Italy. The Washington Post (3/1, A12, Whitlock, 690K) reports State Department legal adviser John B. Bellinger III Wednesday said the US "would refuse to extradite CIA officers who face kidnapping charges in Italy, warning that European criminal prosecutions of US agents were harming transatlantic counterterrorism efforts." Although the Italian government has not made a final decision on whether to ask Washington to extradite the agents, Bellinger said, "If we got an extradition request from Italy, we would not extradite US officials to Italy."

The Financial Times (3/1, Laitner) notes that last month the European parliament "accused some European governments of turning a blind eye to the illegal transportation of alleged terrorists through their countries to face possible torture." However, Bellinger "branded" that report "unbalanced, inaccurate and unfair," and cautioned that European probes into US officials "can harm intelligence cooperation."

EFF Suit Seeks Details On FISA Wiretap Ruling. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/28, A - 6, Egelko) reports, "A privacy rights group sued the Justice Department on Tuesday to try to pry loose a ruling by a secret court that the Bush administration says approved its clandestine wiretapping program." The Chronicle continues, "The suit, if it succeeds, should answer an important question about the future of the program: whether the court will require individual warrants, with specific evidence, before allowing the government to intercept phone calls and e-mails between Americans and alleged terrorists in foreign countries." The Chronicle adds, "In December 2005, President Bush confirmed a New York Times report that he had authorized the National Security Agency four years earlier to eavesdrop on such communications without obtaining warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as required by a 1978 law. … A federal judge in Detroit declared the program unconstitutional in August, a ruling the administration has appealed. In San Francisco, another judge is considering more than 40 lawsuits accusing telecommunications companies of illegally collaborating with the program by allowing the National Security Agency to intercept messages and examine customer records." The Chronicle notes, "The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco organization that represents AT&T customers in one of the lawsuits, sued Tuesday in Washington, D.C., seeking disclosure of a pivotal Jan. 10 ruling by a judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. … The ruling's existence was disclosed Jan. 17 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who told the Senate Judiciary Committee that the judge had approved the surveillance, after lengthy negotiations, and that the program was now operating under authority of the foreign intelligence court. … Gonzales did not say, however, whether the judge was requiring a warrant in each case or instead had given overall approval to the program. The attorney general has refused to make the order public, although the Justice Department sent copies to the federal judge in San Francisco and the appeals court reviewing the Detroit ruling. … The department also disclosed the order to selected members of Congress, including leaders of the House and Senate judiciary committees. Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said Leahy would like to see a declassified version made public and is exploring the subject with the Justice Department and the White House."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House, Democrats Clash Over TSA Unionization Effort. USA Today (3/1, Frank, 2.27M) reports efforts by congressional Democrats "to let airport screeners unionize for the first time since the government took over aviation security after the 9/11 attacks" have "provoked a clash with the Bush administration and Republican lawmakers that could scuttle attempts to enact one of the broadest homeland security bills since 9/11." While labor leaders say unionizing Transportation Security Administration screeners "would strengthen security by improving working conditions and reducing high attrition and injury rates, which cause staffing shortages," TSA says "security would suffer because the agency could not quickly reassign screeners to counter new threats. President Bush might veto any bill that would let TSA screeners unionize."

States To Be Given More Time On Real ID Act. The Washington Post (3/1, A4, Hsu, Barr, 690K) reports "congressional and Department of Homeland Security officials said yesterday" that the Bush administration will allow states to delay implementation of the Real ID Act. "The retreat came as the White House and the Democratic Congress headed for a showdown over a broad counterterrorism bill to implement many of the remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission." Eight senators debating the bill yesterday "supported a push by Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine) to postpone the driver's license program by two years. They blamed the administration for failing until a scheduled announcement today to spell out what states must do to comply with the law, which was passed nearly two years ago." A senior official at the Department of Homeland Security, "speaking on the condition of anonymity pending the official release, said that although the Real ID law set a May 2008 deadline, the administration is interpreting that as requiring states to be able to begin issuing compliant IDs by that time. They will be allowed to replace all 245 million licenses held by Americans on a 'reasonably prompt basis' over five years."

"Strategy Of Chaos" Seen As Best Way To Thwart Rail Attacks. Frank J. Cilluffo, director of the George Washington University Homeland Security Policy Institute, a non-partisan think tank, and Laura P. Keith, a policy analyst at HSPI, in an op-ed in USA Today (3/1, 13A, 2.27M) write that with their "low security measures, high numbers of passengers, and mass transit's critical economic significance," terrorist attacks on trains and subways "potentially have the biggest impact for the lowest cost." However, while most subway systems in the US "have implemented some" security measures, "the US government has not formalized rail security standards, identified 'best practices,' or completed an overall rail security strategy, three things Congress has called on it to do." Cilluffo and Keith continue that one way to "prevent what appears to be inevitable" may be to "create security plans that can be executed with a high level of unpredictability and flexibility — a strategy of chaos." The writers call for an increased "investment in the nation's surface transportation security plans" and state that with a "strategy of chaos" and "greater public awareness…we can beat the terrorists at their own game."

9/11 Victim's Family Member Says Senate Democrats Snubbed Him. The Washington Times (3/1, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "A family member of a September 11 victim says Senate Democrats invited him to Washington then snubbed him yesterday after he criticized a bill adopting 9/11 commission recommendations. 'They made me sit in the hallway for 40 minutes for nothing,' said Bruce DeCell, a former New York City police officer whose son-in-law was killed at the World Trade Center on September 11." He "was invited by the Senate Democratic Steering and Outreach Committee to represent victims' family members at a lunch and press conference that included Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey. … Thomas Russell, director of the steering committee, later called and apologized, saying he was 'being pulled in too many directions and he forgot to come and get me,' Mr. DeCell said." DeCell "called the explanation 'disingenuous.'"

Terror-Linked Inmates Being Moved To Indiana Prison. The Terre Haute Tribune-Star (3/1, Loughlin) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has opened a new unit at the medium-security prison in Terre Haute to monitor communications of its inmates more closely, which could include lower-risk offenders convicted of or associated with terrorism, a Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman said." The Tribune-Star continues, "The Washington Post has reported that the unit houses "a hodgepodge of second-tier terrorism inmates, most of them Arab Muslims, whose ability to communicate with the outside world has been tightly restricted." … The self-contained unit opened in December and has about 17 inmates, although that number eventually could expand to 90, said Traci Billingsley, Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman. … The so-called 'Communications Management Unit,' or CMU, 'isn't a terrorist unit,' she said. … The purpose of the CMU 'is to provide increased monitoring of inmate communication in a self-contained unit. It assists in regulating and monitoring communication between inmates and those in the community,' she said." The Tribune-Star adds, "Those convicted of or associated with domestic or international terrorism 'may be candidates for this unit,' Billingsley said. … It eventually will house a variety of inmates, including sex offenders who try to communicate with victims or inmates who try to conduct illegal activity by phone or mail. … The unit is located in an area that formerly served as death row. Death row has been moved to the new high-security facility in the Federal Correctional Complex." The Tribune-Star notes, "Prisoner advocates are raising concerns that most of the inmates in CMU so far are of Middle Eastern descent or Muslim faith, which could represent racial profiling. … Billingsley said she didn't know inmates' race or religion, and 'that would not be a factor in placement,' she said. … The most dangerous, high-risk terrorists in the federal system likely would be housed at the ADMax or 'supermax' facility in Florence, Colo., she said. According to the Washington Post article, the supermax facility houses al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui."

New Orleans Residents Turn Out To File Claims Against Army Corps Of Engineers. USA Today (3/1, Gomez, 2.27M) reports that in the face of a Thursday deadline, thousands of New Orleans residents showed up at the Army Corps of Engineers office Wednesday "to file claims that accuse the corps of being responsible for levee failures that flooded New Orleans. … Joseph Bruno, one of several attorneys representing victims, says he expects more than 100,000 to file claims. Debbie Simon, a corps spokeswoman, said it expects the total to be around 60,000 claims." USA Today notes that those who miss the deadline may be spared "if a judge grants an extension to the deadline at a court hearing scheduled for Friday. Lawyers representing victims in the lawsuit are asking for a 6-month extension."

Judge Hears Arguments On State Farm Katrina Claims Settlement. The New York Times (3/1, Treaster, 1.16M) reports lawyers appeared before Judge L. T. Senter Jr. of Federal District Court in Gulfport, Mississippi Wednesday "to argue the merits of a settlement with State Farm that would reopen 36,000 previously closed claims of Mississippi homeowners whose homes were damaged" by Hurricane Katrina. "The central issue has been whether the insurers are responsible for damage caused by extensive flooding. The insurers say their policies never provided coverage for any kind of flooding. In many cases, storm victims say, the insurers, especially State Farm, refused to pay claims if the damage was done by a combination of wind and water." Wednesday's hearing, which featured "homeowners who have complaints about State Farm," became "raw and emotional" at times. "The judge, saying he had a duty to protect storm victims, had been unwilling to endorse the settlement because of concerns that it favored State Farm."

WPost Says Bush Must Use "Bully Pulpit" To Accelerate New Orleans Recovery. The Washington Post (3/1, 690K) editorializes, "A month after neglecting to mention New Orleans or the Gulf Coast in his State of the Union address, President Bush heads today to the city crippled by Hurricane Katrina." The president is "certain to get an earful during his listening tour of the region," but for New Orleans' recovery "to go from a crawl to a gallop, Bush must use the bully pulpit of the presidency to energize all levels of government." The Post sees wisdom in Bush's insistence "that local officials plan and control their own destiny," but says "that does not absolve him of any role in fulfilling a vow he made to New Orleans in his speech in Jackson Square: 'This great city will rise again.' … One specific way Mr. Bush could show leadership is by directing the Federal Emergency Management Agency to waive the requirement that Louisiana contribute 10 percent to meeting disaster recovery costs; the federal government has issued similar waivers to other jurisdictions, including New York City after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Cutting that bit of red tape would allow the freed-up money to be used for other rebuilding purposes."

WAR NEWS:

Democrats To Add Up To $10 Billion In Non-War Items To Iraq Spending Bill. The AP (3/1, Taylor) reports, "While Democrats try to restrict how President Bush can spend the $100 billion he wants for Iraq, they also hope to load his measure up with $10 billion in add-ons -- from aid for avocado growers to help for children lacking health insurance. Lawmakers also hope to add money for drought relief in the Great Plains, better levees in New Orleans and development of military bases that are closing down." The "expected battle with the White House over the add-ons is getting far less attention than debate over Iraq," but "it could reveal a lot about how much Democrats will be able to rewrite the Republican president's budget later this year." Bush "has yet to veto a spending bill, and Democrats are gambling he'll sign the Iraq measure despite objections to spending he didn't seek. Republicans, meanwhile, may be reluctant to vote against the package since it contains funds for U.S. troops overseas."

The Politico (3/1) also says "House Democrats plan to pick a fresh fight with the White House with an unannounced plan to add billions of dollars in spending for their domestic priorities to…Bush's $99.6 billion emergency war spending bill." The programs "being eyed by Democratic leaders, including $700 million for health care for poor children, could boost Bush's war proposal by 10 percent or more, sources in both parties said." The White House "wants Congress to stick with what Bush requested -- money for ongoing military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, repair and replacement of damaged equipment and an increase in the size of the nation's deployable military force." But "Democrats plan to follow the same strategy Bush has used for years to get his priorities funded: packaging appropriations for key projects separately from the overall budget and tying them to money for troops in the field. … 'He has competition now,' said one Democratic leadership aide."

The Hill (3/1, Bolton) reports Rep. Collin Peterson, chairman of the House Agriculture Committee and "a senior member of the Blue Dog Coalition of some 45 conservative Democrats," said, "I don't think the supplemental will pass if we don't" add "disaster-relief funds. Without farm-relief funds the Iraq-Afghanistan bill would lose 'quite a few' Blue Dog votes, said Peterson. 'They'd lose mine,' he added." The Hill adds, "Republican House leaders anticipated such sweeteners. At yesterday's weekly meeting of the House Republican Conference," House Minority Leader John Boehner "urged colleagues not to be lured by money for agriculture and health insurance, said two lawmakers who attended the meeting." Boehner "warned his colleagues to remember the bigger picture of troop funding."

House Democrats Could Face Inner Turmoil Over New Anti-War Strategy. The AP (3/1, Flaherty) reports, "House Democratic leaders are developing an anti-war proposal that wouldn't cut off money for US troops in Iraq but would require President Bush to acknowledge problems with an overburdened military." The plan "could draw bipartisan support but is expected to be a tough sell to members who say they don't think it goes far enough to assuage voters angered by the four-year conflict. Bush 'hasn't to date done anything we've asked him to do, so why we would think he would do anything in the future is beyond me,' said Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., one of a group of liberal Democrats pushing for an immediate end to the war." The AP adds, "Democratic protests to the war grew louder in January after they took control of Congress and Bush announced he planned to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq." Rep. John Murtha, who sponsored a plan to restrict funding for the war, "is extending his support to the revised proposal," a "tactic…more likely to embarrass Bush politically than force his hand on the war. He would have to sign repeated waivers for units and report to Congress those units with equipment shortfalls and other problems."

Local TV devoted significantly less attention to the Congressional debate than it had in previous days. Some examples: WSIL-TV Paducah, KY (2/28, 10:13 pm) broadcast, "Democrats continue to work on ways to scale back the war in Iraq without cutting off funding. Some House Democrats have taken up a plan that would require…Bush to sign a waiver for troops sent into battle that don't meet certain standards. Congress would then be notified. Meanwhile, Senate Democrats are working on repealing the 2002 measure that authorized the war. The new legislation could restrict the mission in Iraq and order troop withdrawals by the summer. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid says it could be brought up in a matter of days."

WDRB-TV Louisville (2/28, 10:34 pm) said that in Congress, "House Democrats are trying to figure out what to do with Congressman Jack Murtha's proposal to attach conditions to war funding. Democratic leaders may go ahead with the idea, but also give the President the option of waving those funding restrictions. Republicans say Democrats are backpedaling. Democrats say they're looking for a workable plan." KION-TV Monterey (2/28, 6:07 pm) and WPBF-TV West Palm Beach, FL (2/28, 6:13 pm) aired similar reports.

The Politico (3/1) reports, "To put it bluntly, as the former Marine is wont to do…Murtha is rankling some of his fellow Democrats who worry his outspokenness sometimes upstages even…Pelosi. … A day before the House voted on a resolution disapproving of the president's troop 'surge' plan last month, Murtha turned to a liberal Web site to preview his plans to block the president's deployment of an additional 21,500 troops into Iraq. And his statements overshadowed the ongoing floor debate and fueled Republican charges that Democrats were laying a foundation to cut off war funding." Murtha's plan "was 'overexposed before it was exposed,' said Rep. Earl Pomeroy (D-N.D.), a member of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition. … Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.), another Blue Dog, was similarly annoyed. 'I was not keen on him stepping on Nancy's message,' Cooper said."

The Washington Post (3/1, A15, Romano, 690K), meanwhile, profiles Rep. Patrick Murphy, who "normally would have fallen into the category of unknown freshman legislator elbowing to make a name for himself. But attracting attention has been no problem for Murphy." He "happens to be the only member of Congress who is a veteran of the war in Iraq, a distinction that has swiftly catapulted him to Washington's front lines of politics and policy with little effort. Senior members turn to the 33-year-old for policy guidance. Generals are eager to brief him one-on-one. Murphy delivers moving speeches on the floor about the 19 paratroopers he served with who died in Iraq. And he stood shoulder to shoulder with…Pelosi at a news conference, emotionally talking about flawed US policy."

McCain Says Petraeus Deserves A Chance. On CBS' Late Show (2/28, Letterman), Sen. John McCain said of the surge, "I think it's really our last chance to salvage a very difficult war which has been badly mismanaged, and we've got a very good general over there, a guy named Gen. Petraeus. … I've known him well enough to know he's really an outstanding general. Generals alone don't do it, but he does. I think we can hopefully bring about a period of stability so that you can have economic and political development and stop this terrible bloodletting which is, as you know, sectarian violence, terrible things are happening. Showing a little progress. Let's hope and pray that it works."

Odierno Says US Needs "A Minimum Of Six To Nine Months" To Secure Baghdad. Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, introduced by Wolf Blitzer as the "number two US commander in Iraq," said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/28), "We could maintain security here. We could have things look good for one or two weeks. That's what we've done in the past. But when we've done that, we've always had some problems in not maintaining it. So the key to this is being able to show that we can maintain the security in Baghdad over a long period of time -- six, seven months -- which enables the Iraqi government to mature, it enables the Iraqi security forces to continue to mature and take control of this. … I think that will take some time. I don't want to put an exact time on it, but a minimum of six to nine months."

Brownback Calls For "Three-State" Solution. Sen. Sam Brownback said on Fox News' Your World (2/28, Asman), "I think what we've got to do is push toward a political solution in Iraq. We cannot cut and run and we need to stay there to move this process on forward. … I think we need to move this towards a three-state, one country solution of a Kurdish area, a Sunni area, and a Shia area, with Baghdad as a federal city."

Baker, Christopher To Chair Panel On War Powers. The AP (3/1) reports, "Former Secretaries of State James A. Baker III and Warren Christopher will head a private, bipartisan panel to study a lingering and gnawing national question: Who does the Constitution say has the power to begin, conduct and end wars? The dispute over the authority to wage war has historically divided presidents, members of Congress and scholars." The war powers study "is sponsored by the private Miller Center of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia."

The Washington Post (3/1, A15, Abramowitz, 690K) notes Lee Hamilton will also part of the committee, in addition to "another veteran of the Iraq Study Group, former attorney general Edwin Meese III." It also "includes another member of the Sept. 11 commission, former senator Slade Gorton (R-Wash.). Baker will co-chair the new commission with former secretary of state Warren Christopher, who is a commission veteran himself, having chaired the blue-ribbon group that looked into the Los Angeles Police Department after the Rodney King riots."

Sen. Arlen Specter said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/28, Blitzer) yesterday, "I believe we need substantially more study to understand where the congressional constitutional authority ends on the power of the purse on appropriations, contrasted with the President's power as commander in chief. I do not believe, for example, that Congress can micromanage the war. We can cut off funding, although nobody would even consider that to jeopardize the troops. So these are complex issues. … We are in very deep water. And we oughtn't to go off halfcocked. And we ought to be very careful that we don't set a precedent now which will bind some future president to the detriment of the country. It's a matter which requires a lot more thought than has been given to it so far. And that's why I want the hearings with the experts to study the precedence and to get very deeply involved so that we know what we are doing."

Chafee Says Senators Should Be Called To Task For Opposing Levin Measure In 2002. Former Sen. Lincoln Chafee, in today's New York Times (3/1, 1.16M), writes about the 2002 debate on the Iraq war resolution. Says Chafee, "A mere 10 hours before the roll was called on the administration-backed Iraq war resolution, the Senate had an opportunity to prevent the current catastrophe in Iraq and to salvage the United States' international standing. Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, offered a substitute to the war resolution, the Multilateral Use of Force Authorization Act of 2002." Levin's amendment "called for United Nations approval before force could be authorized. It was unambiguous and compatible with international law." The amendment "was defeated by a 75 to 24 vote. Later that night, the Iraq War Resolution was approved, 77 to 23." Levin adds, "We must not sidestep the fact that a sensible alternative did exist, but it was rejected. Candidates -- Democrat and Republican -- should be called to account for their vote on the Levin amendment."

Congress Urged To Give "Surge" A Chance. Michael O'Hanlon, senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/1, A13, 2.04M), "Despite the earlier pledge of congressional Democrats not to challenge funding for the war in Iraq this year, key members of the House and Senate are considering robust and binding responses to the conflict -- most specifically to…Bush's surge strategy. Congress is within its constitutional rights to do so. But in its understandable response to a failing mission and an impatient American public, its approach is unproductive. Rather than force a showdown with Mr. Bush this winter and spring, Congress should give his surge strategy a chance -- while preparing for the real fight this fall." Hanlon adds, "Patience makes sense, for now. Congressional critics should, whether they personally support the surge or not, tolerate it for a few more months."

Iraqi Military Official Says Security Crackdown Working. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Berthelsen, 850K) reports a top Iraqi military official "announced today that authorities have killed more than two dozen militants, arrested hundreds of others and seized huge caches of weaponry in the last week, declaring that a 3-week-old security crackdown was working even as car bombs, mortar attacks and shootings continued to claim lives around the country." Brig. Gen. Qassim Atta Musawi's announcement "comes as many Iraqis are expressing a growing impatience with the U.S.-Iraqi security push. Iraqis overwhelmingly want the plan to work and are frustrated by multiple daily attacks that have continued even as they have put up with neighborhood raids, house-to-house searches and vehicle stops."

US Soldiers Dispersing To Smaller Outposts In Baghdad. The Washington Post (3/1, A1, Partlow, 690K) reports in a front pages story that American soldiers "are leaving their sprawling fortress-cities and establishing many small outposts in the capital's most violent neighborhoods in a major tactical shift under the two-week-old Baghdad security plan." Informed by "counterinsurgency theory that calls for placing units full-time among the people they want to sway, U.S. troops are using their new bases to work with their Iraqi counterparts, uncover more battlefield intelligence and reinforce, by their sustained presence, the message that they will not allow militants unfettered freedom of movement." But along "with these advantages, American soldiers say these outposts pose new risks to their own safety and require pulling soldiers off patrols to protect their lodgings. The threats became apparent this month when a car bomb exploded at a U.S. outpost in Tarmiyah, north of Baghdad, killing two U.S. soldiers and wounding 29 others."

Saddam-Era Munitions Used For IEDs. USA Today (3/1, 1A, Brook, 2.27M) reports in a front page story that four years "after the Iraq war began, the country remains awash in Saddam-era munitions that provide key ingredients for homemade bombs used against U.S. troops, according to administration documents and military officials." More than $1 billion "has been spent to clear about 15,000 sites of the unsecured weapons. To clear the remaining 3,391 sites, the Pentagon says it needs a portion of a $1.2 billion request for items to protect U.S. troops in Iraq." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "estimates that 70% of U.S. casualties in Iraq stem from IEDs."

Ramadi Sheikh Corroborates Story Of Car Bombing. The Washington Post (3/1, A13, Londono, Mehdawi, 690K) reports, "A community leader in the western Iraqi city of Ramadi provided additional information Wednesday about a deadly car bombing earlier this week that U.S. officials said did not occur." Raad Sabah al-Mukeilef, "a sheik who said he lives about 500 yards from where the bomb exploded Monday, said in a telephone interview Wednesday that he believes members of the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq set off the bomb near a playground after being unable to get past a checkpoint that leads to his house, which is near a government building." Mukeilef's account "corroborated information provided Tuesday by Col. Tariq al-Alwani, the security supervisor in Anbar province in western Iraq. Both men said the blast killed 16 children and three women, one of whom died Wednesday from her wounds. Ramadi is the provincial capital."

Sunni Insurgents Still Greatest Threat To US In Iraq. McClatchy (3/1, Brown) reports Sunni Muslim insurgents "remain by far the biggest threat to American troops in Iraq, despite recent U.S. claims that Iran is providing Shiite Muslim militia groups with a new type of roadside bomb, a review of American casualty reports shows." While US military officials "have held briefings to publicize their concerns about the potent bombs known as explosively formed projectiles (EFPs) or penetrators, casualty reports suggest that such weapons in the hands of Shiite militias are responsible for a relatively small number of American deaths." US officials have "said that attacks with such weapons increased 150 percent in the past year. But a review of bombings by location shows that less than 10 percent of attacks that killed at least two American service members in the past 14 months were in areas where Shiite militias are dominant."

Carney Calls US Post-Iraq Invasion Policies "Incompetent." AFP (3/1) reports Ambassador Timothy Carney, the new US coordinator for Iraq's economic development, Wednesday said the US policy in Iraq following the 2003 invasion was "incompetent, foolish, dubious." In an interview with NPR, Carney said the US policy to exclude Iraqis from governing the country in the two years following the invasion was "an enormous foolishness" which contributed to the deterioration of security and lengthened the conflict in the country. "We don't need to go into detail on that, but I think words such as incompetent, foolish, dubious in all of its aspects are the most charitable way to look at that period," he said.

However, NPR (3/1, Garrels) reports Carney says the situation in Iraq is improving. "The big difference now is that Iraqis are inviting us into their councils to try to help use our resources to actually get things done," Carney said. But "with American reconstruction money drying up,' Carney's "biggest job will be to help Iraqis spend their own money, primarily from oil revenues." In part, Carney will "rely on the State Department's provincial reconstruction teams, known as PRTs."

UN Official Says Saddam Execution Prompted Reevaluation Of Death Penalty. The Washington Times (3/1, Pisik, 88K) reports Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, yesterday "said she senses a global interest in revising the death penalty, triggered in part by the public execution of former Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein." Arbour said she does not expect to see a "spontaneous uprising or outcry" against capital punishment, but the executions in Iraq of Saddam and two of his associates "may have created an environment in which people are asking a lot of serious question" about the need for a review of capital punishment.

NATO Officials Had Intelligence Of Afghan Bombing Threat. ABC World News (2/28, story 2, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Officials in Afghanistan said today, the attack outside the military base where Vice President Cheney was staying, did not come as a total surprise. NATO's top spokesman in Afghanistan said there has been recent intelligence to suggest there was a threat of a bombing in the Bagram area."

The New York Times (3/1, Wafa, Gall, 1.16M) reports the NATO spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, said "NATO and American forces knew that a suicide bomber was at large in the Bagram area before the suicide bomb attack on Tuesday that killed 23 people at the main gate of the United States air base where Vice President Dick Cheney was staying." But despite "the vice president's presence, the Afghan police chief in the area said he had not been informed of the possible threat." The Afghan "police chief of Bagram district, Muhammad Salem Ehsas, said Wednesday that he had been unaware of any threat of a suicide bomber in the area, suggesting a lack of coordination between the security forces on the ground even while Mr. Cheney was present."

The Washington Post/AP (3/1, A14, Straziuso) reports intelligence reports "indicated that the Taliban had the ability to carry out suicide attacks near the main U.S. base in Afghanistan even before a deadly bombing during a visit by Vice President Cheney, NATO said Wednesday." The attacker "never tried to penetrate even the first of several U.S.-manned security checkpoints at Bagram, instead detonating his explosives among a group of Afghan workers outside the base." Collins said, "The Taliban's claims that they were going after the vice president were absurd."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/28, Matthews), Michael Sheehan, a former State Department coordinator for counterterrorism, said the suicide bombing at Bagram Air Base was an attempt to assassinate Vice President Cheney: "I don't think it was a coincidence they attacked the gate on that particular day. It was a well-timed quick operation, which shows a lot of capability by the Taliban and al Qaeda to launch a suicide terrorist on very short notice. They probably knew the Vice President was there, but they weren't good enough to really get a good shot at him." Asked if Pakistan was an ally in the war on terrorism, Sheehan said, "Pakistan is definitely our ally, but a troubled ally. Pakistan has a long history of meddling with some of the wrong folks in that area. The army's intelligence, known as the ISI, has supported the Taliban previously, prior to 9/11. They support Kashmiri separatist groups that are intertwined with al Qaeda. So they're playing a dangerous game in that area. Musharraf would like to control it, but it's very difficult for him to do politically and militarily. They're an ally but they're in a lot of trouble in that region."

Video Documents Afghan Suicide Bomber's Preparations. ABC World News (2/28, lead story, 3:10, Ross, 8.78M) reported a newly released video "does provide a rare look at who the enemy is for US troops" in Afghanistan, and "how easy it seems to be for them, to mount a deadly attack. This is the suicide bomber. A young Afghan man in a beat-up Toyota loaded with explosives. The ease with which his bomb was prepared is documented on the tape, released on the internet by Al Qaeda's propaganda arm this week." The tape "shows the suicide bomber building his own bomb, arranging the mortars and land mines in a metal chest." Alexis Debat, Senior Fellow, The Nixon Center: "This is a very, very compelling statement for how simple it is for the Taliban to hurt us in Afghanistan. The child is making the bomb, that is about to kill him. And yet he has such an amazing, peaceful look on his face." Ross: "The number of such attacks in Afghanistan is up almost five-fold in the last few months. While the Army says no one attack means much strategically, the cumulative impact is enormous and growing."

NBC Nightly News (2/28, story 3, 2:10, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "The Al Qaeda video dated last October but recently posted on the Internet shows the young Taliban fighter chanting in preparation for his own death. The video appears to show him assembling the bomb before it is loaded into a car and driving off for his mission. Complete with English subtitles, the video also shows the Taliban's most ruthless commander, Mohamed Dadullah, claiming the Americans are defenseless against the new wave of young suicide bombers. Suicide bombs, usually the weapon of choice for al Qaeda, have taken a deadly toll in Afghanistan, nearly 140, up five fold in the past year. For the first time, Dadullah claims he is preparing to send thousands of Taliban suicide bombers against US troops in the upcoming spring offensive in Afghanistan."

Pakistan Rejects US Claim It Hosts Bin Laden, Al Qaeda Camps. The AP (3/1, Ahmad) reports Pakistan Wednesday "rejected a claim by the US intelligence chief that Osama bin Laden and his deputy were hiding in northwestern Pakistan, and that al-Qaeda was setting up camps near the Afghan border." President Gen. Pervez Musharraf, however, "acknowledged that foreign militants were in Pakistan's tribal regions along the Afghan border and warned them to leave," the state-run news agency reported. Musharraf's remarks follow statements made by DNI Mike McConnell Tuesday that al-Qaeda is trying to set up training camps and other operations in Pakistan tribal areas near Afghanistan. In an interview with the AP, Pakistani Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao said, "We deny it," referring to McConnell's remarks.

Taliban Official Says Bin Laden Alive. The AP (3/1) reports a senior Taliban commander says Osama bin Laden is "alive and in contact with leaders of Afghanistan's Taliban insurgents," according to an interview aired on British television. Mullah Dadullah said he had not met bin Laden since the U.S.-led invasion of Afghanistan in 2001, but "we know he's still alive." Dadullah, commander of Taliban operations in eastern and southeastern Afghanistan, told the UK's Channel 4, "Only his comrades see him," but "we exchange messages with each other to share plans."

LATimes Says US Should Keep Pressure Up On Musharraf. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, 850K) says in an editorial, "Since 9/11, the United States has been trapped in an increasingly loveless marriage with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Like many a miserable mate, the Bush administration has been known to rue the failings of its partner in private. Yet it has always defended Musharraf in public, arguing that whatever his shortcomings, the alternative is far worse." But "such forbearance may be changing. For the first time, the Bush administration this week let Islamabad know, through Vice President Dick Cheney, that it is unhappy with Pakistan's performance in fighting the resurgent Taliban. And it hinted that if things don't improve, the White House might not be able to keep the Democratic-controlled Congress from cutting U.S. aid to Pakistan. This burst of candor is long overdue — and so is an overhaul of U.S. policy toward Pakistan."

US Troops In Philippines "Defy Old Stereotypes." The Christian Science Monitor (3/1, Montlake, 59K) reports when US troops arrived in the Philippines in December 2001, "critics assailed the move," predicting "a return of permanent US camps in its former colony, and a repeat of the sleazy bars and clubs still surrounding its former bases near Manila." And "more alarming to US ears were dire warnings of resistance from Muslims." However, "Today, these warnings mostly ring false." About 450 US soldiers are still based in the Philippines, "but the expected nightlife boom hasn't happened. Nor have militants taken the fight to the foreigners deployed here."

DOJ:

Democrats To Seek Testimony From Fired US Attorneys As Controversy Widens. The AP (3/1, Kellman) reports, "Democrats are moving to compel some of the eight U.S. attorneys who have been ousted to tell their stories publicly, under oath, after a federal prosecutor claimed he was fired for political reasons." The AP continues, "A House subcommittee is slated to vote Thursday on subpoenas for four of the eight dismissed U.S. attorneys. The Senate Judiciary Committee, meanwhile, will send letters to those fired before voting next week on compelling their testimony, according to officials with both panels. … The prosecutors have privately told both committees that they would not testify voluntarily but would honor a congressional subpoena, according to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and an official close to the House subcommittee on commercial and administrative law." The AP adds, "House subcommittee Chairwoman Linda Sanchez said her panel will vote on subpoenas for fired prosecutors Carol Lam of California, David Iglesias of New Mexico, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Washington. … 'In order to get the full picture of why these U.S. attorneys were fired, we need to hear from the Justice Department and the U.S. attorneys themselves,' said House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich." The AP notes, "Schumer, in a telephone interview Wednesday with The Associated Press, said: 'If they say they won't come voluntarily, Senator Leahy will authorize subpoenas.' The Senate panel is expected to vote on whether to issue the subpoenas next week, said Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt. … Spurring the developments was a new report that one of the eight, New Mexico's David Iglesias, claims to have been forced out after refusing a request by two congressmen to rush an indictment that might have helped Republicans in the 2006 election. In the story and a subsequent interview with the AP, Iglesias refused to identify the members of Congress. … The Justice Department staunchly denied the charge that Iglesias or any of the eight federal prosecutors were dismissed for political reasons. … 'The suggestion that David Iglesias was asked to resign because he failed to bring an indictment ... is flatly false,' Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said in a statement. 'This administration has never removed a United States attorney in an effort to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a public integrity investigation.' … As to why Iglesias was dismissed, Roehrkasse said: 'We made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns.'"

The New York Times (3/1, Johnston) reports, "David C. Iglesias, who was dismissed as the United States attorney in New Mexico, has said he believes that he was ousted because he resisted pressure before the 2006 elections to bring corruption charges against a Democrat in his state, a Democratic senator said on Wednesday." The Times continues, "Mr. Iglesias has told Congressional aides that two federal lawmakers had separately called him in mid-October asking about the status of an inquiry involving a statehouse construction contract and a former Democratic state lawmaker, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York said in a statement Wednesday on the Senate floor. … Mr. Schumer did not identify the lawmakers who made the calls either by name or party affiliation, but he suggested that they wanted Mr. Iglesias to move quickly with indictments before the November elections to help Republicans." The Times adds, "Mr. Iglesias's account of the calls was first reported on Wednesday by the McClatchy Newspapers, which said the prosecutor would not identify the lawmakers because he feared retaliation. But in that report, he described the contacts as 'appalling.' … The former United States attorneys were not given explanations for their dismissals at the time of their removals, but senior Justice Department officials have said that most were asked to step aside because of job performance problems — an accusation that has angered several and that some have publicly denied. … Mr. Iglesias could not be reached on Wednesday. But The Associated Press reported that at a news conference in Albuquerque on Wednesday, his last day in office, Mr. Iglesias said his dismissal was unrelated to his office's work. … 'I know it's not performance-related,' Mr. Iglesias told The Associated Press. 'I know it's not misconduct. What does that leave? Politics.'"

The Washington Post (3/1, A10, Eggen) reports, "A political tempest over the mass firing of federal prosecutors escalated yesterday with allegations from the departing U.S. attorney in New Mexico, who said that two members of Congress attempted to pressure him to speed up a probe of Democrats just before the November elections." The Post continues that Iglesias "said he received the calls in October and believes that complaints from the lawmakers may have led the Justice Department to fire him late last year. … Iglesias also responded to allegations from Justice officials that he had performed poorly and was too often absent, citing positive job reviews and data showing increasing numbers of prosecutions. He also noted that he is required to serve 40 days a year in the Navy Reserve." The Post adds, "Iglesias declined to name the lawmakers who called him, but he said in an interview: 'I didn't give them what they wanted. That was probably a political problem that caused them to go to the White House or whomever and complain that I wasn't a team player.'" The Post notes, "Spokesmen for Rep. Steve Pearce (R-N.M.) and the state's two Democratic lawmakers, Sen. Jeff Bingaman and Rep. Tom Udall, said the lawmakers and their staffs had no contact with Iglesias about the case. The offices of New Mexico's two other Republican lawmakers, Sen. Pete V. Domenici and Rep. Heather A. Wilson, did not respond to repeated requests for comment. … In briefings about the firings on Capitol Hill, Justice Department officials had said that Iglesias was the target of complaints from members of Congress, according to several sources familiar with the meetings, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss personnel issues. The Justice briefers did not specify the nature of those complaints, the sources said."

McClatchy Newspapers (3/1, Taylor) reports, "Democrats in both the House of Representatives and the Senate vowed to hold a new round of hearings to determine if partisan politics played a role in the firings of eight U.S. attorneys across the country. The House is set to vote Thursday on whether to issue subpoenas to four of the prosecutors. The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to ask the U.S. attorneys to testify voluntarily before it decides whether to subpoena them." McClatchy continues, "Justice Department officials have defended the firings of the U.S. attorneys as legitimate administrative decisions meant to improve the workings of the attorneys' offices. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate last month that most of the forced resignations were motivated by 'performance-related' reasons. … However, McClatchy Newspapers reported last month that five out of the six attorneys that McNulty mentioned had received positive job evaluations." McClatchy adds, "Iglesias acknowledged that he had no proof that the pressure from the members of Congress prompted his forced resignation. But he said the contact violated one of the most important tenets of a U.S. attorney's office: Don't mix politics with prosecutions. … 'I was appalled by the inappropriateness of those contacts,' Iglesias said of the calls." USA Today (3/1, 8A, 2.27M) briefly mentions the story.

More Commentary. In a column for the Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/1), John L. Smith writes, "For no good reason any credible source can name, (Nevada US Attorney Daniel) Bogden was unceremoniously sacked a few weeks ago in an apparent bit of nervous housecleaning by the Department of Justice." Smith continues, "Beyond a respectable win-loss record in prosecuting some of the biggest federal cases in recent Las Vegas history, Bogden can take solace in the fact that he's not alone. Six other Western U.S. attorneys were also notified that their services were no longer needed. … Because the Department of Justice and the Bush administration have done such a terrible job spinning this case, the terminations have given rise to several theories, all of them unflattering to the suits in Washington." Smith adds, "There's the belief that some of those being ousted weren't willing enough to use the death penalty. … And there's the hypothesis that they were terminated because they failed to carry the anti-illegal immigration banner high enough to suit the administration. … Then there's the one about letting those solid veteran prosecutor/administrators go to bring in a group of well-connected neophytes whose resumes would benefit from a line stating 'U.S. Attorney.'" Smith adds, "As of Monday, federal sources still had heard nothing about a possible replacement for Bogden. Will Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wait until the day Bogden leaves to name his replacement? … Through it all, Bogden has taken the high road, maintained his composure, and commented little on the turn of events. … For now, the real reason behind the decision to let him go remains unclear."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US To File Charges In Insider Trading Probe.

The Washington Post (3/1, D3, Johnson) reports, "Federal authorities plan to file criminal and civil charges as early as today against one or more UBS employees for providing traders with advance notice of stock-rating adjustments in exchange for cash payments, according to sources familiar with the case." The Post continues, "The charges mark the latest attempt by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission to stanch the flow of improper tips to traders, including hedge funds and private equity firms, who seek to collect information that helps them profit in advance of notable corporate announcements." The Post adds, "Representatives for the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Southern District of New York and the SEC declined to comment yesterday on the months-long probe, as did a spokesman for UBS. The possible charges were reported by the online editions of BusinessWeek. … Sources briefed on the case spoke on condition of anonymity because the charges had yet to be publicly filed. The sources said at least one UBS worker had provided multiple traders with tips that UBS analysts had decided to upgrade or depress their ratings on a stock. Access to such information before it is disseminated to the public could allow a favored group of traders to profit at the expense of average investors."

Former McGuire Woods Partner Charged With Securities Fraud. The New York Law Journal (3/1, Lin) reports, "A former New York law firm partner who allegedly made almost $18 million trading in the securities of his clients has been arrested on fraud charges." The Journal continues, "Louis W. Zehil, until Feb. 16 a partner in the New York office of Richmond, Va.'s McGuireWoods, allegedly used his position as issuer's counsel in seven private placement transactions occurring between January 2006 and last month to accumulate millions of discounted shares, absent the sale restrictions such discounts generally entail. He allegedly sold the stocks at a vast profit." The Journal adds, "Zehil, 41, now faces up to 20 years in prison and millions in fines on fraud charges brought by the Southern District U.S. Attorney's Office. He is also facing a civil suit brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is seeking disgorgement of his allegedly ill-gotten gains. … The ex-partner was arraigned Wednesday before Southern District of New York Magistrate Judge Henry Pitman but not required to enter a plea. He was released on a $250,000 personal recognizance bond. Andrew M. Lawler, Zehil's lawyer, declined to comment on the case Wednesday." The Journal notes, "The case has unfolded swiftly. According to the criminal complaint issued Wednesday, Zehil's actions were first uncovered by a McGuireWoods associate, who reported them to firm management on Feb. 9. The firm then conducted an internal investigation, contacted clients, sought Zehil's resignation and referred the matter to the SEC. … 'The actions described in today's filings are totally inconsistent with the high standards of ethics and integrity that are the very foundation of our firm,' McGuireWoods chairman Richard Cullen said in a statement Wednesday. He added that Zehil had apparently acted on his own benefit and that the 750-lawyer firm would continue to cooperate with authorities in the matter."

DOJ To Appeal Dismissal Of Enron Broadband Charge. The Houston Chronicle (3/1, Hays) reports, "The Justice Department will seek to preserve through an appeal one of five jury convictions won last year against the former finance chief of Enron's broadband division, according to a court filing." The Chronicle continues, "Prosecutors filed a notice this week saying they will appeal U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore's late January decision to erase Kevin Howard's conviction of falsifying books. That appeal would go before the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which already tossed out convictions in a separate Enron case because of the same issue that prompted Gilmore to wipe Howard's record clean. … Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch declined comment beyond the filing. Jack Zimmermann, one of Howard's attorneys, declined to comment." The Chronicle adds, "Gilmore threw out all five convictions that prosecutors won against Howard in a retrial last year. His first trial alongside four other ex-broadband executives ended in 2005 with a few acquittals and jurors hung on dozens of other counts. … Last year, the government conceded that Howard's four convictions of conspiracy and wire fraud should be erased because they were unlikely to stand up on appeal. … Prosecutors based that concession on an August 2-1 ruling from a 5th Circuit panel that overturned most convictions of four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in a 2004 Enron-related trial. … In that ruling, the panel said prosecutors improperly presented jurors with a theory that the executives deprived Enron of their honest services when they helped push through a deal that the government said was a loan disguised as an asset sale."

SEC Complaint Details McAfee Options Plan. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A11, Forelle, Hughes) reports, "The former chief executive of McAfee Inc., George Samenuk, knew about a change to a 2002 stock-option grant made in his favor by a subordinate, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint filed yesterday in federal court." The Journal continues, "The complaint charged Kent H. Roberts, McAfee's former general counsel, with fraud for his alleged role in options manipulations at the computer-security software vendor. It follows a criminal indictment of Mr. Roberts handed up Tuesday. … The complaint notes that Mr. Samenuk, who wasn't charged by either the grand jury or the SEC and wasn't identified by name in either complaint, participated in email traffic in which the manipulated grant was discussed. … 'George Samenuk hasn't been charged, and we don't expect him to be,' Elliot Peters, Mr. Samenuk's lawyer, said in a statement." The Journal adds, "On Jan. 15, 2002, the compensation committee of McAfee's board approved a grant of 420,000 options to purchase shares at that day's closing price, $27.19, the SEC complaint says. That day, Mr. Roberts sent an email to Mr. Samenuk and another executive confirming the grant and its price, it says. … The next day, the SEC charges, shares of the Santa Clara, Calif., company fell, and Mr. Roberts sent a note to Mr. Samenuk and the second executive: 'Let's price the 420,000 option shares at today's closing price of $25.43.' That change would have a big effect, increasing Mr. Samenuk's potential profit from the grant by $739,200. (Mr. Samenuk was paid $714,922 in salary in 2001.) … The next week, according to the SEC, Mr.

Samenuk wrote back to the two executives: 'On January 16 it appears that the stock price finished at $25.43...is this the price that the new options will be set at?? Is that the low for those days after the Board Meeting??' … Mr. Roberts, the SEC said, replied that the figure was 'the right price.' According to the agency, Mr. Roberts wrote up false board minutes saying that the grant was intended to be made Jan. 16. … Mr. Roberts' lawyer, Stephen Neal, wrote in a statement that he intends to 'vigorously defend against the charges against Mr. Roberts,' but he didn't comment further."

Cox's Views Said To Be Shifting Away From Those Of Investor Groups. The New York Times (3/1, Labaton, 1.16M) reports, "In his first year as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Christopher Cox confounded both supporters and detractors by taking a more moderate and nuanced position than they had predicted on a variety of regulatory issues, based on his record as a conservative Republican lawmaker. In recent weeks, however, Mr. Cox has begun to send signals, both directly and through aides, that he may be swinging the pendulum more toward business and Wall Street interests and against investor groups." The Times adds, "Some investor advocates and securities law experts say that Mr. Cox, by not pushing for tighter regulation of hedge funds and by urging the Supreme Court to adopt a tougher standard for investors in lawsuits, has begun moving closer to the business view that the administration overreacted to the corporate scandals that began with the collapse of Enron in 2001." They "have also criticized his recent decision to appear at the Chamber of Commerce in two weeks just as it is to issue a report criticizing the Bush administration and the S.E.C. for being too hard on companies." Cox "strongly disputes that view, noting, for instance, that his appearance before the chamber should not be perceived as a change in the tilt of the agency."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jurors Continue To Deliberate. Jurors continuing to deliberate in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby sent their first question to the judge, prompting "a lot of head-scratching" but shedding "little light on their progress," the AP (3/1) reports. The jurors "had sent a note" to US District Judge Reggie Walton late Tuesday, seeking clarification, and Walton "and nearly a score of defense lawyers and prosecutors spent part of Tuesday evening in their offices and a portion of Wednesday morning in court puzzling over what the jurors were asking and how to respond. Judge Walton remained uncertain, so he sent the jurors a note late Wednesday morning asking them to clarify their question. By that time, the jurors had resolved their difficulty on their own and moved on. 'After further discussion, we are clear on what we need to do,' the jury wrote back. 'No further clarification needed. Thank you. We apologize.'" The episode "set off a welter of speculation among lawyers and reporters over what it might reveal about the jurors' deliberations since they got the case at midday last Wednesday. Only one thing could be said for certain: They had not told the court they were deadlocked."

USA Today (3/1, Willing, 2.27M) says that in the note "jurors asked whether the lying charge referred to the 'content' of Libby's statement or the fact that the statement was made." The Washington Post (3/1, A3, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) adds that the jury "completed its sixth day of deliberation without reaching a verdict." The New York Times (3/1, Lewis, 1.16M) also summarizes the episode.

Federal Officials Cracking Down On "Sex Tourists." USA Today (3/1, Leinwand) reports, "U.S. travelers who book trips to countries that are hot spots for child prostitution will begin this month to see ads, brochures and billboards warning that sexual adventures abroad could land them in prison here." USA continues, "The warnings, written and distributed by religious organizations, child-welfare groups and the federal government, are a sign of a new assault by the Bush administration on the international child sex trade. They also reflect a new law intended to catch U.S. residents who engage in or promote sex with children overseas. … 'People assume they can go out of the country and get away with exploiting children in this horrific way,' says Mike Garcia, assistant secretary of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement. 'We're sending a message. We have the power to (arrest them), and we have the will.'" USA notes, "In the past six months, U.S. authorities have arrested two men from Washington state who are accused of having sex in Cambodia with underage boys, and an 85-year-old Los Angeles man is accused of trying to fly to the Philippines for sex with two preteen girls. … Another man, Richard Schmidt, 61, of Baltimore, arrives in the USA today to face charges that he traveled to Cambodia and the Philippines for sex with children. An indictment unsealed Wednesday charges him with molesting eight boys. Schmidt, a former teacher, has been convicted three times of molesting children in the USA. He was released from prison in July 2000. Schmidt fled to the Philippines in June 2002 after Maryland authorities issued an arrest warrant for parole violations, U.S. Department of Justice officials said Wednesday. … Investigators from Immigration and Customs Enforcement have more than 20 other cases underway, including 11 American men who were arrested by Mexican authorities and are awaiting extradition. … The arrests were made under a child-protection law President Bush signed April 30. It includes a provision that U.S. law enforcement officials say gives them a new tool to prosecute hard-core pedophiles and 'sex tourists' who want to engage in sex with children. … Although it had been illegal since 1986 to go abroad with the intent to have sex with someone under 18, prosecutors say the crime was difficult to prove in court. To get a conviction under the new law, prosecutors do not have to prove that U.S. residents left the country specifically to have illegal sex — only that they had illegal sex or tried to do so."

US Attorney Subpoenas New Jersey Governor's Office. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/1, Ung, Moroz, 385K) reports New Jersey US Attorney Christopher Christie subpoenaed records from the office of Gov. Jon Corzine, "part of a widening investigation into whether lawmakers personally profited by steering money to certain causes. The subpoenas delivered to the offices of the governor and his chief counsel demand all documents regarding grants that legislators have put in state budgets since 2004." An attached letter from Christie "requests, in particular, e-mail relating to 'grants and assistance, popularly known as 'Christmas Tree items.' That phrase refers to last-minute grants secured as officials finalize the state budget each year," also "commonly called 'pork.'" The investigation into the"closed-door, late-night budget process grew out of a federal criminal probe of State Sen. Wayne Bryant." The US Attorney's Office "is investigating whether Bryant was paid a part-time salary at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey to do nothing other than use his chairmanship of the Budget and Appropriations Committee to steer money to the school."

The Newark Star-Ledger (3/1, Whelan) reports the period under the subpoena "spans the administrations of governors James E. McGreevey, Richard Codey, and Corzine, who are all Democrats. While the grants are initiated by lawmakers in a secretive process, the governor must approve them or use his line-item veto to strike them from the budget or reduce them." The AP (2/28) also reports on the subpoenas.

WNBC-TV New York (2/28, 6:02 p.m.) reported, "A rare move by federal investigators today: Subpoenas were served on the office of Gov. Jon Corzine as part of an ongoing corruption probe. A single FBI agent served the papers earlier today. … An unidentified FBI agent having just served a subpoena on the governor's lawyer walks across the state house hall way to serve another subpoena in the governor's main office. It is a shockwave in an investigation that began with the financial dealings" of Bryant.

"Volley Of Subpoenas" Hit New Jersey Lawmakers Last Month. Newhouse News Service (3/1) says the "volley of subpoenas" that were "served on both Democratic and Republican leaders in the Senate and Assembly" two weeks ago "were reportedly part of a rapidly expanding corruption investigation into the Statehouse" by Christie. The subpoenas, "delivered by FBI agents as lawmakers were heading home" on Friday, February 16, "left many in Trenton thunderstruck. 'Trenton is on fire,' declared Assemblyman Kevin O'Toole, R-Wayne, as news of the subpoenas broke. 'This is equivalent to Rome burning.'"

State Senator's Fraud Trial Postponed Following DUI Charge. The AP (2/28) reports US District Judge Curtis Collier "has delayed state Sen. Jerry Cooper's fraud trial two months, agreeing to give the Morrison Democrat until June 4 to recover from a wreck that got him charged with driving under the influence." Before the February 7 "single-vehicle accident," Collier "had refused Cooper's request to delay the March 5 trial until after the legislative session ends in May. Cooper was seriously injured when his sport utility vehicle overturned several times on Interstate 24 in Rutherford County after he attended three legislative receptions in Nashville. The DUI charge follows a blood-alcohol test by the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation lab." The Chattanoogan (3/1) also reports on the delay.

Tennessee Highway Patrol Denies Favoritism In Handling Of Case. The AP (3/1, Poovey) reports that when Cooper "overturned his sport utility vehicle after attending three legislative receptions, the Tennessee highway patrol commander rushed to the wreck behind working patrol officers and emergency responders. A Department of Safety spokesman initially said preliminary reports showed no alcohol in the Morrison Democrat's vehicle, but at least one witness who stopped on Interstate 24 the evening of Feb. 7 said there was an empty Jack Daniel's bottle nearby." TBI "rushed Cooper's blood-alcohol test and gave the results to the Department of Safety" and Cooper "was charged with driving under the influence and speeding," but "three weeks after the wreck, the results of the test still haven't been released to the public. The department also has refused to say how fast Cooper was driving." The handling of the "wreck and subsequent DUI charge has raised questions about whether the lawmaker got special treatment because of political favoritism." Tennessee Highway Patrol Commander Col. Mike Walker, who is "still trying to shake off a political favoritism scandal," said Cooper "has received no preferential treatment from him or the Highway Patrol."

Philadelphia Imam Sentenced On Weapons Charges. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/1, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "A West Philadelphia imam who argued that he was entrapped by federal agents investigating unfounded terrorism suspicions was sentenced yesterday to eight years and four months in prison on weapons charges. Wayne Hogue, who is also known as Imam Wadir and Shaheed Bay, was secretly recorded selling 11 guns, including three assault rifles, to an FBI informant working for the Joint Terrorism Task Force. In early 2002, terrorism task-force agents had asked the informant, Hezekiah Salone, to keep 'his ears and eyes open' for trouble at Hogue's mosque, at 52d and Chestnut Streets in West Philadelphia, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Zaleski. Salone did not find evidence of terrorism or drug-dealing." US District Judge Timothy Savage, "who has privately reviewed secret FBI files in the case, said yesterday that the mosque was not suspected of any wrongdoing. However, after spending more than a year developing Hogue's confidence, the informant was able to record 11 gun sales in a 10-month period."

Two Plead Guilty In Trash-Hauling Racketeering Scheme. The Westchester Journal News (3/1, O'Connor) reports, "Two former managers at a Mount Kisco trash transfer station have pleaded guilty to their part in a reputed mob-backed racketeering effort to control the garbage-hauling industry in southern Connecticut and parts of the Lower Hudson Valley." Scott McGowan and Jeremy Everett "pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven, Conn., to conspiring to commit racketeering. The crime carries a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison. But federal sentencing guidelines will likely call for a much lesser sentence." Last June, a New Haven federal grand jury indicted 29 people "in what federal prosecutors said was a scheme by some trash haulers to carve up territory, inflate prices, and not compete against each other for contracts. The alleged conspiracy was backed by mob muscle, federal authorities said, as a means to persuade haulers to play by the scheme's rules."

Alleged Florida Mobster Pleads Guilty To Racketeering. The Miami Herald (3/1, Waller) reports, "Albert Facchiano, a 96-year-old Miami man believed to be the oldest person ever indicted by federal authorities, pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges of racketeering, loan sharking and intimidating a witness who was poised to testify against the Genovese crime family." The Herald continues, "Facchiano appeared in federal court in Fort Lauderdale and used headphones to hear the judge and his attorneys. … Because of back troubles, he sat, instead of standing, to enter his guilty plea." The Herald adds, "He could face up to 20 years for federal conspiracy and racketeering charges filed in Florida, and up to 10 more for federal charges of witness tampering filed in New York. … Facchiano, who turns 97 this month, sees a doctor four times a week and 'couldn't have withstood two trials,' said his lawyer, Brian McComb. … Prosecutors said Facchiano, nicknamed 'The Old Man,' supervised associates who committed crimes including extortion, robberies, money laundering and bank fraud. … Federal prosecutors in both states, along with the U.S. Department of Justice, have recommended that Facchiano be sentenced to house arrest."

Witness Intimidation Keeps Prosecutors From Bringing Charges. The New York Times (3/1, Kocieniewski) reports from Newark, NJ, "When Yusef Johnson, a 15-year-old honors student, was killed outside an apartment complex here so gang-infested it is known as Crazyville, a witness came forward within days and told the police she knew the man she had seen fire the fatal shots. … In another case three months later, in November 2005, officers found two people who identified a street gang leader as the man they saw kill a marijuana dealer named Valterez Coley during a dispute over a woman. … And when Isaiah Stewart, a 17-year-old wearing an electronic monitoring bracelet from a recent brush with the law, was gunned down that December, another Newark teenager sketched a diagram of the crime scene, correctly identified the murder weapon and named a former classmate as the person he had watched commit the crime." The Times continues, "They seem like slam-dunk cases, but none of the three suspects have been arrested. It is not that detectives are unsure of their identity or cannot find them. Rather, it is because so many recent cases here have been scuttled when witnesses were scared silent that the Essex County prosecutor has established an unwritten rule discouraging pursuit of cases that rely on a single witness, and those in which witness statements are not extensively corroborated by forensic evidence." The Times adds, "The 3 are among at least 14 recent murders in Newark in which witnesses have clearly identified the killers but no charges have been filed, infuriating local police commanders and victims' relatives. … In 8 of the 14 cases, according to court documents and police reports, there was more than one witness; in two of them, off-duty police officers were among those identifying the suspects. But in a DNA era, these are cases with little or no physical evidence, and they often involve witnesses whose credibility could be compromised by criminal history or drug problems, or both. … The tension between the police and prosecutors here over the evolving standards of evidence required to authorize arrest warrants is a stark example of the profound effect witness intimidation is having on the criminal justice system in New Jersey and across the country." The Times notes, "Surveys conducted by the National Youth Gang Center, which is financed by the federal Department of Justice, have found that 88 percent of urban prosecutors describe witness intimidation as a serious problem. … In both Baltimore and Boston, where "stop snitching" campaigns by rap artists and gang leaders have urged city residents not to cooperate with the authorities, prosecutors estimate that witnesses face some sort of intimidation in 80 percent of all homicide cases."

Maryland Prosecutor Wants To Emulate Federal Approach To Securing Witness Testimony. The Washington Post (3/1, T03, Castaneda) reports that Maryland "State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey said he is considering emulating the methods federal prosecutors used to obtain the testimony of fearful witnesses. Ivey said he distributed copies of a news article about the convictions to prosecutors in his office to get them to start thinking about using the federal approach." The Post examines examples of witness intimidation in a recent federal drug trial and reports that "federal prosecutors overcame that with a straightforward approach and some old-school technology, said Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein. … When his office wins an indictment, a lead prosecutor and a case agent (from the FBI, in this instance) are assigned, and it is their responsibility to stay in touch with witnesses and make sure they appear in court, Rosenstein said." The Post adds, "Federal prosecutors also make it clear to witnesses that they can face legal consequences if they do not appear for court. … 'We are very aggressive in assuring that witnesses show up,' Rosenstein said. 'If they don't show, we get an arrest warrant, and they can be prosecuted for contempt of court or obstruction. If they take the stand and testify falsely, they can be prosecuted for perjury.' … To guard against witnesses who at trial suffer sudden memory loss or deviate from their grand jury testimony, federal prosecutors often record the grand jury testimony of government witnesses, Rosenstein said."

Ney, En Route To Prison, Thanks Friends For Support. The Hill (3/1, Kucinich) reports former Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), "who will report today to federal prison in West Virginia, issued an emotional goodbye e-mail yesterday to friends and colleagues. He thanked them for their support over the past six months and told them he had 'gained a higher power' to help him through his incarceration." The e-mail "closed with a quote from Garth Brooks's "The Dance": 'And now I'm glad I didn't know/ The way it all would end, the way it all would go/ Our lives are better left to chance/ I could have missed the pain/ But I'd have had to miss the dance.'" Ney "will serve a sentence of 30 months on federal bribery charges. He resigned from Congress in November after pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy and making false statements."

New Jersey Lawmakers Consider Bill Targeting Online Sex Offenders. The AP (3/1, Hester) reports from Trenton, NJ, "Amid growing concern about child safety on the computer, New Jersey lawmakers are considering a measure to prohibit released sex offenders from using the Internet and to impose new rules for online dating sites. … 'We're living in some very scary times,' said Senate President Richard J. Codey, who is spearheading New Jersey's effort. 'No matter how much you trust your kids, no matter how much you think you know what they're doing, there are some sick people out there who will stop at nothing to prey on them.'" The AP adds, "Released sex offenders caught using the Internet would face up to 18 months in jail and fines of up to $10,000. Sex offenders caught using the Internet to solicit a child would face a mandatory five years in jail, rather than the three years they face under the current law. … The measure also requires online dating sites to tell New Jersey residents whether they do background checks. … No federal law imposes Internet restrictions on convicted sex offenders, though Florida and Nevada have laws imposing computer restrictions on sex offenders. … The plan is to be considered soon by the state Senate, but already has raised constitutional questions. Internet companies like Yahoo!, AOL, eHarmony and Match.com are also concerned about the online dating rule." The AP notes, "A 2000 U.S. Department of Justice survey of youths ages 10 to 17 found that about one in five received a sexual solicitation or approach over the Internet in the prior year. The concern has prompted several states to take steps against child solicitation through the Internet. … The New Jersey proposal would apply to sex offenders subject to Megan's Law registration, community supervision for life and those on probation or parole."

SCOTUS Rules Cross-Examination Rule Not Retroactive. The AP (3/1, Sherman) reports, "The Supreme Court unanimously reinstated a Nevada child molester's conviction Wednesday in a decision that continued the justices' refusal to apply recent rulings on criminal procedure to older cases." The AP continues, "Marvin Bockting was convicted in 1988 on the strength of his stepdaughter's statements to police. But then-6-year-old Autumn Bockting did not testify at Bockting's trial, so his lawyers never had the opportunity to question the child." The AP adds, " In 2004, the Court ruled that defendants have a constitutional right to cross-examine witnesses against them. … The question in this case was whether that rule would apply to older cases like Bockting's. Justice Samuel Alito, writing for the Court, said it would not. The 2004 case 'did not effect a change of this magnitude,' Alito said." The AP notes, "The Supreme Court has refused a dozen times over 17 years to apply new rules of criminal procedure to older cases. … Alone among federal appeals courts, however, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the rule should apply retroactively and overturned Bockting's conviction. … Nevada and the Bush administration urged the justices to conclude that the San Francisco-based court got it wrong. Among other things, they said courts would be burdened by defendants whose convictions depended on out-of-court statements that were not subject to cross-examination."

LAPD "Most-Wanted" Gang Suspect Arrested In Guatemala. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Winton, McGreevy) reports, "An alleged 18th Street gang member named three weeks ago as one of the Los Angeles Police Department's 10 most wanted gang members has been captured in Guatemala and deported back to Texas, officials said today." The Times continues, "Angel Zevallos, an alleged 18th Street Westside member who goes by the name 'Spanky,' was captured last week and deported by Guatemalan authorities, said Chief Inspector John Clark of the U.S. Marshals Service in Los Angeles. … Zevallos will appear before a judge in Texas and then face extradition back to California to face an attempted murder charge, Clark said." The Times adds, "Police Chief William J. Bratton confirmed the arrest as the first success of a new program in which the department released a list of its 10 most wanted gang members. … The listing of gang fugitives and of the 11 worst gangs is part of a new campaign to reduce gang violence, which increased more than 15% citywide last year. Bratton has redeployed more than 200 officers to the crackdown on gangs. … Zevallos allegedly wounded a man in a bar fight in Los Angeles."

Two Picasso Painting Stolen In Paris. The New York Times (3/1, Riding) reports from Paris, "Two important paintings by Picasso estimated by the police to be worth a total of about $66 million have been stolen from the Left Bank home of his granddaughter Diana Widmaier-Picasso, the authorities announced Wednesday." The Times continues, "Paris police officials said the two oils, 'Maya With Doll' from 1938 and 'Portrait of Jacqueline' from 1961, were taken from Ms. Widmaier-Picasso's house on the Rue de Grenelle in the city's chic Seventh Arrondissement sometime overnight between Monday and Tuesday. … The police said that two drawings, one by Picasso, were also stolen, but this could not be confirmed by the Picasso family lawyer, Céline Astolfe." The Times adds, "In a telephone interview Ms. Astolfe said that Ms. Widmaier-Picasso and her mother, Maya, the daughter of Picasso's longtime mistress Marie-Thérèse Walter, were asleep in the house when the theft occurred. … The lawyer said the theft appeared to be the work of professionals because the home's alarms were neutralized and there were no signs of a break-in. … Although the paintings formed part of the Picasso family's private collection, they are nonetheless well known and, art experts said, would be difficult to sell on the open market. Ms. Astolfe said their value might exceed the police estimate."

$80 Million Sought For DC Law Enforcement Museum. The Washington Post (3/1, B1, Ruane) reports, "You're a cop. You've been summoned to an alley behind a strip mall that's a known drug hangout. You hail a man and two women lounging by an old car. … The man, a beefy guy in a plaid work shirt, gets belligerent and starts toward you. One of the women grabs his arm to hold him back, and as you focus on them, the other woman slips a pistol from her pocket and opens fire. … Bang. You're dead." The Post continues, "This big-screen interactive simulation of an eight-second slice in the virtual life of an everyday cop was demonstrated yesterday as the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund kicked off the money-raising campaign for a new museum, planned to open in 2011 near Judiciary Square. … Nearly $30 million has been raised for the museum, which is designed to showcase police work and the history of American law enforcement. Yesterday's event began a drive to raise the rest of the $80 million cost, with officials previewing some of the attractions. … The police training simulation, in which participants must make snap shoot-or-don't-shoot decisions, is one of several interactive features. Visitors also will be able to attend a simulated autopsy -- which will be 'instructive, not gross' -- do realistic forensic and detective work, and see a word-class collection of police memorabilia, according to museum officials." The Post notes, "The fundraising drive was launched at the National Press Club with a boost from former presidents Bill Clinton and George H. W. Bush, who spoke via video recording, and former U.S. attorneys general John D. Ashcroft, Dick Thornburgh and Edwin A. Meese, who spoke in person. Several local officials also attended, including D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, D.C. Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier, Prince George's County Police Chief Melvin C. High and Fairfax County Police Chief David M. Rohrer."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Hears Arguments On Faith-Based Initiative Legal Challenges. USA Today (3/1, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "Supreme Court justices appeared ready Wednesday to limit taxpayers' ability to challenge government funding of groups with religious affiliations. Several justices were skeptical of a lower court decision allowing a Wisconsin group, the Freedom From Religion Foundation, to sue the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives." The foundation "says the White House office -- created by President Bush to help religious groups compete with secular ones for federal social services grants -- aims to support an unconstitutional government endorsement of religion." Some justices, including Chief Justice John Roberts and Antonin Scalia, "suggested that if the lower court's decision were affirmed, taxpayers would bring frivolous lawsuits challenging government spending that touches religion. … More sympathetic to the challengers, Justice Stephen Breyer said that 'people become terribly upset when they see some other religion getting the money from the state.'"

DOJ_NMG_0138166

The Financial Times (3/1, Washington) says "a federal appeals court in Chicago sided with the atheist group but the US Justice Department says the ruling should be overturned on the grounds that it could lead to a flood of taxpayer lawsuits challenging all sorts of government spending."

The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Savage, 850K) reports, "US Solicitor General Paul Clement said taxpayers who believe the White House is unconstitutionally promoting religion should not be accorded legal "standing" to sue in court. It would be too 'intrusive on the executive branch' to permit lawsuits contesting how the president and his advisers conduct their affairs, he said." The Times adds, "Overall, the nine justices seemed split during the hour-long argument. If they adopt the administration's view, the ruling could make it harder for critics to sue officials who use public money in ways that support religion. If the justices rule in favor of Freedom From Religion, the group would still have to prove its case in court."

The Wall Street Journal (3/1, Anderson, 2.04M) also describes the courts as "sharply divided…along conservative and liberal lines, with Justice Anthony Kennedy, a moderate conservative, controlling the outcome. … A wild card in the outcome could be…Scalia, who appeared troubled with Supreme Court precedents limiting when Establishment Clause suits could be brought and concerned with making it easy to challenge a variety of government activities."

The Washington Post (3/1, A6, Barnes, 690K) notes Roberts "wondered whether opponents of the administration's initiatives would extend their concerns to the court itself, which opened yesterday's session, as it always does, with a marshal appealing for God to 'save the United States and this honorable court.'" Alito, Scalia and Roberts "seemed most sympathetic to the government's argument, and Justice Anthony M. Kennedy worried about the courts 'supervising the White House.'" Justice Clarence Thomas did not ask questions, but has written in the past that he does not think that the establishment clause gives rise to individual complaints."

The New York Times (3/1, Greenhouse, 1.16M) says that for Clement, "the most helpful hand was that of Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. As the solicitor general batted back tricky hypothetical questions, Justice Alito asked him whether the lines he was drawing 'make a lot of sense in an abstract sense' or were 'the best that can be done' under existing precedents. 'The latter, Justice Alito,' Mr. Clement said, evoking laughter. 'I appreciate the question.'"

The AP (3/1, Frommer) reports, "At issue is whether a Wisconsin-based group of atheists and agnostics have legal standing, by virtue of being taxpayers, to bring their complaint in the federal court system. … Taking one extreme, Justice Stephen Breyer asked a lawyer for the White House whether a taxpayer would be able to challenge a law in which Congress sets up a church at Plymouth Rock. … ' would say no,'responded Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, but he added that such a church could be challenged in other ways — just not on the basis that a taxpayer has been injured. Clement is representing the Bush administration, which is trying to prevent the taxpayer suit over its aggressive promotion, through the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, of federal financial aid for religious charities. … Taking the opposite extreme, Justice Antonin Scalia asked a lawyer for the Wisconsin group, Andrew Pincus, whether taxpayers would be able to sue over the use of security money for a presidential trip where religion is discussed. … Pincus said that taxpayers would not have standing to do so, arguing that in such a case the money spent would be "incidental," and not central to the issue."

The Legal Times (3/1, Mauro) reports, "Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer looked skyward Wednesday as he tried to come up with a 'more amazing' hypothetical during arguments in a key church-state case. With or without divine intervention, he found one: Could the federal government fund churches and ministers of a single religion nationwide 'dedicated to the proposition that this particular sect is the true sect,' without fear of taxpayer lawsuits against it? … 'Horrible hypothetical,' growled Solicitor General Paul Clement, but he went on to say yes. 'The bottom line is that there would not be taxpayer standing.' With a helpful suggestion from Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., Clement qualified his point by asserting that adherents of other religions could file suit against such a program on the basis that they were being discriminated against. But Clement held firm on the point that taxpayers, merely as taxpayers, could not challenge a network of government-funded churches." The Times adds, "That exchange may prove crucial in determining the outcome of the case before the Court, Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation. The Wisconsin-based foundation filed a taxpayer lawsuit against the Bush administration's funding of faith-based initiatives, claiming that conferences sponsored under the funding program favor religious groups. The government defended the program, claiming the plaintiffs did not have standing, but the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the foundation could continue with its suit. … The case is an important test not only for the faith-based initiative but also for a 39-year-old precedent that has treated First Amendment establishment-clause cases differently when it comes to standing. … In other contexts, taxpayers can't challenge government programs in court solely on the grounds that their tax dollars are being misused. To prevent trivial lawsuits, the high court has required plaintiffs to show a more direct injury or a bigger stake, such as a violation of rights or a denial of benefits. … But in the 1968 case of Flast v. Cohen, the Court made an exception. It ruled that taxpayer status alone was enough to achieve standing when the claim is that a congressional expenditure violates the First Amendment's bar against establishment of religion."

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (3/1, Skiba) reports, "Anne Gaylor, Wisconsin's best-known atheist, has fought to keep church and state separate for almost 30 years. But the 80-year-old Gaylor marked a first Wednesday when a lawsuit she brought was heard by the United States Supreme Court." The Sentinel continues, "Attorneys said the case, the subject of hourlong arguments Wednesday, is the first challenge to the Bush administration's faith-based initiatives to reach the high court. … The separation-of-church-and-state case, also the first of its type to be heard under Chief Justice John Roberts, hinges on a narrow but key legal question: Can the average taxpayer allege violations of the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, which states: 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion . . . '" The Sentinel adds, "Gaylor, who lives in Madison, was on hand with other officials of the Freedom from Religion Foundation, which she founded in 1978. The dispute arose when Gaylor and her foundation filed suit against the Bush program in federal court in Wisconsin in 2004. … A judge tossed out the case, saying the plaintiffs lacked standing, which is a legal concept establishing whether someone has the right to appear in court to pursue his or her claims. The judge said the case failed a test established by the Supreme Court in that the plaintiffs' case involved the executive branch, not Congress' taxing and spending powers. … The Chicago-based 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed with the lower court. Its 2-1 majority said the foundation's suit should go forward because 'there is so much that executive officials could do to promote religion in ways forbidden by the establishment clause.' … That prompted the director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives to ask the Supreme Court to weigh in. "

FEC Fines Anti-Kerry 527 Group. The Washington Post (3/1, A8, Cillizza, Mosk, 690K) reports, "The Federal Election Commission levied one of its largest fines ever yesterday against the Progress for America Voter Fund, a conservative group that raised $44 million to help undermine Democrat John Kerry's 2004 presidential bid." The fine "was the latest in a series of FEC penalties imposed on high-profile independent groups that operated on both sides of the 2004 presidential elections. The FEC is trying to send a message to the '527' organizations, FEC Chairman Robert Lenhard said in a statement." Progress for America "agreed to pay the $750,000 fine as part of the deal, which did not require the group to admit wrongdoing."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI May Reopen 1968 South Carolina Civil Rights Slayings. The (SC) State (3/1, Brundrett) reports, "The FBI might reopen an investigation into the 1968 slayings by police of three black students at S.C. State College — known as the Orangeburg Massacre — and two other civil rights-era deaths in South Carolina." The State continues, "The S.C. cases are among about 100 death cases nationwide the FBI said it will re-examine in partnership with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, National Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller on Tuesday announced the 'Civil Rights-Era Cold Case Initiative' with leaders of the civil rights organizations." The State adds, "Cleveland Sellers, who was among 30 people shot during the Feb. 8, 1968, incident at the S.C. State College campus, said Wednesday an investigation of the Orangeburg case is 'certainly overdue.' … 'The Orangeburg Massacre is, in fact, a litmus test for racial relations in South Carolina,' said Sellers, 63, now head of the African-American studies department at the University of South Carolina. 'I want the incident to be thoroughly investigated and the truth to come out.'" The State adds, "Lonnie Randolph, president of the state NAACP conference, said his organization recommended the Orangeburg case to the FBI after polling member branches statewide. … 'Our goal always is for justice to prevail,' he said. 'To kill three people — it's hard to think justice has been served when individuals are shot in the back.' … Former Gov. Robert McNair, who has been criticized by black leaders for his handling of the incident, said Wednesday in a prepared statement that any decision by the FBI and U.S. Department of Justice to reopen their investigation is 'certainly up to them.' … 'Immediately after the tragedy at Orangeburg, we requested that the FBI and Department of Justice conduct a full and comprehensive investigation of all of the events surrounding this incident since we felt very strongly that the state of South Carolina could not investigate itself,' said McNair." The State notes, "The initial FBI probe led to federal charges against eight state troopers and another police officer. They were acquitted later by a mostly white jury. … Besides that incident, the FBI said this week it also will re-examine the death of a 13-year-old Edisto Island boy whose body washed ashore in Charleston County in 1960, and the 1965 shooting death of a man in an area of Allendale County where civil rights demonstrations were held. Both victims were black. … Most of the cases referred to the FBI are from the South. Georgia, for example, has 13 cases, and North Carolina, three. … Thom O'Neill, spokesman at the FBI office in Columbia, said Wednesday the decision whether to formally reopen any of the three S.C. cases will be made by Brian Lamkin, special agent in charge of the FBI's S.C. operations. No deadlines have been set to complete investigations, he said."

Louisiana Victims Among Civil Rights Cold Cases To Be Reopened. The Shreveport Times (3/1) reports, "Nine Louisianans are included in a list of 76 suspicious or criminal deaths in the 1950s and 1960s that spurred the FBI to reopen investigations into possible civil rights abuses from that turbulent time." The Times continues, "Bureau officials on Tuesday announced the investigations amid a Justice Department focus on cracking unsolved cases from the nation's civil rights era. … The high-priority cases, which FBI Director Robert S. Mueller described as numbering between 10 and 12, are among an estimated 100 that investigators nationwide are looking at as possible civil rights-related murders." The Times adds, "None of the nine Louisiana cases in the list maintained by the Alabama-based Southern Poverty Law Center occurred in the immediate Northwest Louisiana area. But several did take place in Ruston and Monroe, including one 1960 shooting rampage where four people were killed. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged that many of the cases may be beyond the boundaries of what the federal government can legally prosecute. But they "remain on our radar," he said. … 'Much time has passed on these crimes,' Gonzales told reporters in Washington. 'The wounds they left are deep, and still many of them have not healed. But we are committed to re-examining these cases and doing all we can to bring justice to the criminals who may have avoided punishment for so long.' … Addressing civil rights violators, Gonzales said: 'You have not gotten away with anything — we are still on your trail.'"

More Commentary. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (3/1) editorializes, "The LeFlore County (MS) grand jury has decided not to issue any indictments in the 1955 slaying of Emmett Till. That may be disappointing to those who have worked to bring justice in this case. But the grand jury did its job. The tragedy is that it took so long for the case to be fully considered." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "District Attorney Joyce Chiles of Greenville should be commended for reviewing the 8,000 pages of evidence and presenting it. Only time seems to have killed chances for prosecution, not lack of diligence today. … The Aug. 28, 1955, slaying of Till remains a pivotal moment in the civil rights movement. Till was killed after he reportedly whistled at a white woman, Carolyn Bryant, the last known living suspect. Her then-husband, Roy, and his half-brother, J.W. Milam, admitted they killed Till after an all-white jury had acquitted them. Both have since died. … But the case is also noteworthy, since it: … Is one of 29 killings from the civil rights era since 1989 reopened, leading to 28 arrests and 22 convictions; … Should spur a 'cold case' unit of the Justice Department to investigate unsolved civil rights killings in a bill before Congress. … Justice can come still."

DOJ Meets With NAACP, Connecticut Officials.

The Connecticut Post (3/1, Mason) reports from Ansonia, CT, "For the second time in as many months, city officials and officers with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People met with staff from the U.S. Department of Justice. … As was the case after a similar January meeting, attendees were vague about what was discussed with officials from the Department of Justice's Community Relations Service, designed for resolving conflicts dealing with race, color and national origin. … The two-hour meeting, held in the Erlingheuser Room at City Hall, was closed to the public and the media." The Post continues, "Attending Wednesday's session were Mayor Jim Della Volpe, Police Chief Kevin Hale, Corporation Counsel Kevin Blake, local NAACP President Greg Johnson, Housing Authority Executive Director Jim Finnucan, former alderwoman Ralphine Ford and Riverside Apartments tenant leader Naomi Wallace. Johnson did not elaborate on concerns brought up at the meeting; he only said that he thought the meeting offered plenty of positives. … 'It was to discuss strategies and ways to improve the quality of life for all citizens of Ansonia,' Johnson said. 'It was a very productive meeting.' … He said 'a gamut of things' was discussed. … Johnson said the group will meet again, but he did not say when."

Justices To Hear Case Regarding Schools' Powers To Limit Student Speech.

USA Today (3/1, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports the U.S. Supreme Court will hear on March 19, a case involving "students' speech rights" and the ability of schools to limit "such rights to try to maintain order in schools." The case involves Joseph Frederick, who as a high school senior in Juneau, Alaska produced a sign reading "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" in an attempt to get TV coverage while the Olympic torch was traveling through the city. He was suspended for ten days by Juneau-Douglas High School Principal Deborah Morse for being in violation of the "school's anti-drug policy." School officials are expected to be "watching for signs of whether the justices will make it more difficult to enforce a range of campus speech regulations that have been imposed in recent years." The National School Boards Association argues in a brief supporting Morse that "it's important for administrators to be able to regulate slogans dealing with particularly controversial issues." Morse "is appealing a federal appeals court's ruling that she is liable for money damages to Frederick because past rulings 'clearly established' that she was not entitled to tear down the 'Bong Hits' sign."

Meehan Proposes Repeal Of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." The Washington Times (3/1, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Democratic Rep. Martin T. Meehan "yesterday said he will introduce legislation repealing the military's 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' policy that allows homosexuals to serve in the armed forces." Meehan said "public opinion has changed since the policy began 14 years ago under the Clinton administration, and that allowing homosexuals to openly serve will help the military retain specialized members, including linguists fluent in Arabic." A 2005 Government Accountability Office report "says more than 10,000 members of the armed services, including 750 service members with specialties 'critical' to the war on terror, have been discharged since the policy was implemented." Meehan said, "It will still be an uphill climb. But the November election can only mean good things for my bill."

Longtime Black Residents Stay Separate From Latino Newcomers In Maryland Neighborhood. The Washington Post (3/1, B1, Parker) reports, "Ask older residents of historic North Brentwood their recollections of the town, and they go into a reverie about kids playing house-to-house and about how the town was self-contained with businesses and shops. Mostly, it was black, and the generations who had lived there gave the place its essence. … But 'change comes,' said Eleanor Traynham, 71, who was born and raised in the town, in Prince George's County, and returned in 1992. And 'you have to be able to adapt to change.'" The Post continues, "On a late afternoon, children run across the lawns of modest three-bedroom homes, young mothers carry groceries, and fathers in coveralls arrive home from work. These families are Latino. A few yards away, much older residents are checking mail or working on their cars or greeting each other with late-day banter. They are black. … In a town changing without overt rancor, they are neighbors without the neighborliness, separate groups leading lives that don't touch, even though their property lines do. It's a new challenge for this historic place -- re-creating community." The Post adds, "It's a challenge that plays out against a backdrop of seismic demographic shifts. In 2003, Latinos overtook African Americans as the nation's most populous minority. Fueled by a boom in construction and low-wage service jobs, the Washington region had the ninth-largest Latino population gain in the country from 2000 to 2004. … In Prince George's, most of the Latino population, which doubled from 1990 to 2000, is concentrated inside the Beltway in the northwestern part of the county. As more Latinos graduate to homeownership, the relative affordability of housing in communities there has accelerated the pace of change. … In North Brentwood, population nearly 500, off Rhode Island Avenue just outside the District line, these shifts play out door-to-door. Since 2000, the historically black town has become 25 percent Hispanic." The Post notes, "Some black residents are concerned about what these changes mean for their community, even as they worry about seeming intolerant. Newer Hispanic residents say they get along with everyone, and if there is subtle awkwardness to their brief hello-goodbye exchanges with black neighbors, they're too busy working and raising their families to notice."

Sharpton Revelation Said To Show Relevance Of Slavery. In his New York Times column (3/1), Bob Herbert says that as the Rev. Al Sharpton's revelation that his family was owned by relatives of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond shows, "The days of slavery are closer than we tend to think, and they were crueler than we tend to realize. Mr. Sharpton's great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton, was sent with his wife and two children from South Carolina to Florida so a woman named Julia Thurmond Sharpton could send them out as laborers to pay off debts left by her late husband." Slavery is "such an uncomfortable subject that the temptation is to relegate it to the distant past and move on. But the long tentacles of that evil institution are still with us. Slavery was the foundation of the thriving consumer society that we have today and the wellspring of the racism that still poisons so many white attitudes and black lives."

In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (3/1), the Rev. Al Sharpton says, "Words cannot fully describe the feelings I had when I learned the awful truth. Not only am I the descendant of slaves, but my family had to endure the particular agony of being slaves to the Thurmonds, the symbol of everything about America that I have fought to change. I felt humiliated and prideful; reflective and angry; oppressed and uplifted." America's "shame is that I am the heir of those who were property to the Thurmond family."

ANTITRUST:

Sirius Chief Takes Push For Radio Merger To Capitol Hill. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, C8, Boles) reports, "Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.'s chief executive, Mel Karmazin, told lawmakers the company would cut consumer prices if federal authorities approve its merger with XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc." The Journal continues, "Mr. Karmazin tried to allay concerns that subscribers' costs would rise after the $11.4 billion merger of the two struggling satellite-radio operators, telling the House Judiciary Committee's antitrust task force the merger would lead to a decline in prices. For basic monthly service, subscribers to both radio operations pay $12.95 a month. 'The idea of raising prices to compete with free radio is bizarre and doesn't work," he said. "We are committed to not raising prices and, in fact, are committed to lowering prices.'" The Journal adds, "Rep. John Conyers (D., Mich.), chairman of both the Judiciary Committee and the task force, was skeptical. 'We don't have too good a record of satellite companies keeping their promises,' Mr. Conyers said. '"Trust me" isn't going to work here, not just today, but in the longer-term examinations you will be going through.'" The Journal notes, "Democratic Rep. Rick Boucher of Virginia said the merger should get a green light as long as the companies agree to a series of conditions and to freeze prices. . … The conditions he suggested were outlined by Gigi Sohn, president of Public Knowledge, a public-interest group with a focus on communications. In her testimony before the task force, Ms. Sohn said the companies would have to allow consumers to subscribe on a channel-by-channel basis or tiered programming. She added they should agree to make 5% of capacity available to noncommercial, educational purposes and freeze prices for three years once the merger is approved."

The Washington Post (3/1, D4, Babington) reports, "The nation's two satellite-radio companies promised yesterday to refrain from raising prices, for a time at least, if they are allowed to merge. But some lawmakers and consumer groups appeared dubious." The Post continues, "Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, told the House Judiciary Committee's antitrust task force that consumers would benefit if the government allowed his company to merge with rival XM Satellite Radio Holdings. 'We are committed to not raising prices, and we are committed to lowering prices,' said Karmazin, who would be chief executive of the new company." The Post adds, "Karmazin said Sirius and XM might accept conditions if the Federal Communications Commission and Justice Department were to approve the merger. But he declined to say how long they might agree to cap subscription prices, now set at $12.95 a month by both companies. XM and Sirius have said a merged company would offer various levels of content, presumably at varying prices, but they have declined to provide details. … Owners of free, over-the-air radio stations strongly oppose the merger, and the president of their association sharply challenged Karmazin at the hearing. The government cannot trust XM's and Sirius's promises, 'given their long track record of breaking FCC rules,' including causing signal interference with local radio stations, said David K. Rehr, president of the National Association of Broadcasters."

USA Today (3/1, 2B, Davidson) reports, "To win approval of their blockbuster merger, the nation's two satellite radio companies would accept government-mandated conditions guaranteeing consumers lower prices and more channels, the head of Sirius Satellite Radio told lawmakers Wednesday. … 'We will give people more choice than they had before and lower prices and less confusion,' Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin told the House Judiciary Committee's new antitrust task force." USA adds, "The hearing served up the first public airing of the proposed link-up between Sirius and XM Satellite Radio since it was announced last week. Wednesday's debate underscored the complexities of the merger, with divisions within the ranks of public-interest advocates and each political party on whether consumers would be helped or hurt. … Critics such as the National Association of Broadcasters say the merger, which requires approval from the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission, would forge a monopoly satellite radio provider that would raise prices and limit choice. Karmazin says that would never happen because satellite radio competes with traditional radio, Internet radio, iPods, music on cellphones and digital radio. … Noting that there are some 10 million subscribers to both services, Karmazin said, 'Why would people who don't subscribe at $12.95 subscribe at $14.95?' … The companies, which each charge about $13 a month for more than 100 channels, have lost billions of dollars between them while competing to sign up high-priced talent such as Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey. By combining, Karmazin said, customers could get both Major League Baseball and the NFL, for instance, on the same radio service. And the new giant could use cost savings to cut prices."

The Washington Times (3/1, Rowland) reports, "Federal lawmakers, kicking off their probe of the proposed $13 billion merger of rivals XM Satellite Radio Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc., yesterday quizzed both Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin and one of the deal's most vocal opponents. … 'We've come to this hearing with an open mind, but we also recognize that the companies have the obligation to convince Congress, regulators and most importantly, the American people that this combination will improve the competitive playing field and benefit consumers,' said House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat." The Times adds, "Mr. Karmazin said a combined entity would be open to government-imposed conditions, including an agreement not to raise subscription prices for a certain period of time. … 'If in order to get the deal done we have to make a concession, we're prepared to make a concession,' he said. … But David Rehr, president of the National Association of Broadcasters and an outspoken critic of the deal, said the merger would create a 'government-sanctioned monopoly.' … 'Two companies that have a pattern and practice of violating their FCC licenses cannot be trusted with monopoly power,' said Mr. Rehr, whose organization represents traditional AM/FM radio stations."

The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Puzzanghera) reports, "Karmazin, who would run the new company if federal regulators approve Sirius' proposed merger with XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc., tried to overcome those hurdles by promising not to hike for an unspecified period the $12.95 monthly subscription rate that both companies charge. … The reason for the concession is simple, Karmazin said, and is the heart of the case Sirius and XM are trying to make: They now compete with a host of technologies that don't charge a cent — including broadcast radio, iPods and music that streams over the Internet." The Times adds, "Price is a major concern for several members of the committee's antitrust task force. Congress doesn't have to approve the deal, but its views could influence officials at the Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission, which must bless the merger. … 'Why would we eliminate one of the two competitors here?' said Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte (R-Va.). 'I believe prices are going up if you are the only one.' … His fears were echoed by Mark Cooper, director of research at the Consumer Federation of America. … 'Competition is the consumer's best friend,' Cooper told the committee, warning that 'a tsunami of mergers will ripple through the digital space' if regulators agree to the market definition urged by Sirius and XM." The Times notes, "Conyers also questioned what effect the potential deal might have on future mergers. … But some lawmakers agreed with Karmazin that the marketplace had changed and indicated they would support the merger with certain conditions, such as requiring a lower-priced option for a limited number of channels. … 'Music is music, and it really doesn't matter much the source of it,' said Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.) "

The New York Times (3/1, Labaton) reports, "Karmazin…repeatedly and angrily contested charges by opponents, including the major trade group for broadcasters, that merging his company with XM Satellite Radio Holdings would simply transform a duopoly into a monopoly. … 'There is no monopoly or duopoly,' he said. 'That's the most bizarre thing I have ever heard.'" The Times adds,. "He maintained that the relevant market for the services offered by the two satellite radio companies includes all terrestrial broadcasters, Internet radio and other popular listening devices, including iPods and other portable music players. … With so much competition from other sources, he said, satellite radio lacks the sway of a dominant industry power. … But as he tried to sell the proposed deal to Washington, he also acknowledged the major challenges he faced in persuading policy makers that it would not be anticompetitive. He made it clear that he was willing to embark on the same kind of deal- making with the regulators that has been a hallmark of his career as a broadcast executive."

Dow Jones Newswires (3/1) reports, "The Department of Justice's antitrust task force would have to approve the merger and FCC rules would have to be changed to allow the deal before it could get final approval." Dow Jones continues, "The NAB, which represents mainly smaller radio and television broadcasters across the U.S., fiercely opposes the deal. … 'The proposed merger must be rejected,' said Rehr in his opening statement. 'Public policy should never allow one entity to acquire state-sanctioned, monopoly control over the 25 megahertz of spectrum allocated to satellite-radio service.' … Taking a somewhat less strident view was Gigi B. Sohn, the president of public-interest group Public Knowledge. … In her opening statement, she said that the merger should be given the green light only if it meets three conditions. … It must make available pricing choices such as channel-by-channel subscriptions or tiered programming; it must hand over 5 percent of its capacity to noncommercial educational programming; and it should agree to not raise prices for three years after the merger is granted approval."

CNET News (3/1, Broache) reports, "Karmazin said a combination of the sole two satellite radio players would lower, or at least cap, its prices and provide more programming choices. … For example, one network carries Major League Baseball games, and the other carries the National Football League games, but neither carries both. Sports fans would no longer have to pay to subscribe to both services or buy two different radio receivers if the entities merged, he said. Karmazin also pledged that existing radio receivers for each service would continue to work after the melding of the companies. … 'We are absolutely convinced that this merger is going to be in the consumer's best interest,' said the Sirius chief and former Viacom president." CNET adds, "Attitudes toward the proposed deal, worth about $13 billion, did not appear to be split along party lines among members of the newly created House task force, which has 10 Democrats and nine Republicans. Many opened their questioning on Wednesday with vows to keep an "open mind" about the deal but went on to question the deal's necessity and its benefits to consumers. … One hurdle already lies in the licenses granted to the companies by the Federal Communications Commission. In hopes of ensuring competition, the FCC stipulated at the time that there had to continue to be more than one licensee in the satellite radio sphere. XM and Sirius would have to persuade the regulators to waive that decision." CNET notes, "Citing the FCC's policy decision, Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), the former chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, challenged XM and Sirius executives' repeated assertions that the merged entity would not constitute a monopoly. … 'What you appear to be advocating is to make your merged company somewhat akin to an old regulated gas company, and I don't see where the consumer ends up benefiting in that,' Sensenbrenner said. … He also questioned how the XM-Sirius plan was any different than a proposed merger between EchoStar Communications' Dish Network and Hughes Electronics' DirectTV that the FCC blocked on the grounds that it amounted to a 'regulated monopoly.' … Karmazin said his companies' situation was different because the satellite TV business competes with cable and not with free services like terrestrial and Internet radio. Throughout the hearing, he repeatedly challenged any suggestion that the merged companies would have incentive to raise their prices by saying, 'We compete with free.'"

Bloomberg (3/1, Rowley, Stern) reports, "The companies contend there is more competition for listeners now than when the original satellite licenses were granted, from devices such as Apple Inc.'s iPod, terrestrial radio and new high-definition stations. … 'We are going to have to convince them that it is not anticompetitive,' Karmazin said, referring to Justice Department and U.S. Federal Communications Commission regulators. He was speaking on behalf of XM as well as Sirius." Bloomberg adds, "Rehr drew his own critics, including Democrats Anthony Weiner from New York and Rick Boucher from Virginia. … 'I would like the panel to oblige me by stop throwing around the word monopoly,' Weiner said. … Boucher agreed with XM and Sirius's contention that the companies compete in a broad audio entertainment market that includes broadcast radio. … 'The very presence of Mr. Rehr here happens to confirm the argument that the relevant market is all of radio,' Boucher said." Bloomberg notes, "Lawmakers and regulators have promised to look closely at the deal because of concerns that it would create a satellite radio monopoly. House Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell, a Democrat from Michigan, said yesterday that he planned his own inquiry in to the deal. The Senate Judiciary Committee's Antitrust Subcommittee also may to hold a hearing."

The Politico (3/1, By:, Glass) reports, "An overflow crowd of industry executives, lawyers and lobbyists packed the hearing room in the House Rayburn Office Building as Karmazin, one of five witnesses, debated the merits of letting his money-losing company combine with XM Radio in a deal that has been valued at $13 billion. … The two firms contend there is more competition for listeners now than when the original satellite licenses were granted. Whether or not the merger goes through, he added, satellite radio, with its 14 million customers, will continue to compete with an increasing array of audio outlets, including AM, FM and multi-channel HD radio, the Internet and a host of download-based music players, such as Apple's iPod." The Politico adds, "Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Tex.), the ranking member on the full committee, noted that 'we are at the beginning of a long process,' a point echoed by Karmazin during his own remarks." The Politico adds, "Some of the most pointed exchanges occurred not with the members but at the long witness table between Karmazin and Mark Cooper, research director of the Consumer Federation of America, an advocacy group. Cooper held that, 'The argument that consumers will be better off with a benevolent monopolist than competition is absurd. Cost savings will not be passed to consumers. It is competition that is the driver of innovation in this economy, and competition is the best form of protection for consumers.' … Karmazin said his people had told him not to get excited and to keep his hands folded at the table. But Cooper, he felt, had gone too far. The monopoly charge, he said, 'is the most bizarre thing I've ever heard… We are not looking to bankrupt our companies. We are not doing anything that stupid. And we'll give back some of that saving (to our customers)'"

The AP (3/1) reports, "When satellite radio was licensed a decade ago, Sirius and XM were granted the only two licenses. In exchange, Federal Communications Commission rules stated that the two wouldn't be allowed to merge in the future. … Sirius and XM have argued that in the ensuing 10 years, the market has changed substantially and they are no longer just competing against each other."

Corporate Attorneys Seek More Clarity In Antitrust Law. The Legal Times (3/1) reports, "Top lawyers for General Electric Co. and Eastman Kodak Co. told federal regulators last month that companies need more clarity in antitrust laws when it comes to the sale of products bundled in a discounted package deal, and to the sale of services and parts for a product. … 'Companies are concerned that the rules aren't clear,' Ronald Stern, vice president and senior counsel for antitrust at General Electric, said in an interview after the hearing." The Times continues, "Testifying in Chicago at a panel organized by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division, the attorneys said regulators should help companies better understand when they might be stepping over the antitrust line in the two areas. … Previous court rulings have left the law ambiguous on when corporate behavior may violate Section 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act and make companies vulnerable to lawsuits by competitors, the lawyers said. … They encouraged the agencies to file amicus briefs in court cases or to issue additional guidelines to make the law clearer. … 'These two areas are a clear problem for companies like Kodak,' Patrick Sheller, the chief compliance officer at Eastman Kodak, said in an interview after the hearing." The Times notes< "David Balto, a former Federal Trade Commission policy director and a lawyer in Washington, agreed that amicus briefs could shed light on how companies are expected to follow the law, especially because most antitrust decisions occur in lower courts. … The price-bundling issue has come up in the courts more frequently than the aftermarket issue and therefore has created greater potential for liability, said Herbert Hovenkamp, an antitrust professor at University of Iowa College of Law. … Sheller told the panel that the line between the legal 'bundling' of products and the illegal 'tying' of products has been blurred."

House Bill Would Stiffen Penalties For Gas Price Gouging. The AP (3/1, Hebert) reports, "Although gasoline prices have dropped sharply from last summer, 79 lawmakers sought to send a message Wednesday, introducing a bill that would impose stiff penalties on oil and gas companies for price gouging." The AP continues, "With prices at the pump rebounding in recent weeks, Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said he's worried 'this summer prices may once again exceed $3 a gallon.' … The bill introduced by Stupak and 78 other members of the House would establish the first federal law against price gouging by oil and gas companies, imposing criminal penalties and fines of up to $150 million for corporations and $2 million on individuals. … The House passed a similar bill last year, but it died in the Senate." The AP adds, "The Federal Trade Commission would be given authority to investigate price gouging in the sale of crude oil, home heating oil, propane and natural gas. … 'The FTC has never brought a gas price gouging case to court,' said Stupak. … In fact, the agency has no authority to do so since there is no federal energy price gouging law. FTC investigations into crude oil or gasoline pricing have focused on whether companies have colluded in violation of antitrust laws." The AP notes, "Last year, FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said a federal law against oil company price gouging would be difficult to enforce and could hurt consumers by causing fuel shortages. … She said price gouging is difficult to define and courts have refused to address the question of what is a "reasonable" price in a free market. She maintained it may be difficult to determine what price hikes are legitimate."

DOJ Subpoenas Genworth Financial Unit In Bid-Rigging Probe. Market Watch (3/1, Boessenkool) reports, "Genworth Financial Inc. disclosed Wednesday that a subsidiary received two subpoenas in November related to probes into the sale of guaranteed investment contracts to municipalities." Market Watch continues, "The subpoenas, a grand jury subpoena from the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Justice Department and a subpoena from the Securities and Exchange Commission, require the unit to turn over information related to investigations into alleged bid-rigging involving the sale of the investment contracts, according to Genworth's annual report filed with the SEC. … Genworth said it doesn't issue these contracts to municipalities. But the insurance company said that from January 2004 to December 2006, the subsidiary provided management and administrative services to a third party that does issue the contracts to municipalities. … Genworth said it plans to cooperate fully with the investigations."

Terex Receives DOJ Subpoena On Equipment Pricing. Market Watch (3/1, Kowsmann) reports, "Terex Corp. disclosed Wednesday that it received subpoenas from the U.S. Department of Justice over some equipment pricing." Market Watch continues, "In its annual report filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Westport, Conn., the manufacturer said the subpoenas relate to the DOJ's investigation into pricing practices in the rock crushing and screening equipment industry. … Terex said it cooperating fully with the investigation. It didn't provide further information."

Marks & Spencer's CEO Mulls Sainsbury Bid. Bloomberg (3/1, Craven, Couch) reports, "Marks & Spencer Group Plc Chief Executive Officer Stuart Rose said he's considering bidding for J Sainsbury Plc, Britain's third-biggest supermarket chain." Bloomberg continues, "Rose, who runs the U.K.'s largest clothing retailer, said he was speaking to customers about an offer for Sainsbury, which has a market value of 8.8 billion pounds ($17 billion). 'You do get quite an interesting response,' he said in a presentation to a London conference held by Retail Week magazine today." Bloomberg adds, "His remarks follow three weeks of speculation that Marks may seek to buy Sainsbury to create a retailer with more than 1,000 outlets. An offer may spark a bidding war with CVC Capital Partners Ltd., Blackstone Group LP and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., which said Feb. 2 they were considering an offer for Sainsbury in what would be Europe's biggest buyout. … 'Assets like this don't come on the market very often,' Rose said today. 'The company is effectively in play. Your shareholders would think you were an idiot if you didn't consider it. Watch this space.'" Bloomberg notes, "Marks said in an e-mailed statement following Rose's remarks that its board had considered bidding for Sainsbury and didn't intend to make an offer 'at this time.' The retailer said it reserved the right to announce a bid or possible bid within the next six months if Sainsbury's board recommends an offer or if a 'firm' approach by the CVC group or another suitor is made."

A&P Parent Negotiating Pathmark Purchase. Market Watch (3/1, Moore) reports, "Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. said it is negotiating to acquire smaller rival Pathmark Stores Inc., as A&P looks to expand its footprint in the competitive supermarket industry. … Under the terms of the proposed deal, announced Tuesday, Pathmark shareholders would receive $12.50 a share in cash and stock." Market Watch continues, "Shares of both companies fell in midday trading Wednesday, after moving sharply higher ahead of the announcement. Pathmark shares were down 2% at $11.71, while A&P saw its shares drop 3.4% to $32.03. … The Montvale, N.J., company , which operates A&P, Waldbaum's and Food Emporium, said no final agreement has been reached. The sale would require shareholder and regulatory approvals, including federal and state antitrust clearances. … 'We have long held that consolidation in the market was necessary and that Pathmark and A&P made the most logical choice for a combination,' Bear Stearns analyst Westcott Rochette wrote in a note to clients, after raising the year-end price target on A&P to $40." Market Watch adds,

"Based on the number of shares outstanding when Pathmark reported its third-quarter results, the deal is valued at about $651 million. … Goldman Sachs analyst John Heinbockel said the proposed deal makes sense, but warned against too much optimism. … 'We continue to believe that the combination, while likely to unlock significant cost take-out synergies, carries certain risks,' Heinbockel said. 'These would include systems conversions, banner changes, and the execution of a much-needed, stepped-up capital program.' … News of the negotiations comes as grocery stores are struggling to compete with high-end specialty operators, including Whole Foods Markets Inc. , Trader Joe's and Wegman's, as well as discount giants such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. Last week, Wild Oats Markets Inc. agreed to be acquired by larger rival Whole Foods. See archived story."

Oracle Expected To Announce Acquisition Of Hyperion. The New York Times (3/1, Sorkin, De La Merced) reports, "Oracle is near a deal to acquire Hyperion Solutions, which makes software that allows corporations to analyze and track their performance, for more than $3.1 billion, according to people briefed on the deal. … The acquisition is expected to be announced as early as today, these people said." The Times continues, "The deal would be the latest trophy in a lengthy string of acquisitions by Oracle, the database software giant that has been struggling to grow from within … In December, Oracle posted strong earnings growth for its second fiscal quarter, but its growth in license sales disappointed investors. The company said at the time that it had failed to close some crucial licensing deals during the quarter. License sales rose 28 percent in the quarter, but that was down from 80 percent growth in the previous quarter." The Times adds, "Oracle has long been known as one of the most aggressive acquirers of technology companies. … Led by Lawrence J. Ellison, who sees acquisitions as a tool for growth, the company has at times seemed on the verge of gobbling nearly every rival in the business software market. In the last three years, Oracle spent more than $20 billion on acquisitions, including buying two of its most formidable competitors, PeopleSoft and Siebel. … PeopleSoft, the company Oracle fought over for nearly two years, was its most notable deal. … In December 2004, after a battle for control that grew nasty, Oracle finally acquired PeopleSoft for about $10.3 billion, becoming the second-largest maker of business-management software. … The day after completing the deal, Oracle fired four top officers of PeopleSoft. … Since that deal, Oracle's appetite has been unsatiated. In 2005, the company bought a stake in I-flex Solutions, a maker of financial software based in Mumbai, India, for a reported $909 million."

Record Industry Targets College Students In Piracy Crackdown. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Chmielewski, Puzzanghera) reports, "If they don't quit illegally downloading music, some USC students may end up having to fight on … in court." The Times continues, "The record industry's main trade group said Wednesday that it was mailing letters to 20 of the school's students whom it had identified as bootleggers. … The letters warn that an expensive lesson awaits if the students don't stop the practice. Settle, the dispatches say, or be sued." The Times adds, "The mailings are part of a stepped-up legal fight by the Recording Industry Assn. of America against music downloading amid indications of a dramatic increase in the number of songs exchanged illegally via the Internet. … The association said that overall it was sending 400 warning letters to students at 13 universities and that it expected to sue several thousand students. … 'We'd rather not be doing these lawsuits … but the fact remains that the college environment is one that has rampant piracy,' said association Chairman Mitch Bainwol."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/1, B5) reports, "The move comes as the industry seeks to stamp out what it is says is rampant music piracy on campuses. … The group intends to send hundreds of such pre-litigation letters to university computer users every month. … 'The theft of music remains unacceptably high and undermines the industry's ability to invest in new music,' said Mitch Bainwol, chairman and CEO of the association. 'This is especially the case on college campuses.' … The letters targeted students at Arizona State University, Marshall University, North Carolina State University, North Dakota State University, Northern Illinois University, Ohio University, Syracuse University, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, University of Nebraska, Lincoln, University of South Florida, University of Southern California, University of Tennessee, Knoxville, and University of Texas, Austin."

Northeast Power Producers To Merge. Bloomberg (3/1, Polson) reports, "Astoria Generating Co. and EBG Holdings, closely held owners of power plants in New York City and Boston, said they will merge in a move designed to capitalize on rising regional power demand and limited supply." Bloomberg continues, "The newly formed entity, U.S. Power Generating Co., will be run from New York by Astoria Chief Executive Officer Jacob Worenklein, the companies said today. Hedge funds that own EBG will get 54 percent of the closely held company. Astoria owners, including Madison Dearborn Partners LP and the Hunt Oil family, will get 46 percent. Other details of the agreement weren't disclosed. … The combined value of the plants held by the two companies may be worth $4.25 billion to $5 billion, analysts said. Combined output will be about 5,000 megawatts." Bloomberg notes, "Astoria Generating's three plants supply 20 percent of New York City's power supply and EBG's five plants meet half the electricity needs of Boston, the companies said. U.S. Power Generating expects to benefit from tariffs regulators plan to impose on power customers to encourage costly construction of plants and power lines as both metropolitan areas grow. … Rising electricity demand and planned plant retirements may leave the New York City area short of generating capacity needed to meet demand on the hottest days as early as next year, the New York Independent System Operator, which runs the state's power grid, said in August."

EU To Probe European Central Bank Settlement Platform. The Financial Times (3/1, Buck) reports, "A controversial plan by the European Central Bank to set up and operate a new system for settling share and bond trades in the European Union will come under close scrutiny by the region's top antitrust watchdog." The Times continues, "In an unusual move that adds to the uncertainty surrounding the new regime, the European Commission told EU finance ministers this month that the central bank was not exempt from antitrust laws. … It also told them that the Commission's competition department would carefully examine the so-called Target 2 Securities system - a process that could delay the introduction of the new platform." The Times adds, "Though the Commission does not have concrete concerns at this stage, a probe would most likely focus on whether the ECB system constituted a restrictive business practice or an abuse of monopoly power in violation of EU antitrust rules. … 'Economic activities are subject to competition law irrespective of whether they are undertaken by private companies or by public authorities and other institutions,' the spokesman for Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, said. 'We have informed the financial services committee [the body that prepares meetings of EU finance ministers] that the ECB is not exempt from competition rules.' … He added: 'The ECB proposal has not been finalised, and we would not necessarily find the system incompatible with EU competition rules. It could turn out to be pro-competitive. But we would want to examine it carefully.'"

EU Clears Sale Of BAWAG To Cerberus Group. The AP (3/1) reports, "EU regulators on Wednesday cleared the sale of Austria's BAWAG, the troubled bank linked to collapsed commodities broker Refco, to a consortium headed by private equity fund Cerberus Capital Management." The AP continues, "The European Commission automatically cleared the deal after identifying no antitrust problems and receiving no complaints from rivals within a deadline of 25 working days. … Cerberus and others agreed in December to pay 3.2 billion euros ($4.23 billion) for the bank, Austria's fifth largest." The AP adds, "The bank's current owner, trade union federation OeGB, will get 2.6 billion euros ($3.44 billion) of that with the rest serving as an injection of capital for BAWAG P.S.K. … The consortium -- which includes Wuestenrot, the Austrian branch of Assicurazioni Generali SpA, Oesterreichische Post and a small group of industrialists linked to Hannes Androsch, a former Austrian finance minister -- plans to expand the bank throughout Europe. … BAWAG, formally known as the Bank Fuer Arbeit und Wirtschaft AG, lost more than a billion dollars in soured currency speculation deals in the Caribbean and has been under investigation for loaning Phillip Bennet, the former CEO of Refco Inc., several hundred million dollars just before the brokerage filed for bankruptcy protection last year."

Patent Dispute Between Broadcom And Qualcomm Continues. The Orange County (CA) Register (3/1, Gittelsohn) reports, "The semiconductor giants settled four patent disputes out of court last week, but are far from resolving other property battles, attorneys for both companies said in interviews with the Orange County Register on Tuesday." The Register continues, "Broadcom Corp. and Qualcomm Inc. settled four patent disputes out of court last week, but the Southern California semiconductor giants are far from resolving their antitrust and intellectual property battles, attorneys for both companies said in interviews with the Orange County Register on Tuesday. … 'That was just a piecemeal separate peace,' said Lou Lupin, executive vice president and general counsel for Qualcomm, the San Diego telecom chipmaker." The Register adds, "Broadcom and Qualcomm still have five outstanding patent infringement cases and three antitrust actions in U.S. federal courts, the European Community and South Korea. One of the next cases is scheduled for opening arguments in federal court in Santa Ana in May. … In addition, Broadcom still has 12 patent disputes against Qualcomm, and Qualcomm still has six against Broadcom, said David Rosmann, Broadcom's vice president for intellectual property litigation. 'It's just a paring down,' he said." The Register notes, "Irvine-based Broadcom launched the legal war in 2005 amid frustration over negotiating licensing agreements for technology in 3G or WCDMA mobile phones, a new generation of phones that perform multiple tasks such as transmitting high speed video. Qualcomm pioneered the technology that became the industry standard. … In its antitrust cases, Broadcom argues that Qualcomm wants to monopolize the next generation of mobile phones by charging excessive royalties. Broadcom's attorneys say Qualcomm employed the same tactic to control more than 90 percent of the chips in the current generation of mobile phones used by such companies as AT&T, Sprint and Verizon."

Writer Argues Against "Big Is Bad" Attitude In Antitrust Law. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (3/1), Cécile Philippe, director general of Institut économique Molinari, a think tank in Brussels and Paris, writes, "The world's No. 1 chipmaker, Intel, has been the target of a series of antitrust probes and lawsuits around the globe. Among them is a five-year investigation by the European Commission that has included raids on the company's European offices and may yet lead to formal legal proceedings. Japan's Fair Trade Commission has already condemned Intel for 'unfair' practices and urged it to change its ways. Authorities in South Korea and the U.S. are also probing the California-based company. … The concomitant nature of these cases owes nothing to serendipity. They were all triggered following antitrust complaints filed by Intel's arch-rival, Advanced Micro Devices Inc. AMD alleges that Intel's practice of inviting its major customers to sign exclusive contracts in exchange for significant rebates and discounts is anticompetitive. In the European Commission, AMD has an audience that has been sympathetic to such accusations before, as in the cases of the pharmaceutical firm Hoffmann-Roche in 1979 or the tire manufacturer Michelin in 2003." Philippe continues, "These commercial tactics are actually common practice. Intel's case, however, is allegedly different in that the firm enjoys a 'dominant position' in the market for microprocessors, with 80% of sales by unit volume. It is because of this 'dominant' status that competition regulators might regard Intel's practices with suspicion and ordain that it end them. … The legal premise is that a company with such a large market share can use its size to put competitors out of business, perhaps by lowering its prices to a point at which they cannot compete, and then foist higher prices upon helpless customers. The soundness of this theory is debatable even on philosophical grounds -- if the new monopolist suddenly raises prices, why would its old competitors not get back into the game? -- but there is empirical evidence that Intel's practices have not made it immune to competition." Philippe argues that "there's an inherent contradiction in this 'big is bad' application of competition law. Firms are allowed to use certain practices in order to grow their business and reach the top of their industry. But then, suddenly, these practices become illegal once their goal has been achieved. How can this be right? From an economic point of view, the intensity of competition should not be measured by market share alone. The most important thing is to see that entry into the market remains free -- that is, that regulatory measures do not impede companies from joining the fray. … In weighing Intel's business model and practices, it is vital that regulators leave room for the free play of competition and, even more important, let the market judge the management decisions of the different players in a given industry. There is no guarantee that Intel's strategy will prove to be the best one, especially if AMD or other firms provide better value to consumers. What is anticompetitive is the worrying trend of companies' asking regulators to level the playing field, rather than trying to win in the marketplace."

Federal Suit Seeks To Block Arizona Marina. The Arizona Republic (3/1, Wong) reports, "The owner of the lone marina at Lake Pleasant sued two high-ranking federal officials in U.S. District Court Tuesday in an effort to halt construction of a new marina at the far north Peoria lake." The Republic continues, "Paradise Valley businessman David Maule-Ffinch and his Pensus Group filed suit against Robert W. Johnson, commissioner of the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation, and Dirk Kempthorne, secretary of the U.S. Department of the Interior. … The lawsuit came on the same day the $20 million marina cleared its largest bureaucratic hurdle. Reclamation officials on Tuesday said they determined Scorpion Bay Marina & Yacht Harbor would have no significant impact on the environment and that the agency would not undertake a complete environmental review of the project." The Republic adds, "In his 13-page suit, Maule-Ffinch claimed that Reclamation — the arm of the Interior Department that owns Lake Pleasant and other waterways — broke federal law when it failed to require that Maricopa County conduct a competitive bidding process for the construction and management of the new marina. … A provision in a 2002 request for proposal banned Pensus and other potential bidders that had any business interests next to or around Lake Pleasant Regional Park, which the county manages. … 'The Bureau of Reclamation has an independent duty to make sure a federal asset is given out to a profit-making organization who has complied with all of the rules,' Andrew Federhar, an attorney for Maule-Ffinch and Pensus, said Wednesday. 'We don't believe (Reclamation) ensured this federal asset is being appropriately used.'" The Republic notes, "Maule-Ffinch filed a similar suit last April in Maricopa County Superior Court against the county and Lake Pleasant Marina Partners, a limited liability group of investors in the project. The court decided not to hear the case; neither did the state appellate court upon appeal. … Bruce Ellis, who heads the Reclamation division that issued a draft environmental review of Scorpion Bay, said he had no comment about the federal suit. A spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice said the agency has not been served and would not have any comment until it reviews the matter."

fired power plant appeared to get a green light for construction from a federal judge Tuesday." The A-S continues, "The plant had been held up by legal challenges from environmental groups and, for a period, the federal Department of Justice. … But in November, the federal government offered a settlement that would allow Alcoa Inc. and TXU Corp. to use an old permit at the site instead of having to apply for a new, stricter permit." The A-S adds, "The settlement offer, approved by U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks in Austin late Tuesday, eases a deal between the aluminum giant and the state's largest energy company for control of the plant, which powers an aluminum smelting operation in Rockdale, about 60 miles northeast of Austin. … The plant's new unit, known as Sandow 5, is one of three coal-fired units TXU proposes to build. Plans for eight other units were withdrawn after the company was approached in a $45 billion buyout deal last week. … The unit, slated to come online in 2009, will have 581 megawatts of capacity, or enough to power 300,000 homes." The A-S notes, "Citizens and environmental groups accused Alcoa in a lawsuit of illegally releasing more than 1 million tons of air pollution from the plant during a 17-year period. … As part of the settlement reached in 2003, Alcoa was required to pay a $1.5 million fine, spend $2.5 million on environmental mitigation projects in Central Texas and replace its three coal-powered generating units at the plant with a single cleaner-burning, coal-powered unit by 2007."

The AP (3/1) reports, "The Justice Department had joined environmental and citizen groups in challenging plans for the new plant. But the government came to terms with Alcoa and TXU in November, and on Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks approved the settlement. … The Rockdale plant is one of three Texas coal-fired units proposed by TXU. Private equity firms working to buy TXU said earlier this week that they would scrap plans for eight other proposed coal plants." The AP adds, "Opponents of the Rockdale plant had sued Alcoa alleging the company released illegal amounts of air pollution from the plant during a 17-year period. … Alcoa reached a settlement with the groups in 2003 that required Alcoa to pay fines, spend millions on environmental cleanup and replace its three coal units with a single cleaner unit by 2007."

EPA IG Says Defunct Nonprofit Should Return Federal Funds. Bloomberg (2/28, Roland) reports a government audit has concluded that the nonprofit America's Clean Water Foundation, which "sponsored national clean-water events with the Smithsonian Institution before shutting down over accounting irregularities," should return $25.2 million in EPA grant funds. The EPA Inspector General said the group "overstated costs" on EPA grants and "failed to keep appropriate records." EPA Grants Administrator Richard Kuhlman said the foundation "failed for years to detect an employee's $500,000 embezzlement of its funds." The FBI "has been investigating the crime, he said. FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman declined to comment. It also failed to document its expenses, didn't have its books audited for three years, and awarded all its contracts without competition among potential bidders, the audit said."

Energy Department Launches Cellulosic Ethanol Effort. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "The Department of Energy has kicked off a technological horse race to see which among six companies can produce a transportation fuel that is an alternative to corn-based ethanol, in commercial quantities, at a cost of around $1 a gallon. Companies successful in producing low-cost ethanol could have first crack at a new fuel market that offers a domestic alternative to gasoline." Until then, DOE "says it will pony up as much as $385 million to help the competitors ... . 'This effort is a big deal,' said Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, who estimated that the companies will commit a total of at least $1.2 billion to their ventures." Because "Congress has been slow in appropriating the agency's budget, an additional prize, promised by a $2 billion loan-guarantee program, has yet to be established." Congress "approved aiding makers of so-called cellulosic ethanol in the Energy Policy Act of 2005. ... President Bush has since made the program part of his goal to introduce 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels into the transportation sector."

The New York Times (3/1, Barrionuevo, 1.16M) reports, "Dozens of ethanol refineries that use corn are planned for construction over the next two years. But Mr. Bodman acknowledged yesterday that corn alone would not be enough to achieve the ambitious goal of taming what Mr. Bush has called America's 'oil addiction.'" The Times adds, "Ethanol made from corn has a small effect on greenhouse gases, but ethanol from cellulose cuts those gases sharply."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

"Operation Imperial Emperor" Nets Dozens Of Arrests, Tons Of Drugs. There are nearly 200 media references to arrests and drug seizures made in connection with Operation Imperial Emperor. Most reports cite the AP story. The AP (3/1) reports that dozens of people "accused of working for a Mexican drug cartel were arrested Wednesday in a multistate bust that has netted more than $45 million in cash and tons of cocaine, heroin and marijuana. At least some of the drugs were carried over the U.S.-Mexico border on a bridge made from sandbags partially submerged in the Colorado River outside of Yuma, Ariz.," according to authorities. … The 20-month sting, code-named 'Operation

Imperial Emperor,' so far has swept up 402 of the cartel's suspected lieutenants and foot soldiers, including 66 on Wednesday who were arrested in California, Arizona and Illinois." The AP adds, "Among the cache collected by the Drug Enforcement Administration were 27,229 pounds of marijuana; 9,512 pounds of cocaine; 705 pounds of methamphetamine; 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine, or 'ice;' 11 pounds of heroin; $6.1 million in property and assets; and an estimated 100 weapons and 94 vehicles." FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Houston Chronicle, Denver Post, Kansas City Star, and Boston Globe are among the news outlets that used the AP story.

The Washington Times (3/1, Seper) reports, "A long-term federal investigation into a Mexican drug-trafficking organization and its U.S.-based distribution cells has resulted in more than 400 arrests nationwide, including 66 who were taken into custody yesterday in California, Arizona, New York and Illinois." Rusty Payne said the investigation "accounted for $6.1 million in property and assets, as well as 100 weapons and 94 vehicles." The Times reports Karen Tandy said, "The Cazares-Gastellum drug empire that rose to such heights of power in only two years, fell today at the hands of DEA and our partners. This sprawling drug domain, headquartered in Mexico, penetrated deep into all corners of this country."

USA Today (3/1, Leinwand) reports federal agents "arrested 66 people Wednesday in a multi-city sweep of an alleged drug ring that is accused of bringing five tons of cocaine a month into the USA. The Drug Enforcement Administration said leaders of the Cazares drug operation, headquartered in Mexico, have been indicted on charges of laundering money and trafficking in massive amounts of cocaine, marijuana and methamphetamine from Colombia, Venezuela and Mexico." The investigation "began in 2005 when federal agents in Imperial County, Calif., stopped a pickup packed with marijuana, the DEA said. The find led federal agents to Victor Cazares-Gastellum, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said." USA Today reports court papers indicate Cazares and his operatives "moved cocaine from Venezuela and Colombia through Central America and into Mexicali."

Bloomberg (3/1, Schmidt) reports the investigation "targeted the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum cartel, which supplied cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana across the U.S." Bloomberg reports Karen Tandy said, "Today we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure."

The AP (3/1, Spagat) reports, "Dozens of people accused of working for a Mexican drug cartel were arrested Wednesday in a multistate bust that has netted more than $45 million in cash and tons of cocaine, heroin and marijuana, federal officials said." The AP continues, "At least some of the drugs were carried over the U.S.-Mexico border on a bridge made from sandbags partially submerged in the Colorado River outside of Yuma, Ariz., authorities said. All the narcotics were sneaked into the country through the porous Southwest border exploited by cartel kingpin Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum, they said. … The 20-month sting, code-named 'Operation Imperial Emperor,' so far has swept up 402 of the cartel's suspected lieutenants and foot soldiers, including 66 on Wednesday who were arrested in California, Arizona and Illinois. … 'Today's operation is a serious blow to one of the largest and most significant trafficking organizations,' said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a news conference in San Diego." The AP adds, "Cazares-Gastellum, also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar, was indicted in the sting but remains in Mexico and was not arrested, officials said. … Authorities said the cartel employed U.S. citizens and Mexican nationals, who distributed the drugs in 23 states. They will face either federal or state charges."

Fox News (3/1, Porteus) reports, "The organization has also laundered millions of dollars generated from this illegal activity, according to the Justice Department. … 'Today's actions deal a significant blow to the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, whose members are accused of importing and distributing multi-ton quantities of cocaine and other illicit drugs to communities across the country on a monthly basis,' Gonzales said. 'These arrests demonstrate what can be achieved when domestic and international law enforcement partners team up against a common foe.'" Fox News notes, "Federal or state charges were unsealed Wednesday morning against 139 defendants in California, Arizona, Illinois and New York. … The 20-month investigation led by the Drug Enforcement Administration and aided by more than 100 federal, state, local and foreign law enforcement agencies, has so far resulted in the seizure of approximately $45.2 million, 27,229 pounds of marijuana, 9,512 pounds of cocaine, 705 pounds of methamphetamine, 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine or 'ice,' and 11 pounds of heroin. … The investigation has also netted $6.1 million in property and assets, as well as roughly 100 weapons and 94 vehicles. The drug ring is based in Sinaloa, Mexico."

California Newspaper Coverage. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/28, Martinez) reported the ring "supplied cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana monthly to its distributors by air, land and sea. Officials said it also laundered millions of dollars profited from the drug trafficking. … The investigation resulted in the federal indictment of 19 individuals in federal court in San Diego. Those indicted include Mexican nationals and others with residences in Calexico and El Centro, officials said." The Union-Tribune says the organization "acquired drugs from Colombia and Venezuela to Central America, then smuggled them into the United States from Mexico. Once in the U.S., the drugs were broken down into smaller shipments in such cities as Los Angeles and San Diego and disseminated to distribution cells in various states."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (3/1) today reports, "A little-known Mexican drug trafficking organization, which operated without the notoriety of more violent rivals like the Arellano Félix gang, was taken down yesterday during a multistate bust announced in San Diego." The Union-Tribune quotes Karen Tandy saying, "Today we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure ... and tossed it into the dustbin of history." The Union-Tribune adds, "In San Diego – the base of the drug distribution network – five suspected Cazares cartel members were arrested yesterday in Otay Mesa and Paradise Hills at homes and a business, and agents seized three guns and five vehicles, said DEA Special Agent Dan Simmons. Fourteen others were taken into custody in the Imperial Valley, with $50,000 and 17 vehicles seized, Simmons said."

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/28) reported, "The investigation -- spearheaded by the DEA's Oakland office and dubbed 'Operation Imperial Emperor' -- targeted drug distribution cells and money-laundering networks of an organization led by Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar of Mexico, the DEA said. … The case began in February 2006 when DEA agents identified a number of Bay Area residents as having ties to an international ring. … Investigators served search warrants in Tracy, King City, Modesto, Fairfield, Pinole, Hayward and San Leandro."

The Contra Costa Times (2/28) reported a Pinole man "was among dozens arrested in a nationwide investigation of a Mexico-based drug cartel in which more than $45 million worth cocaine, methamphetamine, heroin, and marijuana were seized. Luis Manuel Sanchez-Aceves, 26, of Pinole, was among nine people arrested statewide, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Arizona Newspaper Coverage. The Arizona Republic (3/1) reports seven drug-smuggling suspects "were arrested and about $12 million worth of narcotics was seized in Arizona as part of a nationwide crackdown aimed at a Mexican smuggling cartel that crisscrossed the sand dunes near Yuma and built a submerged bridge across the Colorado River to avoid law enforcement. Ramona Sanchez, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman in Phoenix, said seizures in the Yuma area included 28,000 pounds of marijuana, 93 pounds of cocaine, 4 pounds of methamphetamine and about 2 pounds of heroin. … The enforcement in Arizona was tied to a nationwide campaign known as Operation Imperial Emperor, directed against a cartel headed by Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum, identified by the Justice Department as an international drug kingpin."

The Yuma (AZ) Sun (3/1) reports forty agents "executed eight search warrants at residences in Yuma, Somerton and San Luis, Ariz., arresting five people on federal charges and two on state charges. The seven men operated in two separate distribution cells here for the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Liz Barrick. … The DEA was proclaiming victory over the drug ring after Wednesday's operation, known as Operation Imperial Emperor."

TV Coverage. On its Web site, ABC News (2/28) reports investigators "claim the smugglers stashed drugs and money in hidden compartments in cars and trucks, as well as in toys and musical instruments. In an aggressive move, the smugglers built a bridge made of sand bags across the Colorado River near Yuma, Ariz., which allowed them to simply drive across the waterway. … Tandy said the Cazares Organization rose to power quickly, but by attacking the agency where it hurt the most, the government was able to cripple the cartel."

On its Web site, Fox News (2/28, Porteus) reports, "Justice special agent-in-charge Steven Robertson told FOXNews.com. 'This organization had cells, which are little distribution sub-groups based throughout the U.S.' Robertson, who said the bust is the largest in about a decade in terms of amount of drugs and assets seized, as well as number of arrests, said law enforcement is seeing a disturbing new trend in the world of narcotics. In the past, meth was cooked in small toxic labs here in the United States, 'where literally you could cook it on a hotplate in your apartment,' Robertson said. … Drug cartels are cooking meth in what are called 'super labs' outside of the country, then smuggling the drugs into the United States through regular smuggling routes along the southern border."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/28, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "We have an exclusive look at an early-morning raid by drug enforcement agents in Los Angeles. The targets are members a vicious drug cartel based in Mexico." Reporter: "As the city of angels sleep, the DEA is gearing up. Final preparations for an early-morning raid on a suspected U.S. Branch of a lethal Mexican drug cartel. CNN was granted exclusive access." Reporter: "Silently the team moves in. Surrounds a house in East L.A. It's a scenario simultaneously playing out in 15 cities from southern California to Chicago. The culmination of nearly two years of investigative work. … Including today's raid, the DEA says this investigation has netted more than 700 pounds of meth, 4,000 kilograms of cocaine, 27,000 of pounds of marijuana, and more than $45 million in cold hard cash. The man allegedly responsible for getting those drugs into the United States, Victor Emilio Salazar. Indicted by a grand jury, he's believed to be in Mexico."

NBC SanDiego.com (2/28) reports, "Feds targeted the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, a rival to the Arellano Felix Cartel. Cazares-Gastellum, also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar, was indicted in the sting but not arrested. … The DEA believes most of the drugs were smuggled across the border from Mexicali using vehicles with hidden compartments as opposed to drug tunnels."

KPBS, San Diego (2/28) reports on its Web site that federal authorities "arrested 66 people in California and other states Wednesday in connection with a Mexican drug-smuggling cartel. Law enforcement authorities say the alleged cartel leader remains at large. … Federal court documents say the cocaine-smuggling cartel rose to power in Mexico during the last two years."

BBC News (3/1) reports, "The authorities in the United States say they have arrested more than 400 people and seized 18 tons of drugs. … The news comes as the United Nations reported that Mexican cartels now dominate drugs trafficking in the US."

Pharmacists, Athletes, Celebrities Accused In Investigation Of Fraudulent Internet Drug Sales.

Reporting on an Orlando pharmacy raid continues, now with more than 650 media references to the raid reported to be linked to a long-term investigation into illegal steroid and human growth hormone sales. The New York Times (3/1) today reports the "arrests of four people in Florida on Tuesday and the indictments of at least six doctors around the country linked to a pharmacy in Orlando, Fla., present striking evidence that authorities in several states have opened a new front in the war against illegal online sales of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs. Albany County prosecutors, working with federal investigators and Florida officials, have linked 11 doctors to the pharmacy. Six face felony charges that they wrote prescriptions to patients they had never met." The arrests in Florida, which "involved at least 20 branch offices of state, local and federal law enforcement agencies, were only one prong of a series of overlapping investigations into the underworld of Internet drug sales."

The Albany (NY) Times Union (2/28, Iorizzo) reported Tuesday's raid of an Orlando, Fla., pharmacy "accused of trafficking performance-enhancing drugs over the Internet may prove to be one of the most significant steroids busts in history," according to a leading expert. Sources "said the investigation…revealed that Signature Pharmacy customers included several former and current professional athletes. Among those linked to the company were former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley and a team doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers."

The Orlando Sentinel (2/28) reported the four people "arrested as part of a raid on two Orlando pharmacies face a court appearance on Thursday morning." The Sentinel adds, "Central Florida's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Internal Revenue Service, New York State Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement and other federal and state health and law-enforcement agencies participated in the daylong search at Signature Compounding Pharmacy."

In Orlando, McClatchy Newspapers (2/28) reported, "With BALCO still churning on the West Coast, a new front on the steroid war opened in the East on Tuesday when law-enforcement officers raided two Orlando pharmacies and seized steroids, human growth hormone and records that could connect those drugs to dozens of athletes. In a raid led by the Albany (N.Y.) County District Attorney's office, officers from several Florida and national agencies arrested four employees of Signature Compounding Pharmacies Tuesday and charged them in an alleged scheme to provide steroids and growth hormone over the Internet. … Several raids and arrests were pending, one source close to the investigation said, adding, 'This is really the first of two waves.'"

In a widely reported story, the AP (3/1) writes, "The West Coast had BALCO. Now the East Coast could be in the midst of its own steroid scandal. An illicit steroid distribution network, which may be responsible for Internet sales of performance-enhancing drugs nationwide, has been targeted by an upstate New York prosecutor. Customers reportedly included Los Angeles Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield and former baseball star Jose Canseco."

In a separate story, the AP (3/1) writes, "Testing for performance-enhancing drugs can only go so far -- and nab so many people. Bring state and federal law-enforcement officials in, and it could change the landscape of the anti-doping fight. Illicit steroid distribution networks, which may be responsible for Internet sales of performance-enhancing drugs nationwide, have been targeted by prosecutors in upstate New York and Rhode Island." Testing may "expose athletes who cheat, but it does little to punish those who make, market and distribute performance-enhancing substances, let alone stop the flow of drugs. That's why these new investigations have the potential to be so significant." Authorities "are targeting those who supply steroids to big-name and no-name users alike across the country."

Sports Illustrated (3/1) writes, "Ironically, Holyfield's name does not appear in the law enforcement documents we reviewed. However, a patient by the name of 'Evan Fields' caught investigators' attention. 'Fields' shares the same birth date as Holyfield -- Oct. 19, 1962. … When we called the phone number that, according to the documents, was associated with the 'Fields' prescription, Holyfield answered." Sports Illustrated continues, "Rather than using the Internet and receiving the prescriptions through the mail, 'Fields' allegedly picked them up from a private Georgia urologist whose offices were raided as part of this ongoing investigation. But authorities tell us the drugs came from Applied Pharmacy, the Mobile, Ala., compound pharmacy the DEA raided last fall."

Report: Abuse Of Prescription Drugs Expected To Exceed Use Of Street Drugs. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/1, Fuoco) reports, "After treating more than 2,000 people for OxyContin addiction since 2000, Dr. Neil A. Capretto, Gateway Rehabilitation Center's medical director, wasn't surprised by the findings of the United Nations-affiliated International Narcotics Control Board that abuse of prescription drugs is about to exceed the use of illicit narcotics worldwide. … In a report yesterday, the International Narcotics Control Board said abuse of prescription drugs is about to exceed the use of illicit street narcotics worldwide. The shift has spawned a lethal new trade in counterfeit painkillers, sedatives and other medicines potent enough to kill."

The AP (3/1) reports, "In the United States alone, the abuse of painkillers, stimulants, tranquilizers and other prescription medications has gone beyond 'practically all illicit drugs with the exception of cannabis,' with users increasingly turning to them first, the Vienna-based group said. And unregulated markets in many countries make it easy for traffickers to peddle a wide variety of counterfeit drugs through courier services, ordinary mail and the Internet."

ATF Expands Bomb Training For Military Technicians. The Chicago Tribune (2/28, Zajac) reports, "Struggling for more effective responses to the suicide and roadside bombings that have wreaked havoc in Iraq and increasingly in Afghanistan, the Defense Department has beefed up an explosives training program with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." The Tribune continues, "Military bomb technicians will receive additional training in countering homemade explosives and in identifying bomb components after a blast, under the expanded program to be run in six sessions annually at the ATF's training center in Ft. A.P. Hill in Virginia." The Tribune adds, "About 180 technicians from all branches of the armed forces will be trained in a course that has been expanded to one week, according to Steven Beggs, ATF chief of explosives training. Previously, about 90 technicians, mostly from the Army, received three days of training." The Tribune notes, "Homemade roadside bombs, also called improvised explosive devices, have exacted a devastating toll on American troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. This month the government alleged that sophisticated variants of the devices used in Iraq are being supplied by a branch of Iran's armed forces. … Suicide bombs have been employed against both military forces and civilians. … A suicide bombing Tuesday at the gates of Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan killed at least 23 people, including two Americans. Vice President Dick Cheney was on the base at the time but was unharmed."

US Files New Charges Against Alabama Bomb Suspect. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (2/28, Kirby) reports, "A Flomaton (AL) man whose federal trial on bomb charges ended in a hung jury last month faces new charges under an indictment handed down last week by a grand jury in Mobile." The Press-Register continues, "At the January trial in U.S. District Court in Mobile, jurors could not agree about whether Gregory Wendell Nichols was guilty of possessing a bomb. The new federal indictment accuses him of two bomb-related charges formally known as possession of an unregistered firearm and making a firearm. … Nichols is scheduled to be arraigned on the charges today. … 'It is a separate offense to actually make a firearm,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Vicki Davis, who has taken over as lead prosecutor in the case." The Press-Register adds, "During Nichols' trial, senior federal appeals Judge Emmett 'Rip' Cox, who presided over the trial, dismissed one of two counts against the defendant -- possession of a firearm in violation of law -- on grounds that it duplicated the other charge, possession of an unregistered firearm. … 'They're just retreading the indictment,' said Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden, who added that his client intends to plead not guilty. 'A count was dismissed. Now, they're trying to add another one.'" The Press-Register notes, "Agents for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5 after getting a tip. Nichols permitted the agents to search his pickup truck; they reported finding five homemade explosive devices. … Nichols admitted that he made the devices using spent carbon dioxide cartridges from BB guns. He told jurors last month that he packed the cylindrical canisters -- which were about 2 inches long -- with a black powder substitute called Pyrodex. He then sealed it with plumber's tape and electrical tape, and attached a firecracker fuse."

Federal Judge Blasts Role Of Politics In Marshals Selection. The Boston Globe (3/1, Murphy) reports, "A federal judge in Boston has blasted the US Marshals Service as a "second rate" agency because it is headed by a patronage appointee, and called on Congress to 'professionalize' the law enforcement agency." The Globe continues, "Judge William G. Young , in an unusual addendum to a ruling in an employment discrimination case last week, went out of his way to criticize the way marshals are appointed throughout the country. … The appointees 'are all direct political patronage appointments. These are not executive department policy-making positions; they are vital law enforcement positions,' Young wrote. … 'Surely here in America direct command of law enforcement officers in harm's way could never be entrusted to political patronage appointees,' he wrote. 'How smug we are -- and how wrong.'"

The Globe adds, "Young's remarks were striking, in part because federal judges work closely with the marshals, who are responsible for securing courthouses, protecting judges, juries, witnesses, and other court officials. They also play a role in capturing fugitives and transporting prisoners. … Young wrote that it was unimaginable that another federal law enforcement agency, such as the FBI or the Drug Enforcement Agency, would put a political appointee in charge of a regional office. He said Congress has professionalized those agencies. … 'Until Congress does the same for the Marshals Service, it will always be considered a second rate political agency in the eyes of true professionals,' Young wrote." The Globe notes, "Traditionally, the marshal's job has gone to a prominent political figure from the same political party of the president in office. The White House has usually allowed local political figures in the 94 marshal districts to reach a consensus on a candidate for the job. … Reed Hillman , last year's unsuccessful Republican candidate for lieutenant governor and a former State Police commander, is expected to be nominated for the presidential appointment."

IMMIGRATION:

Rep. Rohrabacher Presents New Evidence In Shooting Involving Former Border Patrol Agents. The El Paso (TX) Times (2/28) reported, "Eight months after he was shot...by two former El Paso Border Patrol agents, a Mexican drug smuggler delivered $1 million worth of marijuana to a stash house in El Paso County, according to an investigative report by the Drug Enforcement Administration now in possession of a California congressman. U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., held a news conference in Washington, D.C. … and held a redacted copy of the document up for reporters." The Times says it "is not clear what the DEA report will mean for the agents as it is not directly related to the February shooting, but Rohrabacher said he smeared the character of the smuggler as the prosecution's star witness. Rohrabacher said that prosecutors ignored the DEA report to 'promote the false image of the smuggler' during trial."

The Fort Worth (TX) Star-Telegram (2/28, Montgomery) reported the "disclosure of the report, dated Oct. 25, 2005, sparked new demands for a congressional inquiry into the prosecution of agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Compean. Each of the agents was sentenced to more than a decade in prison for shooting Mexican national Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila in the buttocks after he abandoned a van loaded with marijuana near Fabens, outside El Paso. According to the previously sealed DEA report, Aldrete-Davila came to the attention of federal agents after being granted limited immunity to testify as the key witness against the two agents. … The DEA report, which began circulating on Capitol Hill on Wednesday, raised new questions about the government's handling of the case — particularly why Aldrete-Davila remained free after being tied to further trafficking activities."

The Washington Times (3/1, Seper) reports DEA documents, which "remain under seal, show that Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila was the focus of a drug investigation into his reported stashing of 750 pounds of marijuana in a van at a house in Clint, Texas, in November 2005 -- nine months after he was shot in the buttocks near Fabens, Texas, while running from agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean. … Mr. Rohrabacher's spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, confirmed yesterday that her boss had a copy of the reports but said he had no intention of disclosing information from them that could be damaging to an ongoing investigation. She said he sought only to establish Aldrete-Davila's suspected involvement in a second drug-smuggling incident."

Fox News (3/1) reports on its Web site that the DEA "found that Aldrete-Davila brought in another vanload of drugs into the United States while he waited to testify against the agents. Some reports say he stashed up to 750 pounds of marijuana at a house in Clint, Texas."

Gutierrez, Chertoff Say Bush Committed To Reforming Nation's Immigration System. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Schreck, 850K) reports, "President Bush is committed to working with Congress on an overhaul of immigration laws, two Cabinet officials told a Senate panel Wednesday, but they hedged on the contentious issue of whether people who come to the US illegally have a right to citizenship." Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez told the Senate Judiciary Committee that "the administration's priority is to secure the nation's borders and convince the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to 'come out of the shadows.'" Meanwhile, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "stressed that any changes in the law should not amount to amnesty. 'We cannot give those who are here illegally because they've broken the law a leg up and an advantage over those who have played by the rules,' he said." The hearing "follows a renewed behind-the-scenes push by the White House to pass a comprehensive overhaul before 2008 presidential and congressional campaigning swings into high gear. At least in broad terms, Bush agrees with congressional Democrats that the immigration laws -- last revised on a large scale in 1986 -- need significant retooling."

Reporting on the testimony by Gutierrez and Chertoff, USA Today (3/1, Kiely, 2.27M) says Bush "waded gingerly back into the debate over immigration Wednesday," adding that "last year's election improved the bill's chances for passage by putting Democrats in charge of both the House and Senate and ousting several leading Republican critics of the Senate immigration bill, such as J.D. Hayworth of Arizona and John Hostettler of Indiana."

The New York Times (3/1, Swarns, 1.16M) notes that "last year, the Senate passed bipartisan immigration legislation that would have provided citizenship to most illegal immigrants who paid fines and back taxes and learned English. … But on Wednesday, Mr. Gutierrez and Mr. Chertoff declined to endorse the measure. Mr. Gutierrez said many illegal immigrants might prefer working here for several years and returning home," and Chertoff "noted that only about a third of the illegal immigrants granted legal status as a result of legislation passed in 1986 actually ended up applying for citizenship." The Times adds, "It was unclear whether the officials were simply trying to ease conservative concerns about the citizenship question or whether Mr. Bush had actually shifted his position." Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, "said Mr. Bush still supported a path to citizenship that would include payments of fines back taxes and a requirement to learn English, among other things. But it seemed unlikely that the two cabinet secretaries would make such remarks without first consulting the White House."

The CBS Evening News (2/28, story 7, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported GOP Sen. John McCain and Democrat Ted Kennedy "could unveil comprehensive new immigration bill as early as next week."

Reporting on that bill, The Hill (3/1, Schor, Swanson) says it "exposes a minefield of political hazards for the six senators chasing their parties' presidential nominations. Senate leaders on both sides of the aisle have expressed readiness to restart the debate over combining border enforcement with a path to earned citizenship for illegal immigrants in the country." But "Democrats now face high expectations on immigration after campaigning on last year's failure to reach a conference on comprehensive reform, and the Senate GOP's two 2008 candidates face their own backlash over backing the bill last year." The Hill adds, "The White House contender most openly staking his electoral fortunes on immigration" is McCain, "who is putting the finishing touches on this year's edition of the reform bill he offered last year with…Kennedy."

Kennedy "Secret Work" Said To Threaten Chances For Immigration Reform's Passage. The Washington Times (3/1, Dinan, 88K) reports that "Kennedy's secret work on an immigration bill threatens the chance of passing any guest-worker program this year, warned Sen. Arlen Specter, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee." Specter "cautioned" Kennedy and McCain, "saying Mr. Kennedy has broken a promise to consult with other senators' staffs on a new bill. That bill, details of which were first reported by The Washington Times, would grant citizenship rights to most illegal aliens already in the US"

Immigration Fees To Increase. USA Today (3/1, Welch, 2.27M) reports the Citizenship and Immigration Service has proposed a "set of fee increases," which it says "will allow it to hire more staff and upgrade its creaky system so applications can be approved faster. Among its proposals is to raise the application fee for citizenship from $330 to $595 and the fee for legal permanent residency from $325 to $905. Advocates for immigrants say the cost may price out the poor from becoming citizens."

Colorado May Use Convicts To Fill Immigrant Labor Shortage. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Riccardi, 850K) reports, "Ever since passing what its Legislature promoted as the nation's toughest laws against illegal immigration last summer, Colorado has struggled with a labor shortage as migrants fled the state. This week, officials announced a novel solution: Use convicts as farmworkers." Under a pilot program that may be launched this month, low security risk prisoners "may choose to work in the fields, earning 60 cents a day." They "will be watched by prison guards, who will be paid by the farms. The cost is subject to negotiations, but farmers say they expect to pay more for the inmate labor and its associated costs than for their traditional workers. Advocates on both sides of the immigration debate said they were stunned by the proposal. … Farmers said they weren't happy with the solution, but their livelihoods are on the verge of collapse."

TAX:

IRS Finds Errors In Nonprofit Tax Reports. The New York Times (3/1, Strom) reports, "Some 600 charities and foundations have had to file amended tax forms after an Internal Revenue Service study found flaws in the way they reported payments to executives and other employees." The Times continues, "The I.R.S. has also asked 40 individuals to pay a total of $20 million in excise taxes, which is the penalty it imposes when it determines a nonprofit executive has been paid excessively. … 'We found some problems,' said Steven T. Miller, the commissioner in charge of the I.R.S. division overseeing tax-exempt and government entities. 'Whether they were due to confusion, poor design of the tax forms used by these organizations or something more nefarious, I can't tell you.'" The Times adds, "He said the results of the inquiry, which found flaws in the tax forms of a third of the 1,800 charities and foundations examined, convinced the agency that it needed to do more in the area of compensation at nonprofits. … The names of the affected organizations and executives were not released. … Organizations that had to file amended returns either failed to report, or reported incorrectly, perquisites like an executive's personal use of an organization's vehicles, travel payments for spouses of executives or other payments and reimbursements, I.R.S.

officials said. … Those whose executives have been asked to pay penalties may have failed to use comparable figures from similar organizations in setting compensation or otherwise failed to justify executive pay levels."

Telephone Excise Tax Refund Scam Tops IRS List. The Washington Post (3/1, D2, Singletary) reports, "Every year the Internal Revenue Service announces the top 12 tax scams. This tax season, topping the latest Dirty Dozen are fraudulent schemes connected with the one-time telephone excise tax refund available to most taxpayers." The Post continues, "The excise tax refund is available only on your 2006 federal income tax return and is intended to refund the tax collected on long distance telephone service. It's available for anyone who paid such taxes on a land line, fax, computer or cellphone for the period following Feb. 28, 2003, and before Aug. 1, 2006. … To make it easier for taxpayers, the IRS set a standard refund amount ranging from $30 to $60, based on the number of exemptions claimed on your return. … You don't need to present proof to take the standard refund amount. However, you can figure the refund using the actual amount of tax paid, based on your phone bills and other records." The Post adds, "Because taxpayers can request a refund for the exact amount of the taxes collected, unscrupulous tax preparers have persuaded people to claim a higher refund than they are entitled to. In some cases people are asking for thousands of dollars. Others are requesting what looks to be the entire amount of their phone bills for the period in question. In the most egregious cases, some individuals have asked for a refund of $30,000, which means they would have had a long-distance bill of $1 million from the end of February 2003 until the beginning of August last year. That 41-month period covers the time the 3 percent excise tax was collected. … To stop the abusive use of the telephone excise tax refund, the IRS is conducting site visits with tax preparers across the country to stop inflated requests. The visits started with 22 tax preparers who have handled more than 1,500 returns. … 'We are taking this unusual step to confront blatant abuse of this important refund program,' said IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson. 'We want tax preparers to prepare accurate tax returns. If they don't, we will move swiftly to impose civil penalties and, where warranted, seek criminal sanctions.' … Everson said individuals requesting what appear to be inflated refunds will have those refunds frozen and they may be subject to an audit."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Jefferson Seeks Records Seized In Probe. The AP (3/1, Jordan) reports, "Attorneys for Democratic Rep. William Jefferson asked a federal appeals court Wednesday to force the Bush administration to return all documents that were seized during an FBI raid last year on the congressman's office." The AP continues, "In their 52-page request, lawyers for Jefferson, D-La., argued that the Justice Department violated Congress' right to withhold certain information from the executive branch when it conducted the unprecedented 18-hour search last May 20-21. … The raid was part of a 16-month international bribery investigation of Jefferson, who allegedly accepted $100,000 from a telecommunications businessman — $90,000 of which was later recovered in a freezer in the congressman's Louisiana home." The AP adds, "Jefferson's attorneys said nearly 19,000 pages of documents and electronic files seized by prosecutors and the FBI are covered by Congress' separation of powers privilege to shield certain legislative material from executive review. … But the FBI 'inspected every document in the office suite and copied every computer hard drive or other electronic storage device they could find,' the attorneys wrote in their request filed Wednesday with the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia. 'Once that occurs, the privilege is breached.' … 'Because this case involves the first time in United States history that a search warrant has been executed on a congressional office, it is vital that the remedy imposed be sufficiently stringent to deter future searches that exceed constitutional boundaries,' Jefferson's team concluded. 'The only remedy that will vindicate and protect the fundamental principles of separations of powers and legislative independence ... is return of all of the seized materials.' … The Justice Department had no immediate comment."

House GOP Seeks Floor Vote On Jefferson Appointment. The Washington Post (3/1, A4, Layton) reports, "House Republicans plan to force a floor vote on the appointment of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), who is the subject of a federal bribery investigation, to a seat on the Homeland Security Committee." The Post continues, "0The decision to put Jefferson on the panel was made by Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), and House Democrats endorsed the move at a private meeting Tuesday night, but his appointment must be confirmed by a vote on the House floor. Such an action would normally be a formality, but Republicans said yesterday that they would pursue a rarely used maneuver to force a recorded vote on the matter. … 'This is a terrible mistake by the Democratic leadership, to take someone with serious ethical allegations against him and put him on one of the most sensitive and important committees in Congress,' said Rep. Peter T. King (N.Y.), the ranking Republican on the committee." The Post adds, "Pelosi ousted Jefferson from his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee in June after federal investigators raided his Capitol Hill office. In an earlier search of his home, $90,000 was found in a freezer. The money allegedly was accepted in a bribery sting involving an African technology company. Jefferson, who has not been charged, has maintained his innocence and was elected to a ninth term in December after a runoff election. … A spokesman for Pelosi said she opted to place Jefferson on Homeland Security because the panel oversees the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Jefferson had been a vocal critic of FEMA's performance during Hurricane Katrina, which affected thousands of his constituents. … But his appointment must be formally approved by the House, and Republicans said they would take the rare step of challenging the vote and requiring members to record their votes so Democrats will be forced to go on the record in their support of Jefferson."

Roll Call (3/1, Davis, Yachnin) says Republicans are "breaking with longstanding but unwritten rules of comity in the House." In a statement Wednesday evening, "Jefferson said the GOP's tactics were simply 'politics as usual' and that his district 'desperately needs a voice' on the Homeland panel."

White House Confirms Bush Would Veto Labor Bill. The AP (3/1, Abrams) reports, "President Bush would veto legislation championed by Democrats and labor groups that would make it easier to organize unions by eliminating employer rights to demand secret-ballot elections, the White House said Wednesday." The House "is to vote on the legislation Thursday and, with help from pro-labor Republicans from the Northeast, it is almost certain to pass. But the margin of support is expected to fall well short of the two-thirds needed to overturn a presidential veto." The Employee Free Choice Act, "also known as the card check bill, is the top legislative goal of labor groups eager to reassert themselves with the emergence of the Democratic majority." The White House, in a statement, said "the measure 'would strip workers of the fundamental democratic right to a supervised private ballot election.' Substituting a card check mechanism under which unions would get bargaining rights as soon as a majority of workers at a plant sign approval cards, 'would turn back the clock 60 years and return us to a failed system.'"

LATimes Opposes Bill. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, 850K) editorializes that the legislation "would do away with a secret ballot in so-called organizing elections, making it easier for union leaders to pressure co-workers in what should be a free choice. Instead of having the option of insisting on a secret ballot election, employers would have to accept a union formed on the basis of authorization cards signed by workers -- not by a secret process." Unions "once supported the secret ballot for organization elections. They were right then and are wrong now. Unions have every right to a fair hearing, and the National Labor Relations Board should be more vigilant about attempts by employers to game the system. In the end, however, whether to unionize is up to the workers. A secret ballot ensures that their choice will be a free one."

WSJournal Says Bill "Strips Away" Democrat's Moderate "Mask." In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/1, 2.04M) says, "Big Labor has been agitating to ease union-formation requirements for more than a decade. And prior to last year's election, the AFL-CIO, AFSCME and their allies made it clear to Democrats that this vote would be the most important return they expected on their investment in a Nancy Pelosi Speakership. This is payback day. … So far this Congress, Democrats have been trying to present themselves as 'moderates' who won't return to their bad special-interest selves pre-1994. But this union-enabling bill strips away that mask and exposes an anti-business animus out of the 1970s, if not the 1930s. Even if it fails this Congress, this week's vote is a warning about what could become law if Democrats and their union backers hold all the levers of power after 2008."

Price Blasts Democrats, Unions. GOP Rep. Tom Price, a member of the House Education and Labor Committee, writes in the Washington Times (3/1, 88K), "Not even two months into the new Congress, the bipartisan facade of the highly poll-tested, heavily orchestrated first 100 hours is a distant memory. The real agenda of the new Democratic majority is coming to light, and many of the special interests that helped rally support for Democratic candidates during the last election cycle are lining up to cash in. At the front of the line: Big Labor." Price adds that "faced with plummeting membership and an ever-loosening stranglehold on American workers, organized labor isn't about to let bad policy -- or blatant hypocrisy -- get in their way. They're ready for their payback. And congressional Democrats stand ready to deliver. Indeed, it appears that democratic principles and the sanctity of the secret ballot are not the concerns of the new majority party."

Administration, Democrats Seek Trade Deal. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A4, Hitt, 2.04M) reports, "The Bush administration and congressional Democrats are attempting to negotiate a grand compromise on trade that would allow several deals to move forward by elevating the importance of labor rights in those agreements." The Journal adds that "after Democrats won control of Congress in November, in part by attacking free-trade agreements, President Bush's globalization agenda seemed all but dead for the rest of his term. Among priorities were bilateral deals with Peru, Panama and Colombia; the Doha round of multilateral talks; as well as renewal of a broad presidential authority to negotiate agreements and push them through Congress, which expires in June." But "the White House and lawmakers have decided to try to find common ground, as Mr. Bush has signaled flexibility on labor standards after years of resisting." The talks "are being led by US Trade Representative Susan Schwab, House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel of New York and Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the ranking Republican on the committee. Much of the negotiations have been at the staff level, but the three principals have played a role, conferring in face-to-face meetings on Capitol Hill or over the phone."

Meanwhile, another Wall Street Journal story (3/1, A1, Solomon) reports that "a common political compromise in Washington involves keeping trade barriers low in exchange for programs compensating those hurt by imports. Free-trade advocates are generally happy to make such a compromise. They figure the winners from trade -- principally consumers who save money on imported goods -- can afford, through the government, to help compensate the losers." But "compensation programs often add bureaucracy without helping many people. Even if the health-insurance assistance program were working well, it would aid only a fraction of those who lose their jobs. The Labor Department must certify that workers have lost their jobs to imports from certain countries or to a shift in production there. Most workers in call centers or other service industries whose jobs are sent overseas don't qualify." The Journal adds, "Another struggling program is wage insurance, designed for workers over 50 who lose their jobs because of trade and then take a lower-paying job."

Democrats See Signs Of New Life In The Administration. The White House Bulletin/US News (2/28) reported Democratic strategists "see some new life in the Bush administration. The strategists had been dismissive of President Bush's ability to revive his political fortunes amid the problems in Iraq and in the aftermath of the Republican drubbing in the mid-term elections last year. But now some Democratic insiders are singing a different tune." They are "impressed with the Administration's new willingness to join the Baghdad government in talks with Iran and Syria, which Bush's spokesmen have rejected in the past. They are pleasantly surprised by all the outreach that the White House has been conducting on domestic issues such as health care, immigration, energy, and education. But is it too late to get compromises with the resurgent Democrats on Capitol Hill?" A senior Democratic strategist who is advising a major presidential candidate told the Bulletin, "President Bush should have done these things a long time ago. Many Americans and many members of Congress don't think he cares about issues other than Iraq, so his credibility is very low."

Top Army Officials Heard Years Of Complaints About Walter Reed. The Washington Post (3/1, A1, Hull, Priest, 690K) reports in a front page story that top officials at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, "including the Army's surgeon general, have heard complaints about outpatient neglect from family members, veterans groups and members of Congress for more than three years." Although a "procession of Pentagon and Walter Reed officials expressed surprise last week about the living conditions and bureaucratic nightmares faced by wounded soldiers staying at the D.C. medical facility," as far back 'as 2003, the commander of Walter Reed, Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who is now the Army's top medical officer, was told that soldiers who were wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan were languishing and lost on the grounds, according to interviews." According to interviews, Kiley, "his successive commanders at Walter Reed and various top noncommissioned officers in charge of soldiers' lives have heard a stream of complaints about outpatient treatment over the past several years. The complaints have surfaced at town hall meetings for staff and soldiers, at commanders' 'sensing sessions' in which soldiers or officers are encouraged to speak freely, and in several inspector general's reports detailing building conditions, safety issues and other matters."

Cheney Blew Own Cover When Speaking On Background. McClatchy (3/1, Hutcheson) reports, "Ever wonder about the identities of those 'senior administration officials' who always seem to get quoted talking about President Bush's policies?" It "wasn't hard to figure out who was doing the talking when the White House released a transcript of a question-and-answer session this week aboard Air Force 2, Vice President Dick Cheney's plane. One big clue: The unnamed official used the pronoun 'I' when discussing Cheney's visit to Afghanistan and Pakistan." The official said, "I would describe my sessions both in Pakistan and Afghanistan as very productive." McClatchy added that even after Cheney "blew his own cover, White House spokesman Tony Snow declined to lift the prohibition against identifying the unnamed speaker." Snow said, "I have spoken with the vice president's office, and the ground rules that were laid out are going to remain in effect." McClatchy adds, "The exchange during Cheney's flight to Oman on Wednesday highlighted the absurdity of a practice that's damaged the credibility of journalists and government officials alike. It's much easier to believe what people say when their names are attached to their words."

The Washington Post (3/1, A2, Kurtz, 690K) also reports on Cheney's press briefing as a "Senior Administration Official": "'Let me just make one editorial comment here,' the SAO said about the vice president's talks with Pakistan's leader. 'I've seen some press reporting says, 'Cheney went in to beat up on them, threaten them.' That's not the way I work. I don't know who writes that, or maybe somebody gets it from some source who doesn't know what I'm doing, or isn't involved in it. But the idea that I'd go in and threaten someone is an invalid misreading of the way I do business.'" The SAO "also said that 'I was very careful' in choosing words to criticize House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) on Iraq strategy." The Post adds, "The first-person pronoun gave away the game. But it also raised the question: Why did Cheney feel the need to speak on a not-for-attribution basis, and why did the seven journalists on the trip go along?"

Sen. McConnell Seen As Bush's "Political Field General." The Washington Times (3/1, Ward, 88K) reports President Bush on Friday "will raise money for his political field general, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, who has stymied Democrats at almost every turn of the Iraq war debate." White House spokesman Tony Snow, "who declined to comment on how Democrats have fared in their attempts to halt the president's surge of troops to Iraq," said, "We think Mitch McConnell is a terrific and able minority leader." The Times adds, "feigning ignorance," Snow said, "You say Democrats are in disarray?" The Times adds with the "congressional debate over the war at fever pitch, Democratic leaders who rode to victory last fall on the promise of bringing the troops home are under fire from virtually every direction. The far left is growing impatient with the lack of progress, while more conservative Democrats are unhappy with the ideas proposed so far." McConnell, "who looks more like a bookkeeper than a power broker, is 'savagely political,' according to one high-placed Democratic source. The Kentucky Republican has twice defeated Majority Leader Harry Reid's attempts to push through an anti-war measure that would have shut out Republican amendments." But McConnell's "effectiveness has drawn attention from far-left Web loggers, as well as calls for the four-term senator to be targeted for defeat in 2008."

Spratt To Unveil Budget Plan The Week Of March 12. The Washington Post (3/1, A15, Kane, 690K) profiles Democratic Rep. John Spratt, the House Budget Committee chairman, who is "in charge of drafting a budget plan that will close a deficit of more than $200 billion within five years. And, as Spratt explained, he has to 'squirrel away a little money' for up to a dozen key Democratic priorities, including big increases for education and children's health care. And he's not supposed to raise taxes to cover the additional spending and eliminate the deficit." Spratt "will unveil his first budget the week of March 12 and submit it for passage by his committee. It's a prospect he's looking forward to with some trepidation: 'Beware the ides of March'" he warned, half joking."

Reports Find Few Schools Show Great Improvement Under NCLB. The Christian Science Monitor (3/1, Teicher, Ben Arnoldy, 59K) reports on a study by the Center on Education Policy which it describes as "a new and cautionary assessment of how challenging it is to reform public schools" under NCLB. The study found that "most schools" that are required to undergo restructuring under the No Child Left Behind Act "have not yet found a way to get out." NCLB "allows several restructuring options: turning the school over to the state or a management company, reopening as a charter, replacing much of the staff, or any other major action that will significantly change school governance." The "any other option" is "too often used as a loophole to avoid significant reforms." The U.S. Department Of Education "proposes taking the 'any other' option off the table."

Chamber Of Commerce Criticizes States' Educational Efforts. The Washington Times (3/1, Fagan, 88K) reports, "US Chamber of Commerce leaders yesterday said states are doing a poor job educating America's children for the future, citing a new report by the chamber that graded each state in areas from academic achievement and teacher quality to how wisely a state is spending its education dollars." The study was "conducted with help from the Center for American Progress (CAP) and the American Enterprise Institute" using "data from other research, the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) and a national survey of teachers." The leading states were Massachusetts, Minnesota and New Hampshire while the lowest were New Mexico, Mississippi and Washington, D.C. CAP President John Podesta pointed out that Massachusetts "showed only 44 percent of fourth-graders proficient in reading and 49 percent proficient in math -- numbers he called 'unconscionable.'" The study also contained recommendations for improving schools including "higher starting salaries for teachers, removing ineffective educators and giving principals more control over budget and personnel."

Brooks Urges Greater Attention To Early Childhood Attachments In Education Policy. David Brooks writes in his column for the New York Times (3/1, 1.16M), "All the presidential candidates this year will talk about education. The conventional ones will talk about improving the schools. The creative ones will talk about improving the lives of students." These creative candidates will "emphasize that education is a cumulative process that begins at the dawn of life and builds early in life as children learn how to learn" and "students make the most of their natural dispositions when they have a secure emotional base from which to explore." Brooks favors "programs that do work to help young and stressed mothers establish healthier attachments."

Consumer Advocates Call For Hearings On FERC Oversight Of Power Markets. The Hill (3/1, Snyder) reports, "Consumer advocacy groups are pushing Democrats to step up oversight of a federal energy panel that oversees electricity markets and to take a fresh look at electricity-deregulation policies that they argue have raised consumer prices. Deregulation critics sponsored a Washington conference Monday on the health of wholesale power markets that included officials in deregulated states where prices have jumped significantly." The critics asked for "hearings on how effective the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission...is in overseeing wholesale power markets. Tyson Slocum, who directs Public Citizen's energy program, said deregulation has not led to competition in wholesale markets and that FERC has done a poor job of ensuring consumer rates are 'just and reasonable.'" The Hill adds, "Utilities, large commercial energy users and financial giants have formed their own coalition, called Compete, to counter anti-deregulation arguments."

House Measure Would Increase Scrutiny Of Foreign Business Deals. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A3, Hitt, 2.04M) reports, "The House approved legislation that would strengthen U.S. scrutiny of overseas-led business deals, underscoring lawmakers' angst over the frictions caused by the international-investment boom." The measure, "approved yesterday on a vote of 423-0, would require the administration to conduct an extended, 45-day investigation of most deals involving foreign governments, give intelligence agencies a formal role in the review process and increase disclosure to Congress, among other things." The "bipartisan legislation was written in consultation with the White House." The Washington Post (3/1, D3, Abrams, 690K), among other newspapers, also reports the story this morning.

Groups Look To Craft Better Government Proposals For Next Administration. The Washington Post's (3/1, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "With the presidential campaign field taking shape, think tanks and public-service and business groups are preparing to develop policy proposals and ideas for the winning candidate," to help "improve the government's management practices," and the Post notes several such efforts, including the "IBM Center for the Business of Government," which plans "to launch an 'interactive conversation'" today to help find ideas for the next White House." Also, "the Government Performance Coalition," which is sponsoring "a Transitions in Governance 2008 Web site, in hopes of helping shape the agenda for 2008 and beyond." The adds, "Thinking up new ideas for improving government could be challenge, after almost 16 years of 'reinventing government' by the" Clinton-Gore and Bush-Cheney "teams' 'president's management agenda.' Those initiatives were met with some resistance from Congress and were greeted skeptically by many federal employees who perceived them as efforts to downsize and outsource government operations."

Lack Of Attention Given Crandall Medal Award Criticized. In the Wall Street Journal's "Wonder Land" column (3/1), Daniel Henninger says that amid the "mad jumble that makes the news in our time, the White House on Monday held a ceremony for a Medal of Honor recipient," Bruce Crandall, who "earned his medal as a major, flying a Huey helicopter in 1965 in the Vietnam War." But the "Medal of Honor does not occupy the place in the nation's cultural life that it once did. This has much to do with the ambivalent place of the military in our angry politics." In a "less doubtful culture, Maj. Crandall's magnificent medal would have been on every front page, if only a photograph. It was on no one's front page Tuesday." All nations "celebrate personal icons, and ours now tend to be doers of good. That's fine. But if we suppress the martial feats of a Bruce Crandall, we distance ourselves further from our military. And in time, we will change. At some risk."

WPost Criticizes Smithsonian's Board Of Regents. The Washington Post (3/1, A16, 690K) says in an editorial, "A report by the Smithsonian inspector general questioned nearly $90,000 in unauthorized spending by" director Lawrence Small "from 2000 to 2005. Included were charges for private planes, the tab for his wife to go to Cambodia, catered meals and gifts. There was no evidence of fraud or abuse and no denying that many expenditures were related to Smithsonian business. Yet, as The Post's James V. Grimaldi reported, many transactions lacked documentation, violated Smithsonian policies and, in the words of the inspector general, 'might be considered lavish or extravagant.' The 17-member Board of Regents brushed the findings aside; in instances where the spending ran afoul of policy, the board just changed its rules. It's also disturbing that there were efforts to keep the report secret." As "distressing as Mr. Small's actions were, the real problem lies with a board that opted to be more lap dog than watchdog."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Rebound, Bernanke Says Economy In Good Shape. ABC World News (2/28, story 3, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "If you own stock, mutual funds or a 401(k), you can breathe a bit easier today." A day "after a precipitous drop on Wall Street, it was a calm day in the markets." ABC (Stark) added, "At a budget meeting, lawmakers tried to get Federal Reserve Chairman, Ben Bernanke to explain the plunge." Bernanke was shown saying, "There isn't didn't seem to be any one trigger of the correction we saw yesterday." Bernanke also "declared the stock market working normally. And tried to reassure investors the big sell-off was not a harbinger of dark days to come. The economy remains in good shape."

The CBS Evening News (2/28, lead story, 3:05, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Well, after the markets closed last night, everyone was wondering was that huge drop in prices the beginning of a downturn? Today we got the answer. It looks like it may have been a one-day wonder."

NBC Nightly News (2/28, lead story, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported the Dow "finished the day up more than 52 points [to close at 12,268.63] and NASDAQ gained over eight points [to close at 2,426.13]." The AP (3/1) notes the Standard & Poor's 500 index "climbed 7.78, or 0.56 percent, to 1,406.82."

The Financial Times (3/1, Guha) reports Bernanke "made no reference to the comments" by former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan, "who told investors in Hong Kong early on Monday morning that it was 'possible' the US would end the year in recession." Bernanke "repeated the Fed view that growth was likely to pick up in the second half of this year as the drag from housing and manufacturing fades." USA Today (3/1, Kirchhoff, 2.27M), McClatchy (3/1, Hall), New York Times (3/1, Andrews, 1.16M), Washington Post (3/1, A1, Henderson, Cho, 690K), Washington Times (3/1, Hill, 88K) and Wall Street Journal (3/1, Blackstone, Ives-Halperin, 2.04M) run similar reports.

In his "Washington Sketch" in the Washington Post (3/1, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank notes Bernanke "could not have sounded the alarm any clearer if he had carried a bullhorn and a gong. 'This expansion of debt would spark a fiscal crisis. … The US economy could be seriously weakened. … This is sort of like a snowball rolling down the hill. … This can really get out of control.'" Although his comments about the stock declines on Tuesday received almost all the attention, Bernanke had gone before Congress "not to prop up markets but to scold lawmakers about the need to do head off the coming fiscal crisis. Lawmakers, however, reacted like addicts, either denying their problem or promising to give up the spending habit another day."

The New York Times (3/1, Anderson, Bajaj, 1.16M) credits the market numbers to Bernanke's comments and "a bounce-back in the Chinese markets," while USA Today (3/1, 4B, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Giving investors' the biggest dose of relief was the fact that the Chinese stock market, which triggered the whole mess with its 9% plunge Tuesday, bounced back strongly with a 4% gain Wednesday."

McClatchy (3/1, Hall) says the US and Chinese stock exchanges "returned to a semblance of normalcy Wednesday, but concerns about both economies linger following the worst global sell-off of stocks in more than five years." Bernanke "brought a temporary reprieve, telling lawmakers that financial markets 'seem to be working well.'"

The Wall Street Journal (3/1, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports that although "investors crept cautiously back into the stock market," the "mild recovery didn't calm the market's jitters or come close to recovering Tuesday's 416-point plunge in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. … Typically, a bull market doesn't end quite as abruptly as this, said Phil Roth, chief technical market analyst at New York brokerage firm Miller Tabak. Mr. Roth himself is in the bearish camp, viewing recent market moves as a 'topping' process that will lead to a longer-running decline." But "he doesn't see the decline happening just yet."

The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A2, Ip, Whitehouse, 2.04M) says "some economists see a turning point" in Tuesday's market drop. John Lonski, chief economist at Moody's Investors Service, said, "This is a wake-up call. … Unfortunately, if there is an increase in risk aversion, it's taking place exactly when business-investment spending has been much lower than anticipated." The Journal adds, "One of the first places this is showing up is in the market for subprime mortgage loans, those made to less-creditworthy borrowers. As defaults on such loans have risen sharply, investment banks and other financial firms have sharply reduced the creation of new collateralized debt obligations backed by subprime loans. Such CDOs have become a popular way to pool baskets of loans, then redistribute slices with varying degrees of risk and return to a spectrum of investors."

Technological Glitch May Have Contributed To Tuesday's Market Drop. The Washington Post (3/1, D1, Tse, Day, 690K) reports, "It was unclear Wednesday whether the delays were related to a technological glitch that caused the Dow to plummet 200 points in a matter of minutes shortly before 3 p.m. Tuesday. The drop was caused when the system that calculates the average recorded a backlog of trades after the process was switched to a backup computer. Down the street, traders at the American Stock Exchange complained of similar problems, and large brokerage firms also said they had trouble executing trades." Traders "said that generally, when they send buy or sell requests via a handheld device, those orders are reflected almost instantly on trading-floor screens. That was not the case Tuesday. … Because they could not see whether their orders had registered, some traders sent the same order twice, which meant they ended up buying or selling twice as many shares than they wanted."

The Wall Street Journal (3/1, C1, Lucchetti, Scannell, 2.04M) reports "trading problems grew more serious after an error in the calculation in the Dow Jones Industrial Average caused a sudden point drop, which the NYSE says led to a

50% spike in orders. 'It was a mess,' says Steve Swanson, head of Automated Trading Desk LLC, a large brokerage firm based in Mount Pleasant, S.C. 'There was a lack of information. No one was telling us what was going on. The hybrid is new, and we're seeing record volumes, and it's not holding up well.'"

Hubbard Says Economy Remains Strong. On MSNBC's Hardball (2/28, Matthews), host Chris Matthews spoke with Alan Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council. Asked about the 3% decline in the Dow on Tuesday, Hubbard said, "The President feels that the fundamentals of the economy continue to be very, very strong. … You know, we don't get into figuring out whether stocks are overvalued or undervalued. What we care about is, Is this economy creating jobs? Yes, it is. It's created over seven million since the middle of '03, over a half million in the last three months, over 100,000 most months. Unemployment rate's at 4.6 percent, which is lower than it was."

First Quarter GDP Revised Downward To 2.2%. The New York Times (3/1, Porter, 1.16M) reports, "Analysts have been stumped by the apparent resilience of the American economy, which seemed to be bounding ahead at a 3.5 percent pace in the final quarter of last year even as the housing market fell and the Federal Reserve raised interest rates. The paradox has been solved: the economy was not bounding." The Commerce Department "reported yesterday that economic growth inched ahead by 2.2 percent in the fourth quarter of last year, only slightly faster than the 2 percent growth recorded in the third quarter and substantially below the economy's long-term trend rate of growth The downward revision, by 1.3 percentage points, in the preliminary estimate of gross domestic product was almost three times the average adjustment since the early 1980s, which is 0.5 percentage point."

USA Today (3/1, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "With the latest revision, GDP rose 3.3% in 2006, up from 3.2% in 2005 but lower than the 3.9% in 2004." The economy "could grow below 2% in the first quarter, warns David Rosenberg, North American economist at Merrill Lynch."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/1, Scherer, 59K) says the economy "is entering spring with less wind at its back than it has had for the past four years." Although "the slowdown is still not a big concern of most economists," they "warn that an economy that is moving more like a tortoise than a hare is at greater risk of being overrun by some outside event – perhaps one that causes a recession or a period of very slow growth. But a sustainable slow-growth economy does have a bright side: Inflationary pressure is likely to ease, keeping the Federal Reserve from raising interest rates for borrowers."

Likewise, the Wall Street Journal (3/1, A2, Conkey, Aeppel, 2.04M) reports the economy "was considerably weaker than previously thought in the fourth quarter of 2006," and its "growth may remain moderate until the manufacturing sector solves its inventory problems and businesses step up their capital spending."

The Financial Times (3/1, Callan) reports Drew Matus, an economist at Lehman Brothers, said, "The figures suggest the economy is playing out largely as the Fed expected, with a little bit of worrisome weakness in the housing market."

New Home Sales Down 17% In February. The Financial Times (3/1, Callan) reports, "Americans bought far fewer new homes last month, according to government data released on Wednesday that showed sales fell at the fastest rate in 13 years." Sales of newly built homes "fell 17 percent as the backlog of houses standing empty remained stubbornly high, figures from the Commerce Department showed." The drop "was greater than even the most pessimistic Wall Street economists predicted and sent shares in housebuilders tumbling. Home Depot shares also slipped as the DIY store said it expected anaemic sales and lower profits this year." The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A3, Conkey, Lloyd, 2.04M) also reports the story under the headline "Drag From Housing Could Persist."

More Commentary. Lawrence Kudlow, host of CNBC's "Kudlow & Company," writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/1, A13, 2.04M), "The US stock markets were looking for a correction for some time now and on Tuesday they found it: a 3.5% sell-off across the board. The plunge follows a 20% run-up that began last summer, and some analysts believe it was overdue. Indeed, 3% corrections are normal and healthy. … The high-tech, productivity-driven US economy is more durable and flexible than its liberal-left critics will ever admit. It is a private-sector free-enterprise economy, not a government-planned one. Innovation is strong and entrepreneurial spirits are high. The four prosperity killers, a paradigm coined by Arthur Laffer many years ago, all look dormant: inflation, taxes and regulatory burdens are low, while free trade keeps expanding."

The New York Times (3/1, 1.16M) editorializes that Bernanke "managed to calm the market, saying that one could reasonably hope for a stronger economy by midyear if housing stabilized soon, and if manufacturing strengthened. But those are big ifs. The torrent of bad news on housing is only worsening."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/1, A12, 2.04M) says, "One benefit of Tuesday's rout in equities is that it is causing everyone to learn more about the Chinese financial system." According to the Journal, "The lesson here is that the performance of the Shanghai index bears little correlation to China's underlying economic growth." The "far larger threat" from China, its says, "is from US protectionism or lobbying for Beijing to revalue its currency. Either one of those could send the real Chinese economy -- not just the Shanghai stock casino -- into slower growth or deflation or both." However, 'Efforts to impose standardized accounting rules and crack down on corruption help. But the best way to develop China's stock markets is to impose market discipline -- and especially to let average Chinese put their $4 trillion of savings where they may."

Landrieu Expected To Face "Tough Race" If Challenged By "Legitimate Republican." Roll Call (3/1, Duran) reports that with Sen. Mary Landrieu's "narrow victories, the state's displaced, mostly Democratic voters, and the relatively high popularity of President Bush compared with his standing in the rest of the country," Republicans "see a chance to flip yet another Southern Democratic Senate seat in a presidential election year." However, "some Democratic operatives believe that Landrieu is in good shape as she begins her bid for a third term." The senator is "voting center-right, pushing for hurricane relief funds' and reaching out to other parts of the state beyond New Orleans," said "one knowledgeable Democratic strategist who did not want to be named." Roll Call continues, "Undoubtedly Landrieu's biggest coup to date — her involvement in opening a huge swath of the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas production — should earn her plaudits across the state. … Still, even loyal Democrats…concede that any legitimate Republican, including Rep. Richard Baker, who is contemplating running, will give her a tough race."

Draft Issue Could Prove Troublesome In Giuliani's Quest For President. The Washington (DC) Examiner (3/1, Sammon) reports, "If this presidential campaign is anything like the last, John McCain's Vietnam service will inevitably be contrasted with GOP rival Rudy Giuliani's avoidance of a war that he opposed. 'Any suggestion that he was dodging the draft is totally, factually inaccurate,' said a senior Giuliani campaign adviser who spoke on the condition of anonymity. … 'He opposed the war on tactical and strategic grounds.' But as far back as 1993, when he successfully ran for mayor of New York, Giuliani has been dogged by accusations that he pulled strings to avoid the draft. By contrast, McCain has long been feted as a bona fide war hero for his harrowing stint in a Vietnamese prison. … Giuliani, who once said of the Vietnam war, 'I disagreed with it,' obtained an occupational deferment in 1969, when he was a law clerk. Although critics say such deferments were rare, the Giuliani campaign disagrees. 'He wanted an occupational deferment, which was very common at the time, because he wanted to be a lawyer,' the Giuliani adviser said. When Giuliani's deferment expired in 1970, he drew draft number 308, which was never called. His campaign suggests this proves he was not a draft dodger." But "Giuliani has always been politically sensitive to the issue. During his 1993 mayoral campaign, he commissioned a 'vulnerability study' that listed 'draft dodger' as one of the epithets that might be hurled against him."

As Mayor, Giuliani Appointed Numerous Left-Leaning Judges. The Politico (3/1, Smith) reports, "When Rudy Giuliani faces Republicans concerned about his support of gay rights and legal abortion, he reassures them that he is a conservative on the decisions that matter most. 'I would want judges who are strict constructionists because I am,' he told South Carolina Republicans last month. 'Those are the kinds of justices I would appoint -- Scalia, Alito and Roberts.' But most of Giuliani's judicial appointments during his eight years as mayor of New York were hardly in the model of Chief Justice John Roberts or Samuel Alito -- much less aggressive conservatives in the mold of Antonin Scalia. A Politico review of the 75 judges Giuliani appointed to three of New York state's lower courts found that Democrats outnumbered Republicans by more than 8 to 1. One of his appointments was an officer of the International Association of Lesbian and Gay Judges. Another ruled that the state law banning liquor sales on Sundays was unconstitutional because it was insufficiently secular. A third, an abortion-rights supporter, later made it to the federal bench in part because" New York Sen. Chuck Schumer (D) "said he liked her ideology. Cumulatively, Giuliani's record was enough to win applause from people like Kelli Conlin, the head of NARAL Pro-Choice New York, the state's leading abortion-rights group. 'They were decent, moderate people,' she said."

McCain Makes "Preannouncement" Of 2008 Intentions On Letterman. The CBS Evening News (2/28, story 6, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Well, we've been expecting it for some time but today Senator John McCain made it official." Sen. John McCain: "I am announcing that I will be a candidate for President of the United States." Couric: "The Arizona Republican made the announcement during the taping of tonight's Late Show with David Letterman. This will be his second run for the White House. He lost the republican nomination to George W. Bush in 2000."

On CBS' Late Show (2/28, Letterman), McCain said, "The last time we were on this program, I'm sure you remember everything very clearly. … You asked me if I would come back on this show if I was going to announce. I am announcing that I will be a candidate for President of the United States. … I'll be making a formal announcement in April." Letterman: "This is not the formal announcement." McCain: "This is the announcement. You drag this out as long as you can. You don't just have one rendition." Letterman: "You're saying this was not the formal announcement." McCain: "This is the announcement preceding the formal announcement." Letterman: "How do you think that makes me feel?" McCain: "You were first."

The AP (3/1, Franklin, Sidoti) reports McCain "will officially enter the presidential race" with "a formal announcement in early April after a trip to Iraq." McCain "discussed the timing of the long-expected announcement with reporters at an awards reception Wednesday evening a few hours after taping an appearance" on Letterman. He "later told reporters that he would visit Iraq first and that his campaign would be about 'whether I have the vision, experience and knowledge to lead the nation.'" Former New York Gov. George Pataki "introduced McCain to reporters before the Irish-American 10th Annual Awards reception Wednesday night. Asked about polls showing him trailing former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, McCain said: 'We keep doing the best we can. We're very happy with the way things are going.'" The Chicago Tribune (3/1, 617K) also runs the AP story.

The New York Times (3/1, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports McCain's "remarks erased entirely whatever doubt could have existed about his ambitions for the Republican nomination." McCain is "known as something of a free spirit, and his aides suggested that his remarks to Mr. Letterman were, if formal-sounding, extemporaneous rather than a result of careful planning by his campaign. Nonetheless, aides said, his appearance clearly fit into the campaign's effort to stir as much excitement and interest as possible in his plans — a point Mr. McCain himself made as he and Mr. Letterman bantered on."

The Washington Post (3/1, A1, Balz, 690K) reports in a front page story that McCain's "decision to use the program to declare his intentions followed a pattern increasingly common in this presidential contest, as candidates have used multi-step announcement schedules to garner maximum attention for their bids." But McCain "may have additional motives for using the late-night comedian's show, as he tries to rekindle some of the spontaneity and unpredictability from his first campaign." McCain advisers "said the decision to declare that he will join the Republican race was not a direct result of concern that Giuliani has gained ground in the past two months but rather part of a long-planned strategy to make his intentions known around this time."

Ridge To Serve As National Co-Chair For McCain Committee. The AP (3/1) reports former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge "will serve as national co-chair of Republican John McCain's presidential exploratory committee, the campaign said Wednesday." Ridge "praised McCain's leadership in a statement announcing his support for the Arizona senator's bid for the White House 'What sets John apart is his ability to form coalitions around a common, principled cause. Our country is at a crossroads and John McCain is the leader who fundamentally knows what it takes to move us forward and keep us safe,' Ridge said."

McCain Finance Committee Dominated By Californians, New Yorkers. The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Morain, 850K) reports McCain "unveiled a presidential campaign finance committee Wednesday dominated by Californians and New Yorkers, including some of the biggest donors to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and President Bush." McCain's 13 national finance committee "co-chairmen include five Californians: Orange County billionaire Donald Bren; investor George Argyros; Univision Chairman A. Jerrold Perenchio; Cisco Systems Chief Executive John Chambers; and San Francisco venture capitalist J. Gary Shansby." Altogether, McCain "named 70 Californians, 68 of them men, to his finance team. They will be expected to raise $100,000 or more for the campaign." Shansby said, "I'd be very disappointed if I didn't raise over $2 million." The Times adds McCain's California list "includes executives in the entertainment, investment, banking, telecommunications, real estate, gambling and alcohol industries, and current and retired politicians." Other co-chairmen "include New York Stock Exchange Chairman John A. Thain; JP Morgan Vice Chairman James B. Lee; New Jersey banker Lawrence E. Bathgate; GOP fundraiser Lewis M. Eisenberg of New York; and former New Jersey Rep. James A. Courter, chairman of the telecommunications firm IDT Corp."

McCain Said To Have "Dissed" CPAC. The Washington Times (3/1, Hallow, 88K) reports Sen. John McCain "is the only major Republican presidential candidate who will not address the nation's premier gathering of conservatives this year." Sponsors of the Conservative Political Action Conference "say the Arizona Republican has 'dissed' organizers by attempting to schedule a private reception for attendees after rejecting invitations to speak at the event." William J. Lauderback, executive vice president of the American Conservative Union, said, "It was a classical McCain move, dissing us by going behind our backs." The Times adds, "Conservative activists have speculated that Mr. McCain did not want to be seen on television 'pandering' to Republican 'right-wingers' but wanted to court those same activists at a reception in the same hotel."

Romney Seeking Bundlers To Raise $250,000 For LA Event. The AP (3/1) reports former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney "wants to sign up supporters who can raise as much as $250,000 for his presidential campaign at a Los Angeles fundraiser in March." The event, "at the home of developer Rick Caruso on March 27, is being co-hosted by California venture capitalist Brad Freeman, a major fundraiser for President Bush, and money manager Robert A. Day." An invitation "for the 'Los Angeles Kick Off' notes that the maximum individual donation for an election is $2,300, but supporters can be named co-chair and

'national founder' by agreeing to raise $250,000 for the event."

In '08 GOP Race, Novak Sees Conservative "Void" Among Frontrunners. In his column in the Washington Post (3/1, A17, 690K) Robert D. Novak relates, "New York-based political consultant Kieran Mahoney's survey of probable Republican participants in the 2008 Iowa presidential caucuses showed this support for the 'big three' candidates: John McCain, 20.5 percent; Rudy Giuliani, 16.3 percent; Mitt Romney, 3.5 percent. Astonishingly, they all trailed" ex-Virginia Gov. James Gilmore, "who had 31 percent. How could that be? Because it was not a legitimate survey but a 'push poll,' normally a clandestine effort to rig the results by telling respondents negative things about some of the candidates. But Mahoney makes no secret that the voters he sampled were told of liberal deviations by McCain, Giuliani and Romney, as well as true-blue conservatism by Gilmore, who is Mahoney's client. Mahoney is trying to prove a point widely accepted in Republican ranks. None of the three front-line candidates is a natural fit for the nation's right-of-center party. Without question, there is a void. The question is whether Gilmore or anyone else can fill it."

Obama Proposes Changes To Homeland Security Funding. The AP (3/1, Pickler) reports, "Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama wants to change the government's formula for giving states money for homeland security, with the early voting states getting a little extra. Obama wants states that have a bigger risk from the terrorist threat to get more of federal homeland security dollars -- also a recommendation from the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks. … Currently, each state gets at least a .75 percent share of the roughly $900 million in the state homeland security grant program. The Senate bill would lower that to .45 percent, and Obama, the Illinois senator, is offering an amendment that would cut it to .25 percent. His office said it expects the Senate to consider the measure next week. A memo by Obama's staff says the senator wants to 'ensure the funding is allocated based on the threats states face, not politics.' But states with big political influence need not worry that they will get short shrift from the candidate's amendment. The biggest benefactors would be Obama's Illinois and other heavily populated states, including White House rival Hillary Rodham Clinton's New York, which would each get more than $1 million in extra funding under Obama's plan versus another Senate proposal." However, "even though they have much smaller populations, the leadoff Democratic primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina would not be harmed under Obama's plan. Iowa would get an additional $119,824; Nevada would get $86,222 more; and South Carolina would receive $175,027 extra."

Polls Show African-American Support Helping Obama Eat Into Clinton's Lead. The Christian Science Monitor (3/1, Feldmann, 59K) reports that Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's (D) "dramatic rise in support among African-Americans signals a shift in the race for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination that is larger than just the black vote." New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "is still on top, but her lead is shrinking. And polls show" Obama "has more room for growth than she does, because of her high negatives. … 'We have a real horserace,' says John Zogby, an independent pollster whose latest data show that Obama leads Clinton among black Democratic voters 36 percent to 27 percent. A Washington Post/ABC News poll released Tuesday showed a similar trend: Obama leads Clinton among black Democratic voters 44 to 30. In both December and January, the Post/ABC poll had Clinton beating Obama among African-Americans 60 to 20. Overall, the latest Post/ABC poll shows Clinton beating Obama 36 to 24, down from a 41-17 split in January. The Post attributes the gains of Obama, who is black, to his rise in support among African-Americans."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/28, Matthews), host Chris Matthews, Eugene Robinson of the Washington Post, and Kate O'Beirne of the National Review discussed Sen. Barak Obama's increased support among African American voters in the latest Post/ABC News poll. Robinson said that in an appearance at Claflin College in Orangeburg, South Carolina, a historically black college: "This was in an African-American crowd. And is he black enough? That's what all the reporters wanted to ask everybody, and people looked at them as if they were crazy. And it was not really an issue for most people. It's interesting. His heritage is interesting. And he's a fascinating guy. He spoke very well. He had the crowd."

Spitzer Not Ready To Endorse Clinton. The AP (3/1) reports New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer "broke bread with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on Wednesday, but unlike other Democrats at the breakfast table, he's not ready to give her a morsel of an endorsement." On a trip to Washington, Spitzer "met with the state delegation — including Clinton, his party's early front-runner in the 2008 presidential race — but when asked later about who he's supporting for president, he kept a professional distance." Spitzer said, "At this point it's premature to be even thinking about questions like that. I'm focused on the state and the budget."

Gore Criticized For Home Energy Use. The Washington Post (3/1, A8, Cillizza, Mosk, 690K) reports, "Fresh off his victory lap at the Academy Awards, former vice president Al Gore -- who has not closed the door on a 2008 bid -- found himself in a more familiar position: on the receiving end of a political attack." The barb "came via the Tennessee Center for Policy Research, a Nashville-based think tank that advocates 'limited government through policy solutions,' according to its Web site." Drew Johnson, in a "release alleging that Gore's house in the Volunteer State uses 20 times as much electricity as the average household nationwide," said, "As the spokesman of choice for the global warming movement, Al Gore has to be willing to walk the walk, not just talk the talk, when it comes to home energy use."

WSJournal Criticizes Gore's Energy "Indulgences." The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A12, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "There is an irresistible quality to the story about Al Gore's energy-hungry Tennessee home, replete with a heated poolhouse that burns more natural gas -- $500 a month worth -- than most of us can afford to use while heating houses that shelter people, as opposed to swimming lanes. Did you know that Mr. Gore's house uses more electricity in a month than the average household does in a year?" Gore is "rich and fortunate enough to be able to afford the 'carbon offset' for his energy indulgences. The middle-class parents who need a gas-guzzling SUV to haul the kids to soccer practice might not be so lucky. They might even settle for an unheated pool."

Gore, Gingrich Seen As "Phantom" Loves Of Respective Parties. On MSNBC's Hardball (2/28, Matthews), host Chris Matthews, Eugene Robinson of the Washington Post, and Kate O'Beirne of the National Review discussed what Matthews called "the love of the phantom in both" the Republican and Democratic parties – non-candidates Al Gore and Newt Gingrich, who had reached double digits in the latest Washington Post/ABC News poll. O'Beirne said, "Except in both cases, both Al Gore and Newt Gingrich, I mean, they tend to trail sort of in single digits as long as their candidacies are not real." O'Beirne later added Gore has "now become this really popular Hollywood figure, and as a colleague of mine said, Hollywood is like a voter repellent to people." Robinson said, "I'm not sure Hollywood hurts him that much, but I don't see him coming back in this race. I don't see him getting it."

Perry Ousts Texas Youth Commission Chairman. The New York Times (3/1, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports, "Gov. Rick Perry removed the chairman of the Texas Youth Commission on Wednesday over charges that the agency covered up the sexual abuse of incarcerated juveniles." Perry also "called for the ouster of the acting executive director, the appointment of an independent inspector general and a shake-up throughout the commission, which runs 13 schools housing 3,000 felons under age 21." The dismissed chairman, Pete C. Alfaro, "is a former mayor of Baytown who was first named to the commission in 1995 by Gov. George W. Bush and was appointed chairman by Mr. Perry in 2004. Mr. Alfaro did not respond to messages seeking comment. His latest five-year term expires in August."

Public Said To Want Partisan Government. In a Washington Post op-ed (3/1, A17), Emory University Professor Alan Abramowitz and Austin journalist Bill Bishop say after the midterm elections, "bipartisanship was all the buzz, and moderation the wave of the future. But something happened on the way to the evening campfire and s'mores. House Republicans started complaining about Democrats riding roughshod into the majority, refusing to consider their amendments to legislation. President Bush announced that he wasn't going to let the opposition of congressional Democrats stop him from sending 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq. Meanwhile, Democratic leaders trashed most of Bush's domestic policy proposals as soon as they were announced in his State of the Union address." One "explanation for all this is that politicians are acting against the will of their compromise-loving constituents. Another is that Republicans and Democrats are simply being good representatives. We think the evidence supports the second interpretation." It may "be comforting to believe our problems could be solved if only those vile politicians in Washington would learn to get along. The source of the country's division, however, is nestled much closer to home."

Schwarzenegger's "Post-Partisanship" Seen As Model For Washington. In his Roll Call column (3/1), Morton Kondracke says, "It used to be said that every American social, political and fashion trend started in California. Let's hope that's true again with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's concept of 'post-partisanship.'" Now, Schwarzenegger is "in the process of trying to put post-partisanship to work to achieve environmental cleanup, road and prison construction -- and, most creatively, a mandatory health insurance plan to cover all Californians, including illegal immigrants." The effort "and the concept behind it -- shared responsibility on the part of individuals, employers, health providers and government -- is one that could achieve a consensus here." But "beyond that, whether it's called post-partisanship or just old-fashioned bipartisanship, what Schwarzenegger is selling philosophically is what every poll indicates the public wants -- an end to partisan combat and attention to problem solving." There is "evidence that some people in Washington have caught the mood. Last week, 10 Senators — five of each party, including some pretty conservative Republicans -- called on President Bush to begin working on health care reform that would 'ensure that all Americans have affordable, quality private health coverage.'"

Government Report Says As Many As 750,000 People Are Homeless. ABC World News (2/28, story 4, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Federal Government…released a sweeping, new report on homelessness. A notoriously difficult problem to track. The latest estimate finds there are more than 750,000 homeless people, in transitional shelters or housing or living on the street. On any given night, there are about 300,000 more homeless people than there are beds for the homeless."

The CBS Evening News (2/28, story 3, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "On any given day, as many as 754,000 people in this country are homeless," and "one-third of the homeless are families with children." CBS (Bowers) added, "This may be the most heart breaking face of today's findings -- the homeless children in America."

The Washington Post (3/1, A6, Brubaker, 690K) says HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson "trumpeted the study -- the first of its kind by the agency -- as a 'huge leap forward in our understanding of not only how many people are homeless but also what their needs are.'" Jackson "called this report 'a powerful tool to help all of us at the federal, state and local level design more effective responses to homelessness and better help those who are living in shelters and on our streets.'" But "Michael Stoops, acting director of the National Coalition for the Homeless, criticized the government for 'spending more time on counting homeless people than finding housing for them.'"

Mehlman Joins Akin Gump. The Wall Street Journal (3/1, A5A, Harwood, Mullins, 2.04M) reports, "President Bush's 2004 campaign manager has a new client, and it isn't one of the 2008 White House hopefuls courting the Republican Right." Ken Mehlman, "most recently chairman of the Republican National Committee, is setting out to advise US businesses on coping with political winds shifting against his party. And the challenges he sees looming are hardly touchstones of the Bush political agenda." Moving to the Washington law firm of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP, Mehlman "becomes the latest political figure to enter a niche in the capital's influence business. Instead of traditional lobbying centered on relationships with officeholders, many former officials pursue careers counseling business about political trends and helping them meet challenges with quasipolitical campaigns that blend strategic advice, public relations and mobilization of targeted constituencies."

Iran, Syria Agree To Attend Iraq Summit. NBC Nightly News (2/28, story 4, 1:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Iran, Syria and the US have all apparently agreed to sit at the same table at a regional security conference on Iraq hosted by the Iraqis." Tehran accepted the invitation "very cautiously" to what "could be a diplomatic game changer." Iran, however, "will be there if it is in the best interest of Iraq," but "want to avoid" the summit "turning into a session of finger pointing, accusations relating to their arming of Shi'ia militias."

The CBS Evening News (2/28, story 4, 1:20, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported the date has been set for the conference, and "it looks now like this conference is going to take place in two stages. The first one will be in Baghdad. And as you say, ambassadors from Syria, Iran and the US, among others, will meet March 10. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad will represent the US." Meanwhile, a second meeting could take place "as soon as mid-April somewhere in the region, but outside Iraq, that would involve Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and foreign ministers."

The New York Times (3/1, A12, Oppel, 1.16M) reports Iranian national security official, Ali Larijani, "indicated Wednesday that Iranian officials would take part in a regional security conference on Iraq, setting the stage for the highest-level contact between American and Iranian officials in more than two years." The "willingness of American officials" to attend the conference with Syrian and Iranian officials "has been widely seen as reflecting a decision by the Bush administration to yield to critics who have argued that it should no longer avoid high-level contacts with Tehran."

The Financial Times (3/1, Dinmore, Smyth) reports when asked if Tehran "ran any risks in meeting the Americans," Larijani replied, "One should not commit suicide because one is afraid of death." The Los Angeles Times (3/1, Mostaghim, 850K) also report Larijani's comments.

In an interview with the AP (3/1, Abdul-Zahra, Lederer), Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said Wednesday the Iranians agreed to participate in a meeting with the other neighbors but "they have some questions" about a separate session that would be held the same day with the five permanent council members. His comments "seemed to indicate that Iran was at least partly unhappy with the arrangements for the conference, and weighing the extent of its own participation."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/1, Murphy, 59K) says the Bush administration's decision to participate in the summit "indicates that the days of working from an 'our-way-or-the-highway' stance may be over." Meanwhile, analysts say that Iran "won't miss the chance to sit down with the US" as "America's apparent belief that Iran can help fix the problems of its neighbor opens up the slight possibility of a quid pro quo -- less pressure on nukes in exchange for more help on Iraq." Like Iran, Syria "will see the meeting as a chance to get a 'foot in the door' with the US."

Washington Rules Out Direct Talks With Iran. The Washington Times (3/1, Sands, 88K) says US officials yesterday "were at pains to reject the idea that the decision to sit down with Syria and Iran reflected an about-face in US policy." The Financial Times (3/1, Dinmore, Smyth) reports the Bush administration Wednesday "dismissed suggestions that it might engage directly with Iran or Syria" at the conference. While "European allies and domestic critics have broadly welcomed" the announcement by Secretary Rice Tuesday, the White House Wednesday "stepped in to 'clarify' the situation and explicitly ruled out" direct talks with Tehran. White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "There will not be bilateral talks between the United States and Iran or the United States and Syria, within the context of these meetings." Some analysts interpreted the "mixed signals" as "evidence that the Bush administration was more interested in using the appearance of diplomacy to appease domestic critics and get its supplemental Iraq war budget through Congress, rather than adopt one of the key findings of the Iraq Study Group." However, other analysts believed that Rice "was in fact trying to shift the US position in the direction of engagement with Iran, as has happened in recent weeks with North Korea."

In an analysis, the AP (3/1, Gearan) says although the Bush administration "says it's not going soft on Iran," the summit in Iraq "could crack the door for other discussions with the last holdout among President Bush's old axis of evil." The announcement Tuesday "wasn't exactly an olive branch, but Rice's mild overture looked dramatic after escalating US allegations that Iran is contributing to the spreading chaos in Iraq and a calculated show of US military might in the Persian Gulf."

McCain Urges Talks With Iran. Sen. John McCain said on CBS' Late Show (2/28, Letterman), "I think it's terrible that the Iranians are" assisting the Iraq insurgency, and "we've also got another problem with the Iranians, and that is that they're building nuclear weapons. … As a country and as two parties, we've got to sit down together and work out some of these strategies together in a bipartisan fashion."

US Participation In Summit Welcomed. In an editorial, the Washington Post (3/1, A16, 690K) welcomes the Administration's decision to participate in the summit as "a welcome way to strengthen US diplomacy at a crucial moment in the Middle East." Although the talks "aren't likely to settle any of" the regional "crises," the Post says "they are a necessary part of any solutions." By "participating and opening the way for conversations with the Syrian and Iranian governments, the Administration will extract itself from a diplomatic corner and gain some fresh opportunities."

Similarly, Victor Davis Hanson, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, writes in a USA Today (3/1, 12A, 2.27M) op-ed that the US "should attend regional talks," but warns that it "should not negotiate directly" with Iran and Syria "until they cooperate with ongoing United Nations investigations and cease trying to destroy neighboring democracies."

Russian FM Warns US Against Striking Iran. The AP (3/1, Isachenkov) reports Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov "warned Washington not to use force against Iran and criticized what he described as the United States' unilateral approach to other global crises" in an interview published Wednesday. The Russian daily Rossiyskaya Gazeta report Lavrov said Russia was worried about Vice President Cheney's recent comment that "all options are on the table" to stop Tehran from becoming a nuclear power. Lavrov was quoted as saying, "We are concerned about the possibility of a military scenario. We are observing a US military buildup in the Persian Gulf. Such a buildup of forces always threatens to trigger a military conflict, even by accident."

New UN Sanctions May Target Iranian Bank. The Financial Times (3/1, Dombey) reports diplomats are "debating whether to increase pressure on Tehran's nuclear program by targeting Bank Sepah, a leading Iranian bank," with new U.N. sanctions. Such a move "would follow a campaign by the US to persuade European nations to follow its example and take steps against Sepah that would exclude it from international markets."

US Intelligence Officials Express Uncertainty Over Scope Of Pyongyang's Nuclear Program.

On its front page, the New York Times (3/1, A1, Sanger, Broad, 1.16M) reports that "for nearly five years, though, the Bush administration, based on intelligence estimates, has accused North Korea of also pursuing a secret, parallel path to a bomb, using enriched uranium." But now, American intelligence officials "are publicly softening their position, admitting to doubts about how much progress the uranium enrichment program has actually made," leading to "new questions about the Bush administration's decision to confront North Korea in 2002." The "public revelation" of the intelligence agencies' doubts, "which have been brewing for some time, came almost by happenstance." In "a little-noticed exchange" Tuesday at a hearing at the Senate Armed Services Committee, Joseph DeTrani, the DNI's mission manager for North Korea, told Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island that "we still have confidence that the program is in existence -- at the mid-confidence level." DeTrani's disclosure "underscores broader questions about the ability of intelligence agencies to discern the precise status of foreign weapons programs."

In a similar report, the Washington Post (3/1, A1, Kessler, 690K) says the Bush administration is "backing away from its long-held assertions that North Korea has an active clandestine program to enrich uranium, leading some experts to believe that the original US intelligence that started the crisis over Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions may have been flawed." In addition to DeTrani's remarks Tuesday, the Post notes Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, "told a conference last week in Washington that it is unclear whether North Korea ever mastered the production techniques necessary for such a program."

DOJ_NMG_0138197

US Discusses Release Of Frozen North Korean Funds. The New York Times (3/1, A13, Weisman, Greenlees, 1.16M) reports China and the US "are close to an accord to let North Korea regain some of the $25 million in its funds frozen in a bank in Macao now that it has agreed to start dismantling its nuclear arms program," American officials said Wednesday. The officials said arrangements for North Korea "to get a portion of the funds frozen at Banco Delta Asia," could be announced "in the next few weeks." Meanwhile, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill Wednesday told the House Foreign Affairs Committee he had "no doubt that freezing the funds compelled North Korea to negotiate."

US, North Korea Talks Set For March. The AP (3/1) reports the State Department announced Wednesday Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill will meet with North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan in New York on March 5-6 "to discuss initial steps toward normalizing relations."

The Washington Times (3/1, A1, Kralev, 88K) reports on its front page that the State Department yesterday "ruled out 'immediate results' from" next week's talks. In confirming the date of the talks, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack yesterday warned, "I would caution you that this meeting is just a first step. … Don't look at it as a meeting that is going to produce immediate results."

Latest US Diplomatic Overtures Said To Reveal "New Respect For Pragmatism." In a front-page analysis piece titled "In US Overtures to Foes, New Respect for Pragmatism," the New York Times (3/1, A1, Cooper, 1.16M) notes that "in the span of just two weeks," the US "has agreed to hold high-level contacts with Iran and Syria, and to start down the path toward formal diplomatic recognition of North Korea," leading to the question, "Has the Bush administration gone soft on its foes?" Although Administration officials "insisted Wednesday that the new overtures…did not mean there had been a change" in policy, "foreign policy experts, administration critics on Capitol Hill and former diplomats disagreed, saying the Administration appeared to have recognized the extent to which it had tied its own hands by insisting on talking only to friends." Even Secretary Rice, it notes, called the opening to Tehran and Damascus a "diplomatic initiative."

Diplomacy May Define Bush's Second Term. USA Today (3/1, 10A, 2.27M) reports, "It happened to Ronald Reagan, and it is happening to George W. Bush. With less than two years left in office, Bush is talking to countries he once shunned." Bush's "new flexibility" is seen as a result "of his desire to salvage his Iraq policy and tamp down other crises around the globe," says Richard Haass, head of the Council on Foreign Relations. In addition, personnel changes, including the departure of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, within the Administration might also have "smoothed the way."

Egyptian Governance Seen Stifling Opposition. On its front page, the New York Times (3/1, A1, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "Cairo is home to 15 million and often described as the center of the Arab world, an incubator of culture and ideas. But it is also a collection of villages, a ruralized metropolis where people live by their wits and devices, cut off from the authorities, the law and often each other." This "social reality" also plays a role "in the nation's style of governance," which many residents say "is not there to better their lives; advancement is based on connections and bribes; the central authority is at best a benign force to be avoided." The system has also "stifled political opposition and allowed a small group to remain in power for decades."

Sarkozy Outlines Foreign Policy. The New York Times (3/1, A8, Sciolino, 1.16M) reports French presidential candidate Nicolas Sarkozy "wants to toughen sanctions against Iran, keep Turkey out of the European Union, create an independent European defense strategy and have a friendly but not a submissive relationship with the United States." In an unveiling his foreign policy Wednesday, Sarkozy, who is the interior minister, called the US-led invasion of Iraq a "historic mistake" and thanked President Jacques Chirac for his "lucidity" in keeping France out of it. At the same time, Sarkozy was "vague" about what the US should do in Iraq, warning that withdrawing American troops too soon would "lead to chaos," while avoiding a withdrawal would lead the Iraqis to "react with more violence, and that would benefit the terrorists."

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. Judge Finds Padilla Competent To Face Trial (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 28 — A federal judge found Jose Padilla competent to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges Wednesday, granting a significant victory to the government in the high-profile criminal case of a United States citizen who was initially designated an "enemy combatant" and held without charges.

After three and a half days of an intensely argued hearing, Judge Marcia G. Cooke of Federal District Court rejected the defense lawyers' request that Mr. Padilla be sent to a hospital for psychiatric treatment so that he could be "healed" from what they said was post-traumatic stress disorder caused during his three years and eight months in military detention.

"This defendant clearly has the capacity to assist his attorneys," Judge Cooke said, adding that Mr. Padilla's case was "unique" and that "he understands that."

Judge Cooke, who allowed limited testimony from brig officials during the competency hearing, said that her ruling should not be construed as a finding on Mr. Padilla's claims of mistreatment during his detention and interrogations at a military brig in South Carolina.

"Those claims are for another day," she said, referring to another pending motion by Mr. Padilla that the charges against him be dismissed because of "outrageous government conduct."

The threshold for legal competency is low, requiring a criminal defendant to have the capacity, on a basic level, both to understand the proceedings and to communicate with his lawyers. Most incompetency claims in federal court are denied, said Christopher Slobogin, an expert in law and psychiatry at the University of Florida, and most defendants found incompetent are clearly psychotic.

Mr. Padilla is not. Throughout the competency hearing, Mr. Padilla, wearing a tan prison jumpsuit and wire-rimmed glasses, appeared alert. When the brig officials testified Monday, he dropped his head and "hunkered down," as one of his lawyers described it, but at all others times he sat erectly and calmly, without displaying the tics and grimaces that his lawyers described as manifestations of his disorder.

Judge Cooke remarked on Mr. Padilla's attentiveness in court and noted that "everyone discussed that Mr. Padilla is polite almost to a fault."

His comportment, Mr. Padilla's lawyers argued, is not the problem. Rather, they said, the trauma of his interrogations — at least 87 videotaped interrogations have been turned over to them, indicating a substantial amount of questioning — had rendered him incapable to assist in his own defense. He refuses, they said, to discuss the facts of his cases, insisting that he has already told them everything when, they said, he has told them nothing.

Before she ruled this afternoon, Judge Cooke asked the government about that. "If the defendant refuses to discuss vast sections of his case, is that in and of itself not inability to assist counsel?" she said.

But prosecutors maintained that Mr. Padilla was capable of consulting with his lawyers and that any failure to do so was willful. John C. Shipley, an assistant United States attorney, said that Mr. Padilla was a principal source of information for his lawyers' accusations of mistreatment in military detention.

"It doesn't make sense that if the root of the defendant's hesitancy to talk" was his treatment in the brig, Mr. Shipley said, that the brig would be the only thing he discussed with his lawyers.

Mr. Padilla's lawyers said that they and their mental health experts only slowly elicited information about his time in military detention, largely by asking him yes and no questions.

The defense lawyers also said that Mr. Padilla opposed their efforts to have him found incompetent to stand trial, which they said was further evidence of his irrationality. He would rather spend his life in prison than spend a few months in a psychiatric hospital, they said.

With a trial scheduled for mid-April, Mr. Padilla and two other defendants are accused of participating in a “North American support cell” that provided money, goods and recruits abroad to assist “global jihad.”

Suspected Al-Qaida Operative Competent To Stand Trial, U.S. Judge Rules (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 1, 2007

(AP) - MIAMI-A federal judge ruled Wednesday that suspected al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla is competent to stand trial on terrorism support charges, rejecting arguments that he was severely damaged by 3 1/2 years of interrogation and isolation in a military brig.

Padilla was in court when U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke announced her decision, but he showed no reaction.

"This defendant clearly has the capacity to assist his attorneys," Cooke said just hours after she finished four days of competency hearings.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen and Muslim convert, was arrested in 2002 in Chicago in what U.S. authorities initially claimed was a mission to set off a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major city. He was held without criminal charge after President George W. Bush declared him an enemy combatant.

Amid a legal clash over Bush's wartime detention powers, Padilla was added to a Miami terrorism support case in late 2005. That indictment does not mention the "dirty bomb" plot.

Defense attorneys and federal prosecutors declined to immediately comment on the judge's ruling.

Padilla's lawyers had asked Cooke to order that their client be treated for post-traumatic stress disorder, which they contend stems from years of isolation and interrogation while in military custody.

Cooke said testimony in the competency hearing showed that Padilla understands "legal nuances" of pretrial motions and noted that he had signed a document verifying the truth of allegations made by the defense that he was tortured and mistreated during his years in a Navy brig in Charleston, South Carolina.

"At some time, the defendant was able to discuss some things with his lawyers," Cooke said. "The defendant's situation is unique. He understands that."

Bush administration officials vehemently deny that Padilla was mistreated, and Cooke said her decision on competency should not be read as a ruling on those claims. "That discussion is for another day," she said.

Padilla is charged along with two co-defendants with being part of a North American terror support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to Islamic extremists around the world. All three have pleaded not guilty and face possible life imprisonment.

A trial is set to begin April 16.

Anthony Natale, one of Padilla's court-appointed lawyers, had asked Cooke to send Padilla to a mental health center for at least three months.

"Give him nothing more than any defendant deserves and receives in this country," Natale said.

A court-appointed psychologist who works for the U.S. Bureau of Prisons rejected the defense's claim that post-traumatic stress disorder impaired Padilla's ability to assist his lawyers. The psychologist concluded Padilla is competent, even if he has some anxiety and anti-social personality problems.

Prosecutors contended that Padilla, a Muslim convert, attended an al-Qaida camp in Afghanistan that included indoctrination on resistance if captured. Assistant U.S. Attorney John Shipley suggested that indoctrination was behind his choice not to cooperate on some issues.

"That is a decision made by this defendant. That doesn't mean he's incompetent," Shipley said. "The issue is whether the defendant has the capacity to assist." 2007-02-28T21:36:27Z

Judge Rules Padilla Is Competent To Stand Trial (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138212

MIAMI, Feb. 28 -- A federal judge ruled Wednesday that Jose Padilla is competent to stand trial on terrorism charges, rejecting lawyers' allegations that torture inflicted during his military incarceration has rendered him psychologically unable to mount a defense.

The ruling leaves aside for now the question of whether Padilla, accused of being an al-Qaeda operative, was mistreated during his 3 1/2 -year confinement in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., after being declared an "enemy combatant" by President Bush.

Instead, the ruling found that whether or not he was abused, Padilla is currently capable of understanding the legal proceedings and their consequences, and that he can assist his attorneys. That is enough under legal standards to find him fit for trial.

"This defendant is a knowing participant" in the proceedings, U.S. District Judge Marcia G. Cooke said.

Neither the defense attorneys nor prosecutors would comment afterward.

In legal pleadings and an affidavit filed by Padilla's attorneys on his behalf, the defense has asserted that during his stay at the brig, the 36-year-old was subject to isolation in a 7-by-9-foot cell with no view to the outside world, was deprived of sleep, a clock and reading materials, and was hooded and forced to assume "stress positions" for long periods of time. He was also, they alleged, threatened with imminent execution.

While U.S. officials say Padilla was treated humanely, a pending defense motion asks that the charges against him be thrown out because of mistreatment.

"Through its illegal conduct, the government has forfeited its right to prosecute," according to the motion.

In ruling, Cooke said explicitly that the competency decision leaves open the questions raised by those allegations. "That discussion is for another day," she said.

The defense had argued that Padilla was unfit for trial because the alleged mistreatment made him too fearful or too distracted to assist in his own defense -- a defect that could render him legally incompetent.

Defense attorney Andrew Patel took the stand to testify that Padilla has consistently refused to review the taped conversations that are at the core of the prosecution case.

"We have gotten no useful information from Mr. Padilla, directly," he said.

A forensic psychiatrist and a forensic psychologist hired by the defense had depicted Padilla as "broken man" who suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder. Questions about the brig provoked sweating and involuntary facial grimaces, they said.

The technical director for the brig, while denying any knowledge of physical abuse, testified that at times Padilla has been deprived of a clock, a mattress and windows, and that on two occasions he was weeping.

All in all, the defense argued, Padilla is now unable to assist his attorneys.

In her ruling, however, Cooke disagreed, citing both his courtroom demeanor -- he appears attentive -- and his role in signing an affidavit alleging the torture. A Bureau of Prisons psychologist who spoke with Padilla also noted that he seemed very knowledgeable about key developments in the case and could discuss them.

Padilla appears "keenly aware" of motions in court, Cooke said, and "clearly has the capacity to assist his attorneys."

Legal experts noted that it is very difficult for defendants to make the case that they are incompetent to stand trial.

"The hurdle that a defendant has to overcome in a competency hearing is very high," said Carl Tobias, a professor of constitutional law at the University of Richmond who has studied terrorism cases since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. "Those motions are rarely granted and it shouldn't be a surprise that it wasn't granted here."

Terror Suspect Padilla OK To Stand Trial, Judge Rules (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

MIAMI -- Suspected al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla is competent to stand trial on terrorism charges because he understands the case against him and has shown himself capable of assisting in his own defense, a federal judge ruled Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0138213

The decision by U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke was a victory for the government, which has alleged in a three-count indictment that Padilla was part of a North American terror cell that recruited, trained and supported Islamic militants seeking to carry out acts of violence.

Anthony Natale, lead attorney on Padilla's four-man public defender team, had argued a few hours earlier at the conclusion of a four-day hearing that Cooke should find his client unfit to proceed. Natale urged Cooke to send Padilla to a mental hospital where he could be treated for what the defense claimed are debilitating anxiety and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder.

The defense had contended Padilla, a 36-year-old former Chicago gang member, was mentally damaged by the 3 1/2 years he was held without charges at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. The lawyers say Padilla was deprived of human contact and subjected to dehumanizing stresses that amounted to torture.

Cooke prefaced her ruling by saying she might conduct another hearing at which she would take testimony on the torture allegations before Padilla's trial, set to begin April 16. The defense has moved for dismissal of the case on the grounds of "outrageous government conduct" during Padilla's time in the brig.

"That discussion is for another day," she said of the allegations of mistreatment. She also said her ruling Wednesday did not prejudice her potential consideration of Padilla's brig experiences.

The judge pointed to the October 2006 defense motion detailing the alleged abuses in military custody as evidence that the defendant comprehends the legal proceedings and can provide his lawyers meaningful information when he wants to.

"This defendant clearly has the capacity to assist his attorneys," she said. "He had to communicate something to his lawyers in order for counsel to file that motion."

Cooke also appeared to fault Padilla for failing to cooperate fully with three mental health professionals who attempted to conduct mental fitness tests. Two experts hired by the defense diagnosed Padilla with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder, while the court-ordered psychological evaluator said the defendant was fit for trial and that any failure to collaborate with his lawyers was "volitional."

Padilla, in tan cotton prison garb, sandals and shackles, stood impassively as Cooke read her decision. He shook hands with Natale and gave him a rueful smile.

Padilla, a U.S. citizen of Puerto Rican ancestry who converted to Islam during a previous prison sentence, was arrested at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport in May 2002, when he returned from at least six years abroad, including time in Egypt, Pakistan and Afghanistan.

Then-Attorney General John Ashcroft accused Padilla of being part of a plot to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" on a U.S. city, and President Bush declared Padilla an enemy combatant. Padilla was sent to the brig, where he reportedly endured months of sensory deprivation followed by alternating extremes of light and darkness, silence and noise.

As the Supreme Court was pondering a ruling on the extent of the president's powers to hold a U.S. citizen indefinitely without charges, the government indicted Padilla for conspiracy and material support to terrorism in November 2005. He was transferred two months later from the brig to the federal court system.

The Jose Padilla Trial (NYT)

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

There were so many reasons to be appalled by President Bush's decision to detain people illegally and subject them to mental and physical abuse. The unfolding case of Jose Padilla reminds us of one of the most important: mistreating a prisoner makes it hard, if not impossible, for a real court to judge whether he has committed real crimes.

Mr. Padilla is a former Chicago gang member whose arrest in 2002 was touted by the Bush administration as the disruption of a high-level plot by Al Qaeda to set off a "dirty bomb" in the United States. Mr. Padilla was held without charge for three years and eight months in a Navy brig, his windows blackened, his every move watched. Then, rather than defend its actions before the Supreme Court, the White House declared a year ago that Mr. Padilla was no longer an illegal combatant, transferred him to civilian custody and filed conspiracy charges that have nothing to do with dirty bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0138214

Yesterday, Judge Marcia Cooke of the Federal District Court in Miami ruled against Mr. Padilla's defense lawyers, who argued that his abusive confinement was so traumatic that he could not assist them in a trial. They had wanted to send Mr. Padilla to a hospital for treatment first.

That still leaves the far bigger question of whether Mr. Padilla was tortured, as he has claimed. For there to be a trial, Judge Cooke will have to rule that Mr. Padilla was not tortured, and she made a point of saying yesterday that her ruling on his competence was not a judgment on the torture claim.

At one point in the mental competency hearing, a prosecutor wanted to introduce what he said was a Qaeda manual instructing captured operatives to claim torture even if none had occurred. Judge Cooke refused, pointing out that there was no evidence that Mr. Padilla had ever heard of the manual, much less studied it. The government has yet to show evidence that Mr. Padilla was even a member of Al Qaeda.

The government's arguments at the hearing sounded ridiculous and shameful. Prosecutors said Mr. Padilla always seemed fine to his jailers, but it was his jailers who did things like standing on his bare feet with boots so they could shackle him. The brig psychologist testified that he had spoken to Mr. Padilla only twice, once when he was first detained, and two years later — through a slit in his cell door.

When a psychologist testified for the defense that Mr. Padilla was "an anxiety-ridden, broken individual," the prosecution said her tests were invalid — because the jailers had kept Mr. Padilla handcuffed throughout.

We will probably never know if Mr. Padilla was a would-be terrorist. So far, this trial has been a reminder of how Mr. Bush's policy on prisoners has compromised the judicial process. And it has confirmed the world's suspicions of the United States' stooping to the very behavior it once stood against.

President Convenes Bipartisan Terror Panel (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Despite initial wariness from Democrats, President Bush finally convened a bipartisan working group to advise him on terrorism, sitting down at the White House yesterday to discuss the deteriorating conditions in Afghanistan with senior lawmakers from both parties.

When he unveiled his new Iraq policy in January, Bush mentioned his interest in forming such a group as a way of improving relations with Congress. Democrats initially balked out of concern that Bush would be dictating the subject and the people present, congressional aides said.

What now appears to have emerged is a plan to have regular meetings to discuss key national security issues with an evolving cast of participants from Capitol Hill, according to congressional and White House aides. The first subject to be taken up was Afghanistan, where a resurgent Taliban movement is posing a strong challenge to the government led by Hamid Karzai and the American and European forces trying to help it stabilize the country.

As described by people present yesterday, the initial meeting lasted more than an hour and included presentations from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Vice President Cheney, who briefed lawmakers on his just-completed trip to Pakistan and Afghanistan.

Judge Rejects Request By Muslim Charity (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

A federal judge in Dallas has denied a request to declassify thousands of pages of FBI evidence in the prosecution of a Muslim charity, but said it was disturbing that a recently unsealed document falsely accused charity officials of anti-Jewish slurs.

In his ruling against lawyers for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, U.S. District Judge A. Joe Fish concluded there was insufficient evidence to show the inaccuracies were part of a "widespread problem" with the government's evidence.

At the same time, Fish advised defense lawyers to return to court if they found more government summaries that were "significantly inaccurate or misleading."

DOJ_NMG_0138215

The now-defunct Muslim charity and seven former officials face criminal charges alleging financial ties to the Islamic militant group Hamas, which the U.S. considers a terrorist organization.

Fish, agreeing with the government, said there was no justification for a defense request to declassify about 10 years' worth of surveillance based on the apparent fabrications found in the government's April 15, 1996, surveillance summary.

The document claimed that two Holy Land officials now facing trial made anti-Jewish remarks. But their supposed comments are not in the transcripts.

The alleged remarks included one Holy Land official calling Israel "the government of the demons" and telling a colleague, "Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests … the sons of snakes and scorpions."

The judge said he found it disturbing that the government's summary included inflammatory language not found in the transcripts.

Defense lawyers and prosecutors had no comment Wednesday on the ruling.

In their motion, defense lawyers said they had recently received declassified summaries representing about 10% of the conversations recorded by the government in court-authorized surveillance. They worried that additional discrepancies could exist in the documents.

"During the limited period that [we have] had access to declassified transcripts, we have discovered other errors both technical and contextual," defense lawyers wrote in their motion.

They said additional errors included a document that was "summarized inaccurately" and misled them in assessing whether potential witnesses were likely to help or hurt the defense.

The Holy Land Foundation, once the nation's largest Muslim charity, was closed by the government five years ago. Its former officials are accused of providing money to overseas charities controlled by Hamas.

The defendants deny any links to terrorism or knowledge that charities they funded had ties to Hamas.

The defendants also noted that some of the overseas charities linked in the indictment to terrorists had been supported by numerous groups, including the U.S. Agency for International Development.

FBI Evidence On Holy Land To Stay Classified (DMN)

Judge denies request to unseal records but calls discrepancy 'disturbing'

A federal judge in Dallas has denied a request to declassify thousands of pages of FBI evidence in the prosecution of a Muslim charity but called it "disturbing" that one recently unsealed document falsely accused charity officials of anti-Jewish slurs.

In his ruling against lawyers for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, U.S. District Judge Joe Fish concluded there was insufficient evidence to show the inaccuracies were part of a "widespread problem" with the government's evidence.

At the same time, Judge Fish advised defense lawyers to return to court if they find more government summaries that are "significantly inaccurate or misleading."

The now-defunct Muslim charity and seven former officials face criminal charges alleging financial ties to Hamas, which has been designated a foreign terrorist organization by the U.S.

Agreeing with the government, Judge Fish said there was no justification for a defense request to declassify almost 10 years' of surveillance based on the apparent fabrications found in the government's April 15, 1996, surveillance summary. The document claimed that two of the Holy Land officials now facing trial made remarks that are not in the actual transcripts of surveillance.

The alleged remarks included one Holy Land official calling Israel "the government of the demons" and telling a colleague: "Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests ... the sons of snakes and scorpions."

The judge said he found it "disturbing" that the government summary included inflammatory language not found in the transcript.

Defense attorneys, like prosecutors, had no comment on Tuesday's ruling.

But in their original motion, defense attorneys said they only recently had received declassified summaries representing about 10 percent of the conversations recorded by the government in court-authorized surveillance. They signaled that additional discrepancies might exist.

"During the limited period that [we have] had access to declassified transcripts, we have discovered other errors both technical and contextual," Holy Land lawyers wrote in their earlier motion.

The Holy Land foundation was closed by the government five years ago for allegedly serving as a fundraising front for Hamas. The defendants have denied any links to terrorism or knowledge that other charities they funded had ties to Hamas.

U.S. Won't Send CIA Defendants To Italy (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

BERLIN, Feb. 28 -- The State Department's top lawyer said Wednesday that the United States would refuse to extradite CIA officers who face kidnapping charges in Italy, warning that European criminal prosecutions of U.S. agents were harming transatlantic counterterrorism efforts.

An Italian court issued indictments against 25 CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force officer Feb. 16, charging them with kidnapping a radical Muslim cleric in Milan four years ago. Although the Italian government has not made a final decision on whether to ask the United States to extradite the defendants, John B. Bellinger III, legal adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said the request would be rejected regardless.

"If we got an extradition request from Italy, we would not extradite U.S. officials to Italy," Bellinger told reporters in Brussels, where he was meeting with European Union officials.

Bellinger's statement was the first time that a U.S. government official has directly addressed the Italian criminal investigation, which is expected to produce the first overseas trial of CIA officers involved in a covert counterterrorism operation.

The trial is scheduled to open June 8 in Milan. Italian prosecutors say they will try the American defendants in absentia, if necessary. Five Italian spies, including the former head of military intelligence, have also been charged.

In a separate case, a German court issued arrest warrants Jan. 31 for 13 CIA operatives accused of kidnapping a German citizen in Macedonia in December 2003. German authorities have said they are unlikely to make a formal extradition request to the U.S. government or go to trial. But the ongoing European criminal investigations and other probes into CIA activity on the Continent have soured relations with the Bush administration.

"I do think these continuing investigations can harm intelligence cooperation -- that's simply a fact of life," Bellinger said Wednesday. He also criticized a recent investigation by the European Parliament into CIA counterterrorism operations, calling the legislature's findings "unbalanced, inaccurate and unfair."

Many European lawmakers and human rights groups have accused the CIA of violating European sovereignty and international law by covertly apprehending and detaining terrorism suspects on the Continent. They have also criticized European intelligence services for taking part in the operations or failing to stop them.

"Instead of stonewalling investigations into its and other governments' illegal renditions activities, the United States should support its allies' efforts to bring perpetrators to justice," Jumana Musa, Amnesty International's U.S. advocacy director for domestic human rights and international justice, said in a statement. "The United States must recognize that it has obligations under U.S. and international law to seek accountability for agents who participated in activities that led to torture."

US 'will Not Hand Over CIA Agents To Italy' (FT)

By Sarah Laitner

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

Washington would refuse any demand by Rome to give up alleged Central Intelligence Agency operatives to face criminal trial on charges that the agency abducted terror suspects, a leading US official said.

John Bellinger, legal adviser to the US secretary of state Condoleezza Rice, said in Brussels: "We have not gotten that extradition request from Italy. If we got an extradition request from Italy, we would not extradite US officials to Italy."

DOJ_NMG_0138217

An Italian judge last month ordered 25 alleged CIA operatives and the former head of Italy's military intelligence service to go on trial on charges of kidnapping an Egyptian iman in Milan in 2003 and taking him to Egypt for interrogation.

Mr Bellinger, who was in Brussels to meet European legal advisers, is the first senior US official to say publicly that CIA agents would not be sent for trial abroad.

The US faces continued criticism from many Europeans over its contentious practice of kidnapping terrorist suspects on foreign soil after the September 11 attacks on America. In January, prosecutors in Germany issued arrest warrants for 13 alleged CIA operatives in connection with allegations that a German citizen was abducted and then detained in a secret Afghan prison.

Last month the European parliament accused some European governments of turning a blind eye to the illegal transportation of alleged terrorists through their countries to face possible torture. The Strasbourg chamber said that the UK, Germany, Poland and some other member states allowed CIA flights to stop over without proper controls.

Mr Bellinger branded that study "unbalanced, inaccurate and unfair", and cautioned that European probes into US officials could be damaging. "I do think that these continuing investigations can harm intelligence co-operation," he said.

Mr Bellinger did not address details of the Italian case. Romano Prodi, Italy's prime minister, is unwilling to agree to prosecutors' demands to seek extradition of the Americans.

PATRIOT ACT:

Suit Demands Details On Secret Court's Wiretap Ruling (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 28, 2007

Group seeks to learn if program requires individual warrants

A privacy rights group sued the Justice Department on Tuesday to try to pry loose a ruling by a secret court that the Bush administration says approved its clandestine wiretapping program.

The suit, if it succeeds, should answer an important question about the future of the program: whether the court will require individual warrants, with specific evidence, before allowing the government to intercept phone calls and e-mails between Americans and alleged terrorists in foreign countries.

In December 2005, President Bush confirmed a New York Times report that he had authorized the National Security Agency four years earlier to eavesdrop on such communications without obtaining warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as required by a 1978 law.

A federal judge in Detroit declared the program unconstitutional in August, a ruling the administration has appealed. In San Francisco, another judge is considering more than 40 lawsuits accusing telecommunications companies of illegally collaborating with the program by allowing the National Security Agency to intercept messages and examine customer records.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco organization that represents AT&T customers in one of the lawsuits, sued Tuesday in Washington, D.C., seeking disclosure of a pivotal Jan. 10 ruling by a judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

The ruling's existence was disclosed Jan. 17 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who told the Senate Judiciary Committee that the judge had approved the surveillance, after lengthy negotiations, and that the program was now operating under authority of the foreign intelligence court.

Gonzales did not say, however, whether the judge was requiring a warrant in each case or instead had given overall approval to the program. The attorney general has refused to make the order public, although the Justice Department sent copies to the federal judge in San Francisco and the appeals court reviewing the Detroit ruling.

The department also disclosed the order to selected members of Congress, including leaders of the House and Senate judiciary committees. Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said Leahy would like to see a declassified version made public and is exploring the subject with the Justice Department and the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0138218

In Tuesday's lawsuit, the Electronic Frontier Foundation argued that the public was entitled to learn details of the order under the Freedom of Information Act.

"While national security and law enforcement demand a limited amount of secrecy, Americans have the right to know the government's basic guidelines for this kind of invasive electronic surveillance of their personal communications," said David Sobel, a lawyer for the organization.

By random draw, the case was assigned to U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who resigned from the foreign intelligence court after the December 2005 disclosure that the administration had been conducting surveillance without court review.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said he couldn't comment on the suit, but noted that orders of the foreign intelligence court have historically been classified. The Jan. 10 order "contains very sensitive information, including sources and methods" of intelligence, Boyd said.

But Sobel said federal law prohibits agencies from keeping entire documents secret if parts of them could be released safely. Whether the foreign intelligence court will require wiretaps for each surveillance is "the kind of question that could be answered without compromising any national security interest," he said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

TSA Union Fight Threatens Anti-terror Bill (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats in Congress are pushing to let airport screeners unionize for the first time since the government took over aviation security after the 9/11 attacks.

Their effort has provoked a clash with the Bush administration and Republican lawmakers that could scuttle attempts to enact one of the broadest homeland security bills since 9/11.

Labor leaders say unionizing Transportation Security Administration (TSA) screeners would strengthen security by improving working conditions and reducing high attrition and injury rates, which cause staffing shortages.

TSA leaders say security would suffer because the agency could not quickly reassign screeners to counter new threats.

President Bush might veto any bill that would let TSA screeners unionize. Spokesman Scott Stanzel said senior Bush advisers in the White House and Homeland Security Department, which oversees the TSA, would recommend a veto of such a bill.

A White House statement expressed strong opposition to union rights for screeners, saying unionization could jeopardize the agency's ability to give screeners new assignments.

Thirty-six Republican senators signed a letter Tuesday saying they would support a presidential veto. That's enough senators to uphold a veto.

The showdown comes as the Senate begins debate on proposals to improve aviation and rail security and terrorism prevention by enacting some recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

Democrats who control the Senate want to pass a broad anti-terrorism bill in coming weeks that includes a provision that would allow the nation's 43,000 airport screeners union representation.

The Democratic-controlled House of Representatives included an identical provision in a 277-page homeland security bill that passed last month. The 9/11 Commission did not address unionization.

Screeners have been barred from collective bargaining since the TSA was created shortly after 9/11.

Most civilian federal employees can be represented by a union, and many TSA sister agencies in the Homeland Security Department have unions.

DOJ_NMG_0138219

TSA Administrator Kip Hawley said he would lose flexibility if he needed union approval before changing screener duties or if he had to fight a union to fire a negligent screener. "If we want to bring in new (security) equipment or move equipment, that's subject to negotiation and delay," Hawley said.

Hawley said unionization would cost the agency $160 million to hire labor lawyers and set up collective bargaining.

The nation's largest federal labor union says the TSA's scenario is a misleading scare tactic. A union would not block security procedures or training requirements but would ensure they were implemented fairly, said Mark Roth, a lawyer for the 600,000-member American Federation of Government Employees, which wants to represent screeners. "They can change screener duties, but we can make sure people get a fair opportunity to be trained to meet new qualifications," Roth said.

Roth said union representation could improve morale and reduce TSA injury and turnover rates, which are among the highest in the federal government.

Federal labor unions negotiate working conditions and are generally barred from negotiating pay and benefits, which are set by law. Federal law allows agencies to "take whatever actions may be necessary to carry out the agency mission during emergency."

States Get Extra Time On Launch Of 'Real ID' (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The Bush administration will allow states to postpone the planned May 2008 launch of a program to toughen security requirements for driver's licenses by up to 19 months, in response to complaints about the projected $11 billion cost and potential disruptions, congressional and Department of Homeland Security officials said yesterday.

The retreat came as the White House and the Democratic Congress headed for a showdown over a broad counterterrorism bill to implement many of the remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission, which called for ways to make it more difficult to obtain fraudulent identification. President Bush threatened to veto the overall bill if the Senate joined the House in extending union protection to 45,000 federal airport screeners.

"The Administration vigorously disagrees with these provisions . . . which were not recommended by the 9/11 Commission," the White House said in a statement. Reducing the Transportation Security Administration's flexibility to deploy workers and meet new threats "would reduce travelers' security," the statement said.

As the Senate began debate on the bill yesterday, eight senators supported a push by Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine) to postpone the driver's license program by two years. They blamed the administration for failing until a scheduled announcement today to spell out what states must do to comply with the law, which was passed nearly two years ago.

Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) said the program, known as Real ID, was an unfunded federal mandate that would force governors and legislatures into unpopular choices such as raising taxes or tuition, or diverting money from education or health initiatives.

"We are for the first time in history creating a national ID card, with all the ramifications of that," Alexander said. "Let's make sure we know what we're doing."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff is expected this morning to lay out long-awaited requirements for states to standardize information to be included on licenses, verify applicants' citizenship status, and check information such as birth certificates and driver histories with other state and federal databases.

Only IDs that meet the new standard will be acceptable for federal purposes such as boarding airplanes or entering courthouses.

A senior Homeland Security official, speaking on the condition of anonymity pending the official release, said that although the Real ID law set a May 2008 deadline, the administration is interpreting that as requiring states to be able to begin issuing compliant IDs by that time. They will be allowed to replace all 245 million licenses held by Americans on a "reasonably prompt basis" over five years.

DOJ_NMG_0138220

States that could justify their requests for more time would be granted waivers, the official said. Although details were still being worked out and could change, two congressional GOP sources said DHS would in effect set a start date at the end of 2009, similar to Collins's proposal.

The fight presaged a difficult two-week debate over reforms backed by the panel that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Earlier this week, 36 Republican senators lined up behind Bush's veto threat, enough to defeat any override attempt. A similar battle in 2002 delayed creation of the Homeland Security Department.

Addressing reporters, sponsor Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) noted that the bill included $3.3 billion for emergency communications, $3.1 billion a year for five years for risk-based grants to states, and stronger rail, aviation and port security measures.

"Is it worth stopping all the improvements of homeland security, adopting the recommendations of the 9/11 commission that have such bipartisan support . . . for one provision that gives quite moderate to weak employee rights, frankly, to people who work every day as screeners?" Lieberman said.

Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) proposed a deal to give TSA workers "very basic" rights, such as whistle-blower protections, a spokeswoman said, which TSA chief Kip Hawley said could be acceptable.

But John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, said workers would not settle for such changes.

Border Patrol officers and customs agents within the Homeland Security Department, and Capitol Police and state and local police and firefighters, enjoy collective bargaining rights, Gage said. Workers from TSA reported injury and illness rates in 2006 that were six times the 5 percent average for all federal employees, and an attrition rate 10 times the 2.2 percent average for federal civilians, he said.

Transit Security Requires Chaotic Approach (USAT)

By Frank J. Cilluffo And Laura P.

USA Today, March 1, 2007

From Moscow, Madrid and Mumbai to London, Tokyo and Paris, trains and subways have provided ideal targets for terrorists. Given the low security measures, high numbers of passengers, and mass transit's critical economic significance, attacks on these transport systems potentially have the biggest impact for the lowest cost.

In response to the 2005 attacks on the London Underground and buses that killed 52 people, British authorities enhanced their security. The measures include evacuation plans for all 275 stations; regular multiagency emergency drills; staff training in evacuation and safety procedures; and randomly screening passengers and their packages.

Most U.S. subways have implemented some measures such as closing public restrooms and removing trash bins, and more than two thirds of rail systems have completed risk assessment exercises. But the U.S. government has not formalized rail security standards, identified "best practices," or completed an overall rail security strategy, three things Congress has called on it to do.

How do we prevent what appears to be inevitable? One possible solution is to create security plans that can be executed with a high level of unpredictability and flexibility — a strategy of chaos. Rather than copy the air transport model by imposing a police presence on all trains or screening all passengers and packages, rail security plans should emphasize random and frequent security searches. Chaotic tactics could thwart terrorists' attempts to plan and execute attacks.

No number of screenings, canine teams, special security teams, cameras or sensors will prevent terrorists from devising ways to circumvent security measures. Besides creating a lumbering security regime that would result in commuter gridlock, any such scheme imposed on rail systems would require an infinite amount of funding. There is no such thing as zero risk, but we can certainly displace risk by using a strategy of chaos.

A strategy of chaos does not mean security "on the cheap." House homeland security committee Chairman Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., notes that for every $9 we spend per passenger we spend on aviation security, we spend only one cent per passenger on rail security. The 2008 federal budget request doesn't improve the picture. The president's proposal for securing subways and all other U.S. rail transit is less than a quarter of the amount of money requested for air security. We must increase our investment in the nation's surface transportation security plans.

Even with more funding, though, we will never have an ironclad guarantee that our 11.3 million daily commuters will remain out of harm's way. This is where the commuting public can become a strategic asset. We must redouble efforts toward a public awareness campaign that will educate riders on how to spot suspicious behavior — and what to do about it.

Congress is right to highlight the need to increase funding for our rail security, but it takes more than money to protect everyone all the time. A strategy of chaos would transform our security efforts from reactive to proactive — deterring predictable attacks on our subways and trains.

Add to that a greater public awareness, and we can beat the terrorists at their own game.

Left out

A family member of a September 11 victim says Senate Democrats invited him to Washington then snubbed him yesterday after he criticized a bill adopting 9/11 commission recommendations.

"They made me sit in the hallway for 40 minutes for nothing," said Bruce DeCell, a former New York City police officer whose son-in-law was killed at the World Trade Center on September 11.

He was invited by the Senate Democratic Steering and Outreach Committee to represent victims' family members at a lunch and press conference that included Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey.

Mr. DeCell, a board member of the World Trade Center United Family Group and vice president of the 9/11 Families for a Secure America, said he was asked to wait in the hall for his turn at a press conference but ended up waiting until it was over.

"I personally don't care if I'm at the press conference or not," he said. "If they don't want me, they could tell me, and I would just go home."

Thomas Russell, director of the steering committee, later called and apologized, saying he was "being pulled in too many directions and he forgot to come and get me," Mr. DeCell said.

Mr. DeCell called the explanation "disingenuous."

"If there were 20 of us and he forgot one, I'd understand it," he said. "I was the only family member who traveled down here for this."

Opting out

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican, said yesterday he will advance a bill that will let states opt out of President Bush's No Child Left Behind education law.

"We're going to provide an alternative" to the five-year-old-law, Mr. Hoekstra said at a Heritage Foundation forum. "We think this is the direction to go."

Mr. Hoekstra said Republicans sold out their principles by allowing No Child Left Behind to become law in the first place, because now that it's in place it will only grow in both funding and regulations. "We are on the doorstep of having a national federal curriculum," he said, calling this possibility "devastating."

The act — which Mr. Bush and some top lawmakers are working to renew this year — aims to have all students proficient in reading and math by 2014 by requiring states to test children annually and to set standards that schools must meet each year.

Mr. Hoekstra's bill, to be introduced next week, would allow state leaders to declare that their state is responsible for educating its own children, thereby freeing the state from No Child Left Behind mandates.

DOJ_NMG_0138222

Mr. Hoekstra said it's needed, since there's already pressure to expand the law. He noted that even a conservative — Rep. Zach Wamp, Tennessee Republican — teamed up with fitness guru Richard Simmons yesterday to advocate adding physical education to No Child Left Behind.

Ridge and McCain

Former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge will serve as national co-chairman of Republican John McCain's presidential exploratory committee, the campaign said yesterday.

Mr. Ridge, a former two-term Pennsylvania governor, served as first head of the Department of Homeland Security from 2003 to 2005.

"What sets John apart is his ability to form coalitions around a common, principled cause. Our country is at a crossroads, and John McCain is the leader who fundamentally knows what it takes to move us forward and keep us safe," Mr. Ridge said.

Campus crusade

Conservative activist David Horowitz continues fighting political correctness on America's college campuses, and will bring the battle to Washington this weekend with his second annual Academic Freedom Conference.

The conference Saturday and Sunday at the Omni Shoreham Hotel, sponsored by Students for Academic Freedom (SAF), will follow on the heels of the three-day Conservative Political Action Conference, which begins today at the same location.

Former Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, will give Saturday's keynote address at the SAF conference, which also will feature panel discussions with student activists from across the country.

On Sunday, Mr. Horowitz — whose new book, "Indoctrination U.," chronicles his campaign for fairness in academia — will debate Cary Nelson, president of the American Association of University Professors, on the topic, "Political Indoctrination and Harassment on Campus: Is There a Problem?"

"In the past year, we have succeeded in persuading two universities, Pennsylvania State University and Temple University, to adopt new academic freedom protections, which — for the first time — give students explicit academic rights," Mr. Horowitz said. "These are major victories, but it is crucial that we address not only how far we have come, but how far we have yet to go."

Group fined

A conservative independent group that ran millions of dollars in ads against Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry in 2004 will pay $750,000 to settle charges that it violated federal campaign laws.

The penalty, announced yesterday by the Federal Election Commission (FEC), is the third-largest in the history of the commission, which regulates election money. The FEC's six commissioners approved the settlement unanimously, the Associated Press reports.

The group, Progress for America Voter Fund, raised nearly $45 million in 2004, making it the best-financed Republican-oriented group in that campaign. The FEC said that it "failed to register and file disclosure reports as a federal political committee and accepted contributions in violation of federal limits."

Benjamin Ginsburg, an attorney for the Progress for America Voter Fund, said the group was not admitting guilt. He blamed the FEC for not setting clearer guidelines for independent groups that seek to influence elections.

In December, the FEC settled cases against three similar groups — liberal and conservative — that acted in a like fashion.

Award winners

Accuracy in Media (AIM) will honor Michelle Malkin and Mark M. Alexander for outstanding contributions to journalism in a ceremony today during the American Conservative Union's 2007 Conservative Political Action Conference.

The Reed Irvine Accuracy in Media Award is named for AIM's founder, Reed Irvine, who was America's first media watchdog.

Mrs. Malkin is a syndicated columnist, author, Fox News Channel contributor and a blogger. Mr. Alexander is executive editor and publisher of the Patriot Post (www.patriotpost.us).

Mrs. Malkin will receive the Reed Irvine Accuracy in Media Award for Investigative Journalism in recognition of her work in three 2006 columns on illegal immigration — "Racism gets a whitewash," "Reconquista is real" and "'La Raza' schools: Your tax dollars at work."

DOJ_NMG_0138223

Mr. Alexander's May 12, 2006, piece, "Pollaganda — media polls as instruments of propaganda," earned him the Reed Irvine Accuracy in Media Award for Grassroots Journalism.

Terrorists Being Moved To Terre Haute Federal Prision Complex (THTS)

By Sue Loughlin, The Tribune-Star

Terre Haute Tribune-Star, March 1, 2007

Unit opened last year, currently has 17 inmates

TERRE HAUTE — The U.S. Justice Department has opened a new unit at the medium-security prison in Terre Haute to monitor communications of its inmates more closely, which could include lower-risk offenders convicted of or associated with terrorism, a Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman said.

The Washington Post has reported that the unit houses "a hodgepodge of second-tier terrorism inmates, most of them Arab Muslims, whose ability to communicate with the outside world has been tightly restricted."

The self-contained unit opened in December and has about 17 inmates, although that number eventually could expand to 90, said Traci Billingsley, Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman.

The so-called "Communications Management Unit," or CMU, "isn't a terrorist unit," she said.

The purpose of the CMU "is to provide increased monitoring of inmate communication in a self-contained unit. It assists in regulating and monitoring communication between inmates and those in the community," she said.

Those convicted of or associated with domestic or international terrorism "may be candidates for this unit," Billingsley said.

It eventually will house a variety of inmates, including sex offenders who try to communicate with victims or inmates who try to conduct illegal activity by phone or mail.

The unit is located in an area that formerly served as death row. Death row has been moved to the new high-security facility in the Federal Correctional Complex.

Prisoner advocates are raising concerns that most of the inmates in CMU so far are of Middle Eastern descent or Muslim faith, which could represent racial profiling.

Billingsley said she didn't know inmates' race or religion, and "that would not be a factor in placement," she said.

The most dangerous, high-risk terrorists in the federal system likely would be housed at the ADMax or "supermax" facility in Florence, Colo., she said. According to the Washington Post article, the supermax facility houses al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui.

The Washington Post article and another Internet publication say that among those housed in the CMU are five members of the so-called Lackawanna Six, a group of Yemeni-Americans from upstate New York who attended an al-Qaeda training camp. They pleaded guilty to charges of providing material support to al-Qaeda, according to a U.S. Department of Justice news release.

The defendants were sentenced to terms ranging from seven to 10 years in prison, according to the 2006 news release.

Billingsley said she could not confirm identities of prison inmates in the unit.

Telephone, mail and in-person communications of CMU inmates are closely monitored, and some advocates say the measures are too restrictive and perhaps unconstitutional. All inmate conversations, both by telephone and in-person, must be conducted in English unless otherwise negotiated.

Under the CMU program, telephone communications must be conducted using monitored phone lines, be live-monitored by staff, are subject to recording and must be in English. All letters must be reviewed by staff prior to delivery or sending; those written in non-English are subject to delays because they first must be read and translated.

Visits must be non-contact only, live-monitored, subject to recording and English only. If either party speaks non-English without prior approval, the call or visit will be terminated.

The only exception to the procedures is for privileged attorney-client communication, which cannot be monitored.

DOJ_NMG_0138224

Communication is far more restricted than in the inmates' previous prison facilities, critics say. Visits are limited to two-hour visits twice a month, they say. Telephone might be limited to perhaps two, 10-minute calls per week, whereas before, inmates may have been allowed up to 300 minutes per month.

A Bureau of Prisons document states that "in no event will the frequency or duration of telephone calls placed by D-Unit inmates be limited to less than one telephone call per month of at least three minutes' duration."

According to the Washington Post article, the bureau has come under criticism in recent months for failing to monitor terrorist inmates' communications adequately.

The Post article refers to a Justice Department inspector general report in October that found "three terrorists imprisoned for the 1993 World Trade Center bombing had sent nearly 100 letters to alleged terrorists overseas from the maximum-security facility in Colorado."

Meanwhile, the National Prison Project at the American Civil Liberties Union is monitoring what is happening in the CMU unit, said David Fathi, staff counsel.

Right now, the Prison Project has only limited information about the CMU, who is housed there and how it operates, he said.

"Any time people of a certain ethnic or religious group are singled out for unfavorable treatment, obviously it's cause for concern," Fathi said.

The Bureau of Prisons legally is allowed to monitor communications between prisoners and family, friends or other outsiders, all except for attorney-client communication, he said.

But if that monitoring instead "turns into restricting or cutting off communication, it could violate the First Amendment rights of prisoners and those on the outside who want to communicate with them," Fathi said.

Howard Kieffer, a Santa Ana, Calif., defense attorney, said he has a client in the CMU unit whose communications have been severely limited.

Kieffer is executive director of Federal Defense Associates, a legal group that assists inmates in post-conviction defense matters. He also has an Internet-based listserv focused on federal prisons.

The CMU inmates are being treated differently than other inmates, Kieffer contends, and, "There is no legal authority for it whatsoever," he said.

He maintains the CMU was not implemented through a process that calls for public notice and an opportunity for public comment.

Billingsley said the bureau does have the authority to monitor communications of inmates and she disagreed that any violations of procedures or law have occurred.

In the case of CMU inmates, greater monitoring of their communication with the community is necessary "to protect the safety, security and orderly operation of the bureau facilities, and protect the public," she said.

Kieffer suggests the inmates have been denied the rights of due process and equal protection. Most of the inmates are of Middle Eastern descent, and many also are American citizens, he said.

In the Post article, he suggested the unit "screams racial profiling."

New Orleans Residents Rush To Join Lawsuit (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, March 1, 2007

New Orleans residents who were hurt or whose homes were damaged by Hurricane Katrina are scrambling to beat a deadline today to file claims against the Army Corps of Engineers.

Thousands of people descended on the corps' office Wednesday in New Orleans to file claims that accuse the corps of being responsible for levee failures that flooded New Orleans.

If the claims are denied, the victims then can take part in a lawsuit demanding compensation for losses. Joseph Bruno, one of several attorneys representing victims, says he expects more than 100,000 to file claims.

DOJ_NMG_0138225

Debbie Simon, a corps spokeswoman, said it expects the total to be around 60,000 claims.

Bruno said the sudden rush to file is due to several factors. It's been difficult to inform people of the deadline because so many New Orleans residents are displaced around the country. Many still in New Orleans are living in trailers or new locations. And many others held off until they realized their insurance companies and government agencies were not paying them what they felt they were entitled to.

"It's been sheer, unmitigated hell," Bruno said.

Victims who miss today's deadline could be spared, however, if a judge grants an extension to the deadline at a court hearing scheduled for Friday. Lawyers representing victims in the lawsuit are asking for a 6-month extension.

Bruno says that there are two acts under which Katrina victims can sue the corps: a maritime law and a federal torts claim.

The deadline for the tort claim is Aug. 29 — the two-year anniversary of Katrina. A claim under the maritime law must be submitted by today.

Bruno is requesting the extension because of the confusion leading up to today's deadline. He said he didn't realize the corps was going to enforce today's deadline until he received a letter from the corps dated Feb. 20, Mardi Gras.

He said he realizes that people must understand their legal rights. "But this is different," he said. "This is a disaster of incredible proportion."

Charles Brown, 47, turned in his claim earlier this week after learning about the deadline Sunday.

"A lot of people aren't going to get their claims in," said Brown, who has been living in a government-issued trailer since his Gentilly home was damaged by the storm.

Judge Is Urged To Back Deal On Hurricane Damage Claims (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

GULFPORT, Miss., Feb. 28 — Addressing a skeptical federal judge, Mike Moore, a lawyer who helped engineer a settlement with State Farm, argued Wednesday that the deal should be approved partly because it could put hundreds of millions of dollars into the hands of victims of Hurricane Katrina by the end of the year.

The alternative, Mr. Moore and other proponents of the settlement told Judge L. T. Senter Jr. of Federal District Court, would be individual trials, which could stretch out several years with the outcomes far from certain.

“This is real,” Mr. Moore said of the settlement. “This is not illusive.”

Lawyers involved in the settlement were before Judge Senter on Wednesday to argue the merits of a settlement with State Farm that would reopen 36,000 previously closed claims of Mississippi homeowners whose homes were damaged by the hurricane.

The central issue has been whether the insurers are responsible for damage caused by extensive flooding. The insurers say their policies never provided coverage for any kind of flooding. In many cases, storm victims say, the insurers, especially State Farm, refused to pay claims if the damage was done by a combination of wind and water.

Judge Senter, saying he wanted to learn more about the details of the settlement and to hear from homeowners who have complaints about State Farm, had convened what he called a “hybrid hearing” that had some of the flavor of a town meeting. At times it was raw and emotional.

One woman, Sheron Weiss, said she had been so distressed at the loss of her home and the refusal of State Farm to pay her that she had “contemplated suicide more than once.”

The judge, saying he had a duty to protect storm victims, had been unwilling to endorse the settlement because of concerns that it favored State Farm.

A lawyer for State Farm, W. Scott Welch, a partner in a firm in Jackson, Miss., said the agreement was a result of “months of arms-length negotiations.”

Some lawyers questioned whether the negotiators for policyholders, led by Richard F. Scruggs, had gone easy on State Farm. They pointed out that the settlement was part of a two-part arrangement.

DOJ_NMG_0138226

In the first segment, Mr. Scruggs settled 640 lawsuits against the insurance company for $80 million. Then, he and the others began negotiating for the reopening of the 36,000 closed claims. The deal provides for State Farm to pay a minimum of $50 million to the policyholders. Some lawyers suggested that Mr. Scruggs was more concerned about the 640 lawsuits than the larger group.

Mr. Scruggs said, "We felt we had tilted the playing field greatly in favor of the policyholders."

Mr. Scruggs and Mr. Moore have been friends for years. When Mr. Moore was the attorney general in Mississippi, he worked with Mr. Scruggs in the 1990s to start litigation against tobacco companies that led to a $248 billion settlement involving 29 states. In the negotiations with State Farm, Mr. Moore served as intermediary between Mr. Scruggs's group, State Farm and the current attorney general, Jim Hood. He recently joined the Scruggs team.

Mr. Scruggs and Mr. Moore estimated that the settlement could result in payments of up to $600 million.

Most of the 36,000 who requested that their claims be reopened, Mr. Moore said, would receive additional money. He said he had calculated increases on several individual policies, including those on the homes of two of his sisters.

During the negotiations, some participants said State Farm insisted upon working out the settlement involving 36,000 policyholders after they had concluded the deal closing the 640 lawsuits. The insurer's concern, participants said, was that once the $80 million payment on the lawsuits became public, the 36,000 storm victims might try to overwhelm State Farm with new lawsuits.

In court on Wednesday, Mr. Moore said that publicity about State Farm's handling of claims had given it "a credibility problem" and he was confident State Farm would pay what arbitrators decided was fair for policyholders.

Lawyers for State Farm insisted that the company had worked to resolve claims fairly.

Under the agreement, State Farm will make new offers of payment to those who ask for a review of the claim. If the policyholder is not satisfied, the policyholder can request binding arbitration, which will be paid for by the insurance company.

Return To New Orleans (editorial) (WP)

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

AMONTH after neglecting to mention New Orleans or the Gulf Coast in his State of the Union address, President Bush heads today to the city crippled by Hurricane Katrina. He's certain to get an earful during his listening tour of the region, which will start in Mississippi. But if the Crescent City's revival is to go from a crawl to a gallop, Bush must use the bully pulpit of the presidency to energize all levels of government. Despite $89 billion from the federal government to rebuild the devastated Gulf Coast, New Orleans's recovery has been slow. Painfully slow.

According to "The Katrina Index: Tracking Recovery of New Orleans & the Metro Area," a monthly report from the Brookings Institution and the Greater New Orleans Community Data Center, public transportation is stagnant, "with only 17 percent of pre-Katrina buses in operation." More than half of the city's schools -- 56 percent -- remain closed. And rebuilding money from Baton Rouge under Louisiana's "Road Home" program seems to be distributed one coin at a time. Only 632 applications had been approved out of the 107,739 on file as of Feb. 12. Guarding against fraud is commendable, but it does not excuse the continual delay in helping those who lost everything and are eager to get on with their lives.

That's just the beginning of the challenges facing New Orleans. Murders, robberies and carjackings are some of the horrors visited upon a people who have suffered enough. Fear and uncertainty about the future have contributed to the acceleration of the departure of the middle class and educated professionals, who were already bidding the city adieu before Katrina blew ashore in 2005. And the population that has been left behind -- half of what it once was -- needs meaningful employment.

Solving these problems not only takes vision, it takes leadership. From the beginning, Mr. Bush wisely insisted that local officials plan and control their own destiny. Yet that does not absolve him of any role in fulfilling a vow he made to New Orleans in his speech in Jackson Square: "This great city will rise again." A presidential push is needed to tamp down partisan bickering and old rivalries among local, state and federal officials and to quash conspiracy theories that the decision not to rebuild flooded housing projects is an attempt to ethnically cleanse New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0138227

One specific way Mr. Bush could show leadership is by directing the Federal Emergency Management Agency to waive the requirement that Louisiana contribute 10 percent to meeting disaster recovery costs; the federal government has issued similar waivers to other jurisdictions, including New York City after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Cutting that bit of red tape would allow the freed-up money to be used for other rebuilding purposes.

WAR NEWS:

Democrats To Attach Add-ons To Iraq Bill (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, March 1, 2007

While Democrats try to restrict how President Bush can spend the $100 billion he wants for Iraq, they also hope to load his measure up with $10 billion in add-ons — from aid for avocado growers to help for children lacking health insurance.

Lawmakers also hope to add money for drought relief in the Great Plains, better levees in New Orleans and development of military bases that are closing down.

The expected battle with the White House over the add-ons is getting far less attention than debate over Iraq, but it could reveal a lot about how much Democrats will be able to rewrite the Republican president's budget later this year.

Bush has yet to veto a spending bill, and Democrats are gambling he'll sign the Iraq measure despite objections to spending he didn't seek. Republicans, meanwhile, may be reluctant to vote against the package since it contains funds for U.S. troops overseas.

Lawmakers from the Great Plains are pressing for about $4 billion in disaster aid for farmers suffering under drought conditions.

The California delegation is demanding help for citrus, avocado and other Central Valley farmers facing $1.2 billion in losses from a devastating January freeze. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., is a powerful ally in the effort to win the region unemployment, food and housing aid.

Gulf Coast lawmakers want $1.3 billion above the $3.4 billion requested by Bush for hurricane relief. Northwest lawmakers are desperate for about $400 million to extend payments to rural counties hurt by cutbacks in federal logging.

And governors are pressing for $745 million to address a shortfall in the State Children's Health Insurance Program that threatens to deny health coverage for about 500,000 children in 14 states. House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis., promised Tuesday that SCHIP money will be added to the Iraq bill.

Obey also has promised to add $3.1 billion for local communities affected by military base closings and for redeployment of 12,000 troops stationed in Germany and South Korea to domestic bases. To free funds for Democratic initiatives, that money was left out of a spending bill approved earlier in February.

Both Democrats and Republicans are pushing extra spending into the war funding bill as they seek to advance domestic priorities that would probably stall if advanced on their own.

That's not what the White House says should happen.

"This supplemental is about emergency spending for the global war on terror and we need to make sure we stay on that track," said budget office spokesman Sean Kevelighan.

Added House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio: "Our focus must be on supporting our troops in harm's way — without strings attached — not on using a military spending bill as an excuse to fund pork-barrel projects and other unrelated projects."

Bush and GOP leaders on Capitol Hill managed to keep prior war funding bills largely free of such budgetary add-ons when Republicans controlled Congress. Now that Democrats are in charge, the party's leaders are eager to use the cost of the war as leverage to force Bush to accept spending — such as aid to farmers — that he has successfully killed in the past.

"It's starting to become a train onto which a lot of baggage is being thrown that has got nothing to do with the war or really legitimate emergencies," said Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H.

Countered Obey: "We will only fund what is necessary."

Whatever is added to the bill in the House is likely to grow in the freer-spending Senate.

Democrats Plan To Fund Domestic Agenda In War Bill (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, March 1, 2007

House Democrats plan to pick a fresh fight with the White House with an unannounced plan to add billions of dollars in spending for their domestic priorities to President Bush's $99.6 billion emergency war spending bill.

The programs being eyed by Democratic leaders, including $700 million for health care for poor children, could boost Bush's war proposal by 10 percent or more, sources in both parties said.

The White House wants Congress to stick with what Bush requested -- money for ongoing military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, repair and replacement of damaged equipment and an increase in the size of the nation's deployable military force.

But Democrats plan to follow the same strategy Bush has used for years to get his priorities funded: packaging appropriations for key projects separately from the overall budget and tying them to money for troops in the field.

Democratic leaders also see this emerging strategy as a way to encourage their liberal members to vote for the supplemental budget bill, rather than risk the party being portrayed as anti-military, and to remind the president that Congress is an equal branch of government.

"He has competition now," said one Democratic leadership aide.

The House Appropriations Committee will take up the bill next week, with a floor vote scheduled for the following week. The likely additions, which two sources said could run from $10 billion or more, include funds to help states pay for the State Children's Health Insurance Program to provide low-cost health insurance for families and children. A shortfall in federal funding for the program was one of the biggest complaints of the nation's governors who met at the White House on Monday.

The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities says 14 states face a total deficit for the program of $700 million. The states are Alaska, Georgia, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, Rhode Island and Wisconsin.

Funds for relief from crop disasters may also be included in the Democratic package. Most of the add-ons are directly related to the military and homeland security, such as money to help with the fallout from base closings and for veterans' hospitals to pay for traumatic brain injuries, a Democratic aide said. Such injuries have been unparalleled in this war, in part because of advanced field hospitals that keep soldiers alive when otherwise they would have died.

Democrats said they would pay for the new funding priorities with cuts or revenue enhancements elsewhere, but would give no specifics.

Sean Kevelighan, a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, said the White House will urge Democrats not to try the additions.

"To include non-related add-ins in what is clearly designed to provide troops with the resources they need, when they need them, would only delay the process and in turn delay these vital resources," he said. "These types of things would create debate and take us off the overall intention of the supplemental."

$4B To Sweeten Iraq Bill (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, March 1, 2007

House Democratic leaders will add nearly $4 billion for farmers to a bill funding military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan to attract conservative Democrats concerned that the measure would wrongly constrict President Bush's power as commander in chief.

Democrats may also add money for children's health insurance in the hope of winning the votes of Republicans such as Illinois Reps. Mark Kirk (R) and Judy Biggert (R), whose home state faces a $240 million deficit in its State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP).

Rep. Collin Peterson (D-Minn.), chairman of the House Agriculture Committee and a senior member of the Blue Dog Coalition of some 45 conservative Democrats, said, "I don't think the supplemental will pass if we don't" add disaster-relief funds.

DOJ_NMG_0138229

Without farm-relief funds the Iraq-Afghanistan bill would lose "quite a few" Blue Dog votes, said Peterson. "They'd lose mine," he added.

Republican House leaders anticipated such sweeteners. At yesterday's weekly meeting of the House Republican Conference, Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) urged colleagues not to be lured by money for agriculture and health insurance, said two lawmakers who attended the meeting.

Boehner warned his colleagues to remember the bigger picture of troop funding.

A lawmaker who attended a meeting of Blue Dogs Tuesday said half of the conservative Democrats who were there raised concerns about language that Defense Appropriations subcommittee Chairman John Murtha (D-Pa.) said he would include in the supplemental.

Murtha said he would include several requirements: giving soldiers returning from the war at least a year of rest before redeployment; limiting the Pentagon's ability to extend enlistments, the so-called stop-loss policy; and stopping the Pentagon from extending combat tours.

Murtha also said his bill would enforce equipment and training standards for troops.

Conservative Democrats met before the whole House Democratic Caucus convened to discuss war funding. Lawmakers at the second meeting failed to reach agreement because liberal lawmakers demanded that strict conditions be attached to funding while conservatives argued against interfering with Bush's powers of command.

"I don't think we should be interfering with military strategy," said Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.), a leading Blue Dog, when asked about Murtha's proposed restrictions.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.) has said he may add waivers to the military bill that would allow the Department of Defense to circumvent Murtha's proposed restrictions, according to press reports.

But Murtha has not yet agreed to including these.

Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.), ranking Republican on the Defense Appropriations subcommittee, said he and Murtha discussed the details of the supplemental funding bill Tuesday. Murtha said he would include his restrictions and did not mention waivers, Young said. Young told Murtha he opposed the restrictions.

If Republican members of the Appropriations Committee and a significant number of Blue Dogs oppose the bill, it may not pass the House, seriously embarrassing the Democratic leadership.

Additional agriculture spending could make it harder for conservative Democrats from rural districts to oppose the war-funding bill. Murtha and Peterson said farm-relief funds would be added.

Peterson cited $4 billion to pay for disasters such as droughts, floods, frosts and snowstorms that affected farmers in about half of all states in 2005 and 2006. In California, farmers lost four-fifths of their orange crop to frost, he said. But farmers could only apply for relief for one of the two years, he added.

Murtha said Blue Dogs have not told him directly of their concerns, but extra agriculture funds could keep them from defecting. Another senior Democrat on Appropriations agreed that "it would help."

Murtha said he and Young reached agreement on military funding levels. The supplemental would include at least $93.7 billion for troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. Appropriators may grant requests to allocate an extra billion for Afghanistan, which would boost the defense total to $94.7 billion, he added.

Prospects for extra children's health insurance funding were less certain, Murtha said. Appropriators may also include $3.4 billion Bush has requested for Hurricane Katrina recovery costs.

Murtha, Obey, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif,), Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and other Democrats met yesterday in an office off the House floor to discuss the supplemental.

As reporters converged on Murtha after the meeting, Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) waved his arms at the lawmaker to remind him of the new watchword: "Consensus."

"Don't talk to the press," said Emanuel half-jokingly as he tried to catch Murtha's attention.

But Murtha has remained steadfast about putting restrictions on the president.

"We will have three restrictive amendments," he said.

Democratic Leaders Revamp Anti-war Plan (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, March 1, 2007

House Democratic leaders are developing an anti-war proposal that wouldn't cut off money for U.S. troops in Iraq but would require President Bush to acknowledge problems with an overburdened military.

The plan could draw bipartisan support but is expected to be a tough sell to members who say they don't think it goes far enough to assuage voters angered by the four-year conflict.

Bush "hasn't to date done anything we've asked him to do, so why we would think he would do anything in the future is beyond me," said Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., one of a group of liberal Democrats pushing for an immediate end to the war.

Democratic protests to the war grew louder in January after they took control of Congress and Bush announced he planned to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Earlier this month, House Democrats pushed through a nonbinding resolution opposing the buildup.

Since then, Democrats have been trying to decide what to do next. Some worried that a plan by Rep. John Murtha to restrict funding for the war would go too far. Murtha, D-Pa., is extending his support to the revised proposal.

The tactic is more likely to embarrass Bush politically than force his hand on the war. He would have to sign repeated waivers for units and report to Congress those units with equipment shortfalls and other problems.

In the Senate, a group of senior Democrats wants to repeal the 2002 measure authorizing the war and write a new resolution restricting the mission and ordering troop withdrawals to begin by this summer. But Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Iraq would have to wait until the Senate finishes work to improve homeland security.

"That would mean we would hold off the Iraq legislation for a matter of days, not weeks," he said.

The House Democratic proposal brought a sharp response from Republicans on Wednesday.

Rep. Adam Putnam, R-Fla., called the plan a "fig leaf" to distract the public from what he said was Democrats' ultimate goal of cutting off funds for troops in combat.

"We support full funding for our troops who are in harms way — without strings attached," said Putnam, R-Fla., after emerging from a closed-door conference meeting.

As Democrats met behind closed doors to discuss their options Tuesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the Bush administration would talk to leaders from Iran and Syria on stabilizing Iraq.

Rice announced U.S. support for the Iraq meeting, to be held in Baghdad next month, at a Senate hearing in which Democrats pressed her and Defense Secretary Robert Gates to explain what progress is being made in the Baghdad security crackdown and how soon U.S. troops will be coming home.

The decision to engage Iran and Syria on the war in Iraq is a major departure for U.S. policy. The bipartisan Iraq Study Group in December recommended U.S. dialogue with Iran and Syria, but until now the administration has resisted that course.

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, Republican co-chairman of the panel, welcomed the shift in a speech Tuesday night. But he went further, urging the administration to include Syria in Mideast peacemaking with Israel and the Palestinians.

Baker and his Iraq Study Group co-chair Lee Hamilton, a Democrat, are expected this spring to participate in a new study on constitutional war powers. Baker will co-chair the independent panel along with Warren Christopher, who was President Clinton's secretary of State.

Dennis Ross, a former U.S. Middle East negotiator, noted that Rice and other officials had taken pains to stress that the talks were an Iraqi initiative, which he said the administration might be using as cover to downplay suggestions of a major policy shift.

"This is a way for the administration to have discussions under a different umbrella but in a way in which they can say that they are not changing course," said Ross, a senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East policy.

The administration said its decision to take part in the Iraq conference did not represent a change of heart, although the White House has accused both Iran and Syria of deadly meddling in the war.

"We've always been inclined to participate in an Iraqi-led conference," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said.

Dems: Murtha Upstaging Pelosi (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, March 1, 2007

To put it bluntly, as the former Marine is wont to do, Rep. John Murtha is rankling some of his fellow Democrats who worry his outspokenness sometimes upstages even Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

The Pennsylvania Democrat has long charted his own course in dealings with the press and congressional leaders. But now after three decades in the House, he's a national figure and his independent streak and sometimes fiery rhetoric are causing wider rifts for Democrats.

A day before the House voted on a resolution disapproving of the president's troop "surge" plan last month, Murtha turned to a liberal Web site to preview his plans to block the president's deployment of an additional 21,500 troops into Iraq. And his statements overshadowed the ongoing floor debate and fueled Republican charges that Democrats were laying a foundation to cut off war funding.

Murtha's plan was "overexposed before it was exposed," said Rep. Earl Pomeroy (D-N.D.), a member of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition. "It was grist for talk shows even before the members knew about it. It made it very difficult for that plan to get off the ground now."

Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.), another Blue Dog, was similarly annoyed.

"I was not keen on him stepping on Nancy's message," Cooper said. "The headline was not what we do here (in Congress) but what he was doing there" on the Web site.

The speaker, a California Democrat, and other members of her leadership team had carefully crafted their public relations strategy to depict the House war vote as a simple repudiation of the president's surge strategy, not a harbinger of future intentions to scrub funding for the war.

But Murtha's comments to the liberal MoveCongress.org, done without the leaders' knowledge, undermined the approach, drew attention away from the Democrats' message and ultimately gave Republicans a reason to vote against the resolution.

"It was a big blunder. People are galvanized against the Democratic plan without even knowing what it is," said a former Democratic aide.

Tuesday night, Murtha formally presented his plan, as provisions for the $93 billion emergency wartime spending bill, to an increasingly divisive Democratic caucus.

His allies call his approach straightforward, contending the former Marine is doing what he's always done: speaking plainly and letting the chips fall where they may.

"Jack marches to his own drummer, yet he's a great member of Pelosi's team, as everybody knows," said Rep. Michael E. Capuano (D-Mass.), a Murtha ally.

"I'm glad that some of my friends aren't involved in such a Kabuki dance," Capuano said. "If that's what people want, that the only things that get done are fully scripted. I've never witnessed a democracy that works that way …The legislative process is messy."

Murtha raised eyebrows in another instance last May when, during a routine news conference on Iraq, he launched into a tirade about an incident in Haditha, Iraq, in which he charged that Marines had "killed innocent civilians in cold blood." The comments provoked a media frenzy that made some of his Democratic colleagues uneasy.

"Yeah, he's unvarnished and sometimes gets out there first, but it doesn't mean he's wrong," said a Democratic aide sympathetic to Murtha.

When Murtha does get out ahead of other Democrats, Pelosi is usually able to rein him in. For instance, he called off his public campaign for majority leader last summer after Pelosi suggested to him that it would be distracting.

"There's one person who can manage Murtha and that's Nancy Pelosi, but a lot of times it's after the fact," the aide said. "He doesn't do nuance very well."

Murtha and Pelosi work well together in spite of his mixed record on party loyalty. Both have enthusiastically backed each other in leadership races: Murtha supported Pelosi in her 2001 bid for Democratic whip, and Pelosi memorably endorsed Murtha for majority leader in November.

DOJ_NMG_0138232

The two often confer on strategy, but Murtha can still veer off script.

His detractors say that Murtha's style is too headstrong for today's partisan political climate. At the very least, they say, he should consult leaders before creating a splash in the press.

"A huge part of the problem is lack of communication," said a Democratic aide.

Murtha, though, has never been one to blindly defer to leadership. When Democrats were in the minority, he was known for cutting appropriations deals with former Republican Rep. Tom DeLay (Texas), so enraging Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.), then ranking member on the appropriations panel, that Obey would storm into leaders' offices fuming that Murtha had "gone and made a deal with the devil," according to a former Democratic aide.

Some political observers say that Murtha's style hearkens back to another political era -- one in which lawmakers spent less time framing their actions for the press, and individual members, especially committee chairmen, enjoyed more autonomy. Members did not rely so much on press secretaries nor did they formulate elaborate messaging plans.

Indeed, Murtha, chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, spends little time consulting his staff. Inquiries to appropriations aides will often elicit the same response that members sometimes utter: "Only Jack Murtha knows that."

"He's an old bull, remember that," said the former Democratic aide. "He comes from the old school when members did everything from one to another. He's also a military guy; he leads and everyone follows."

War Debate Keeps The House's Only Iraq Veteran Front And Center (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Fresh-faced and young, Patrick Murphy normally would have fallen into the category of unknown freshman legislator elbowing to make a name for himself.

But attracting attention has been no problem for Murphy.

The Pennsylvania Democrat happens to be the only member of Congress who is a veteran of the war in Iraq, a distinction that has swiftly catapulted him to Washington's front lines of politics and policy with little effort.

Senior members turn to the 33-year-old for policy guidance. Generals are eager to brief him one-on-one. Murphy delivers moving speeches on the floor about the 19 paratroopers he served with who died in Iraq. And he stood shoulder to shoulder with Speaker Nancy Pelosi at a news conference, emotionally talking about flawed U.S. policy.

"Sometimes I feel like the weight of the United States military in Iraq is on my shoulders," Murphy said in an interview in his office this week. "I really have to push myself to focus on my district, this is so consuming."

On Monday, he returned from his first trip back to the Iraq since his 2003-2004 tour, and he said he found conditions there painfully similar or worse. "It feels like Groundhog Day all over again there," he said. "Before it was like, 'It'll take time, it'll take time.' Well, now we're four years later and everyone was unanimous: We need a political and economic solution, and all we have is a military solution."

Murphy was among a dozen veterans of the Iraq war who ran for Congress last year, but only he won a seat. Murphy, a captain, was a paratrooper with the Army's 82nd Airborne Division. He has co-sponsored legislation calling for a 12-month timeline for redeploying U.S. troops from Iraq and allowing for some troops to remain to provide basic force protection and training of Iraqis.

He said he repeatedly heard from officers and soldiers that the United States isn't doing enough to get the Iraqis to step up and assume more responsibility for their country's defense and for combating insurgents.

"I asked one of my former students what's going on, and he said, 'Sir, if the Iraqis don't get off the sidelines, we'll be here forever,' " Murphy said. "They are frustrated because they know what it takes to win there. We are not putting appropriate pressure on the Iraqis."

Asked whether any of the troops were skeptical of him because of his stance on the war, he said those he encountered were nothing but encouraging.

"I'm not necessarily antiwar. I'm anti-failure," he said. "There's a difference."Lose a Member, Gain $5 Million?

DOJ_NMG_0138233

There's much chatter in the House halls these days about the possible departure of Rep. Marty Meehan, an eight-term Massachusetts Democrat who is on a list of three finalists to become chancellor of his alma mater, the University of Massachusetts at Lowell.

Although the well-liked Meehan would be missed by many of his colleagues, the vultures are circling -- and not just for his seat. The real buzz is over what he would do with his bulging campaign war chest, which, as the saying goes, he can't take with him. Well, certainly not for himself.

Federal reports show that Meehan had a handsome $5,119,677 cash on hand as of December -- a figure that caught the eye of those who would certainly like to put it to use for Democratic causes. At one point, Meehan was mentioned as a possible successor to Sen. John F. Kerry, which would account for the stout bankroll. According to the Center for Responsive Politics, money from lawyers, lobbyist and business interests made up the lion's share of his contributions last year.

One thing is fairly certain, though: If Meehan does retire, whatever he decides to do with the money will be very public, given that one of his signature issues has been campaign finance reform.

Meehan would have three options to move the money as a chunk: give the $5 million to the Democratic National Committee, give it to a charity, or create a personal political action committee. Any other political destinations for the money would be subject to campaign finance restrictions.

A spokesman for Meehan said the House member hasn't thought about the future of the money because his own future is undecided. He hasn't been offered the university post and he hasn't decided whether he would accept the job.

Meanwhile, more people are lining up for Meehan's seat than are advising Hillary Clinton. Among them: Niki Tsongas -- wife of the late U.S. senator Paul Tsongas, who once represented the district in the House.

But like we said, Marty hasn't even gotten the job yet.Better Care Sought for 'Wounded Warriors'

Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) will today introduce a Dignity for Wounded Warriors Act to mandate that wounded soldiers receive proper treatment at decent facilities when they return from war. The legislation comes after a Washington Post series on deplorable conditions for veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Among other things, the bill calls for a Wounded Warrior Oversight Board appointed by Congress, 24-hour bilingual hotlines, federal protections for the jobs of family members who are caring for recovering service members, and establishment of a zero-tolerance policy for pest infestation at medical facilities.Ted Stevens: In Shape but 'Out of Luck'

Yes, that was Sen. Ted Stevens at National Airport on Sunday taking charge and flinging bags off a stalled conveyor belt to help other passengers and, of course, find his own bag. "He looked quite good and in shape for a man of 83 in the middle of the night lifting bags," said fellow traveler Joe Mendelson, who worked alongside Stevens.

When the music stopped, however, neither man had a bag. "Well, I guess we're [expletive] out of luck," the senator said.

Baker, Christopher To Head War Power Panel (USAT/AP)

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — Former Secretaries of State James A. Baker III and Warren Christopher will head a private, bipartisan panel to study a lingering and gnawing national question: Who does the Constitution say has the power to begin, conduct and end wars?

The dispute over the authority to wage war has historically divided presidents, members of Congress and scholars. Through the years, the White House gradually has assumed increased control of U.S. war-making, and it has arisen again amid the shrill debate in the new Democratic-controlled Congress over President Bush's war buildup in Iraq.

Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., headed the Iraq Study Group that made recommendations last December to the Bush administration on Iraq war policy.

The Iraq panel, which was authorized by Congress, achieved wide notice as Bush was considering how to reshape the U.S. role in Iraq, and its findings have been embraced by many members of both parties. Bush ended up deciding to send extra troops to the war zone — essentially ignoring the panel's recommendation that the U.S. remove its combat troops by early next year.

DOJ_NMG_0138234

The war powers study is sponsored by the private Miller Center of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia.

Among its 12 members are Baker, who served under the first President Bush; Christopher, who was in the Clinton administration; Hamilton; former Attorney General Edwin Meese, who was also on the Iraq Study Group; and Brent Scowcroft, a former national security adviser.

Commission Will Consider Conflict Over War Powers (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton are not out of the commission business yet.

After having tried to sort out the Iraq war, the former secretary of state and the former Indiana congressman are turning to another seemingly intractable conflict -- the more-than-two-century-old battle between the White House and Congress over who should take responsibility for starting and stopping wars.

The two elder statesmen, who co-chaired the Iraq Study Group last year, were named yesterday to a new panel being sponsored by the Miller Center of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia. The National War Powers Commission intends to come up with recommendations for how Congress and presidents can best exercise their respective war powers granted by the Constitution.

The list of other panelists offered up by the Miller Center was further evidence of the revolving-door nature of commission life in Washington. In addition to Hamilton and Baker, the new panel includes another veteran of the Iraq Study Group, former attorney general Edwin Meese III.

It also includes another member of the Sept. 11 commission, former senator Slade Gorton (R-Wash.). Baker will co-chair the new commission with former secretary of state Warren Christopher, who is a commission veteran himself, having chaired the blue-ribbon group that looked into the Los Angeles Police Department after the Rodney King riots.

In a brief interview yesterday, Hamilton said he thinks lawmakers are looking more and more to former officials serving on such commissions because of their inability to find common ground on thorny public issues. "The extreme partisanship of the environment leads former officials to try to build consensus," he said. "We are hopeful we can still make a contribution."

"And of course," Hamilton added. "we work cheap."

The Senate's Forgotten Iraq Choice (NYT)

By Lincoln D. Chafee

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

Providence, R.I.

AS the presidential primary campaigns begin in earnest, the Iraq war is overshadowing all other issues, as it did during the midterm elections. Presidential candidates who were in the Senate in October 2002 are particularly under the microscope, as they are being called upon to justify their votes for going to war.

As someone who was in the Senate at the time, I have been struck by the contours of the debate. The situation facing the candidates who cast war votes has, to my surprise, often been presented as a binary one — they could either vote for the war, or not. There was no middle ground.

On the contrary. There was indeed a third way, which Senator James Jeffords, independent of Vermont, hailed at the time as "one of the most important votes we will cast in this process." And it was opposed by every single senator at the time who now seeks higher office.

A mere 10 hours before the roll was called on the administration-backed Iraq war resolution, the Senate had an opportunity to prevent the current catastrophe in Iraq and to salvage the United States' international standing. Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, offered a substitute to the war resolution, the Multilateral Use of Force Authorization Act of 2002.

Senator Levin's amendment called for United Nations approval before force could be authorized. It was unambiguous and compatible with international law. Acutely cognizant of the dangers of the time, and the reality that diplomatic options could at some point be exhausted, Senator Levin wrote an amendment that was nimble: it affirmed that Congress would stand at the ready to reconsider the use of force if, in the judgment of the president, a United Nations resolution was not "promptly adopted" or enforced. Ceding no rights or sovereignty to an international body, the amendment explicitly avowed America's right to defend itself if threatened.

An opponent of the Levin amendment said that the debate was not over objectives, but tactics. And he was right. To a senator, we all had as our objectives the safety of American citizens, the security of our country and the disarming of Saddam Hussein in compliance with United Nations resolutions. But there was a steadfast core of us who believed that the tactics should be diplomacy and multilateralism, not the "go it alone" approach of the Bush doctrine.

Those of us who supported the Levin amendment argued against a rush to war. We asserted that the Iraqi regime, though undeniably heinous, did not constitute an imminent threat to United States security, and that our campaign to renew weapons inspections in Iraq — whether by force or diplomacy — would succeed only if we enlisted a broad coalition that included Arab states.

We also urged our colleagues to take seriously the admonitions of our allies in the region — Egypt, Jordan, Kuwait, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. As King Abdullah of Jordan warned, "A miscalculation in Iraq would throw the whole area into turmoil."

Unfortunately, these arguments fell on deaf ears in that emotionally charged, hawkish, post-9/11 moment, less than four weeks before a midterm election. The Levin amendment was defeated by a 75 to 24 vote. Later that night, the Iraq War Resolution was approved, 77 to 23. It was clear that most senators were immune to persuasion because the two votes were almost mirror images of each other — no to the Levin amendment, aye to war. Their minds were made up.

It was incomprehensible to me at the time that the Levin amendment received only 24 votes. However, there were some heroes, like Paul Wellstone, Democrat of Minnesota, who even in the midst of a very difficult re-election campaign voted to slow the march to war. And then there was the moving statement by Robert Byrd, Democrat of West Virginia, in support of the Levin amendment and against the administration-backed resolution: "This is an unprecedented and unfounded interpretation of the president's authority under the Constitution of the United States — not to mention the fact that it stands the charter of the United Nations on its head."

Americans are gravely concerned about Iraq, and yearn for leadership to stabilize the situation there and gradually end United States involvement. Calling on presidential hopefuls to justify or recant their vote authorizing the president to take us to war almost misses the point.

The Senate had the opportunity to support a more deliberate, multilateral approach, one that still would have empowered the United States to respond to any imminent threat posed by Saddam Hussein. We must not sidestep the fact that a sensible alternative did exist, but it was rejected. Candidates — Democrat and Republican — should be called to account for their vote on the Levin amendment.

Lincoln D. Chafee, a Republican senator from Rhode Island from 1999 to 2006, is a visiting fellow at the Watson Institute for International Studies at Brown University.

Iraq Deserves One More Chance (WSJ)

By Michael O'Hanlon

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

Despite the earlier pledge of congressional Democrats not to challenge funding for the war in Iraq this year, key members of the House and Senate are considering robust and binding responses to the conflict -- most specifically to President Bush's surge strategy. Congress is within its constitutional rights to do so. But in its understandable response to a failing mission and an impatient American public, its approach is unproductive. Rather than force a showdown with Mr. Bush this winter and spring, Congress should give his surge strategy a chance -- while preparing for the real fight this fall.

The House has expressed its disapproval of the decision to increase American forces in Iraq by up to 30,000 troops as implied by the president's new strategy. The Senate, despite a majority in favor of taking a similar approach, has been unable to do so due to procedural rules that have allowed the minority to impede a vote.

More significant, however, are the new ideas in the works. Jack Murtha, a military veteran and longstanding pro-defense Democrat, is considering using his perch as chairman of the defense subcommittee on appropriations to make it very hard for

Mr. Bush to send more troops to Iraq. Mr. Murtha would demand they have every element of their proper equipment inventory, training preparation, and proper rest between deployments before being sent abroad, allowing no cutting of corners despite the state of emergency in Iraq.

A number of key senators would revoke the authorization Congress gave Mr. Bush to confront Saddam in 2002, replacing the original war resolution with a new mandate permitting only a much more constrained American effort, focused on training Iraqis and getting our own forces home. Some of these U.S. officials may be further emboldened by the Blair government's recent decision to reduce British forces in Basra -- and to return them home rather than redeploy to Baghdad.

Mr. Murtha's approach may be good for those troops not yet deployed or redeployed to Iraq, but much less so for those already there who need help -- not to mention for the prospects of the overall mission, with all of its important implications for regional and American security. Furthermore, the proposal to rescind the war authorization seems, almost five years after the fact, largely irrelevant. Members of Congress had access to much the same classified intelligence on Iraq as did the administration prior to the 2003 invasion. The claim that Mr. Bush misled them and the country while making the case for war (even if partly true) does not seem reason enough to justify such a measure.

But the larger question here is of what our policy should be today. By that measure, the congressional debate is off tune. Many of the main themes now being discussed guarantee a dialogue of the deaf between the Congress and the president, with each side jockeying for political position and public support rather than working together to devise a game plan for Iraq for the crucial next year.

In fairness to the Democrats and a number of their Republican congressional colleagues, they have every reason to feel bold. Politics is a contact sport, after all. And with the nation's uniformed men and women in peril, waging a losing fight, there is every reason to play rough. After six years of being largely shut out of policy making by the Bush administration, and suffering the consequences of Karl Rove's zero-sum approach to politics and patriotism, they have had enough.

The Democratic plans are defensible if one concludes that Iraq is already irrevocably and completely lost. On this assumption, the administration's desire to try and salvage something from the situation -- even if just to mitigate the degree of our defeat -- is no longer realistic. Furthermore, any legislative maneuver that can embarrass Mr. Bush or even start forcing him to reduce our commitment seems justifiable.

Nevertheless, Congress's overall efforts are misguided for one fundamental reason: We cannot yet be sure that the situation in Iraq is totally hopeless. It is indeed bad, very bad, and the Bush administration has done a poor job with a war that it chose to launch at a time and place of its choosing. But there still may be a glimmer of hope -- if not to "win," then at least to achieve some minimum level of stability.

While those claiming that Iraq is already destined for all-out civil war, genocide and disintegration may in the end have their predictions confirmed, that does not mean such an outcome is inevitable. There is still hope of preventing a war with millions killed, the establishment of a major al Qaeda sanctuary in western Iraq, and a regional conflagration going beyond the country's borders.

There are good reasons to give the war effort, now almost four years old, another six to nine months before concluding that the current strategy should be discarded and a much different one -- involving far fewer (if any) foreign forces -- adopted. First, the new surge strategy being implemented by Gen. David Petraeus, while still insufficiently resourced, is much more consonant with classic counterinsurgency doctrine than anything the coalition has tried to date. Second, Iraq's Nouri al-Maliki government, while disappointing on balance, is less than a year old and may still improve. Third, and relatedly, the Democratic victory in the U.S. last fall is still fresh -- meaning that Iraqi political leaders are still digesting its significance. Some of them may be shocked into a greater sense of urgency now that they realize the American commitment to their country is finite and waning.

Robert Gates, Condoleezza Rice and Gen. Petraeus have all indicated that the new strategy should show progress by this summer if it has any chance to be successful. While there will likely be considerable debate over how much progress would be enough to warrant its continuation at that point, we should be able to agree that the violence must decline substantially. Currently, with 4,000 civilians killed and another 100,000 fleeing their homes per month, the country is being torn apart. If these numbers do not drop substantially within six months or so, it will then be time to move on.

DOJ_NMG_0138237

Patience makes sense, for now. Congressional critics should, whether they personally support the surge or not, tolerate it for a few more months. It would be better to spend their time evaluating its progress, developing proposed "Plan B" options (such as Sen. Joseph Biden's plan for federalism), and contemplating proper political and legislative strategies to force a fight with Mr. Bush if necessary come the fall, when a new fiscal year begins and a new budget for the war will again be needed. But for now, war critics should, however begrudgingly, watch and wait.

Security Crackdown Nets Insurgents, Weapons, Iraqi Officials Say (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

A top Iraqi military official announced today that authorities have killed more than two dozen militants, arrested hundreds of others and seized huge caches of weaponry in the last week, declaring that a 3-week-old security crackdown was working even as car bombs, mortar attacks and shootings continued to claim lives around the country.

The announcement by Brig. Gen. Qassim Atta Musawi comes as many Iraqis are expressing a growing impatience with the U.S.-Iraqi security push. Iraqis overwhelmingly want the plan to work and are frustrated by multiple daily attacks that have continued even as they have put up with neighborhood raids, house-to-house searches and vehicle stops. Government officials say the effort is still in its early stages.

"We are sensing that the trust of the people has started increasing with the Iraqi forces and they are cooperating better now," Musawi said at a news conference to announce results and new safety measures. "The level of the terrorists' activities in general witnesses a noticeable decrease."

A car bomb at a wholesale market in the mixed south Baghdad neighborhood of Bayaa killed 10 people and injured 21 others this morning.

In downtown Baghdad, two police officers were killed and four injured in a gun battle with attackers after a suicide bomber tried to drive a pick-up truck loaded with propane tanks into a police station.

Five civilians were killed in south Baghdad by mortar and roadside bomb attacks.

Outside the capital, insurgents continued attacks on police and military installations, with a mortar attack on a checkpoint critically injuring two police officers near Hilla and a roadside bomb detonation injuring four Iraqi soldiers near Kirkuk on Tuesday.

Musawi, the Iraqi military official, said authorities were introducing further security precautions, including precluding motorists from parking cars along main streets, and said 24-hour hotlines were being established for citizens to report suspicious activity. He said the government would soon receive sonar imaging equipment that would help authorities detect bombs planted in cars.

Since the new plan began two weeks ago, he said, authorities have killed 70 militants and arrested 450 known militants and 370 suspects. The effort has also resulted in the rescue and release of 17 kidnapping victims, he said.

While supporting the plan, some Iraqi leaders say it will not work unless it is carried out in combination with more comprehensive efforts at economic stimulation and political reconciliation.

Security enforcement "will not be successful if it is done alone, because it needs the other two sides to be successful," said Izzat Shabandar, a member of the secular Iraqi National Slate party in parliament.

Soldiers Shift To Baghdad Outposts (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 28 -- American soldiers are leaving their sprawling fortress-cities and establishing many small outposts in the capital's most violent neighborhoods in a major tactical shift under the two-week-old Baghdad security plan.

Informed by counterinsurgency theory that calls for placing units full-time among the people they want to sway, U.S. troops are using their new bases to work with their Iraqi counterparts, uncover more battlefield intelligence and reinforce, by their sustained presence, the message that they will not allow militants unfettered freedom of movement.

DOJ_NMG_0138238

But along with these advantages, American soldiers say these outposts pose new risks to their own safety and require pulling soldiers off patrols to protect their lodgings. The threats became apparent this month when a car bomb exploded at a U.S. outpost in Tarmiyah, north of Baghdad, killing two U.S. soldiers and wounding 29 others.

At a new U.S.-Iraqi base in the Jamiyah neighborhood of western Baghdad, a platoon of American soldiers guards the front gate and watches from the rooftop.

"These little combat outposts, they are more exposed: Your routes in here are very limited, and they're definitely watching us," Staff Sgt. Marcel Weaver, 35, said of the insurgents operating in the neighborhood around the base. A grenade "attack is coming, I can guarantee that."

U.S. soldiers have opened 15 of about 30 planned "joint security stations" in the capital. They have also set up an unspecified number of smaller "combat outposts." U.S. military spokesmen did not respond to requests for information about how many such outposts are operating in Baghdad or how many times they have been attacked.

Early Sunday, the U.S. Army battalion commander for the Jamiyah base gathered his top staff inside the station's control room, in what used to be a wedding hall, and discussed the distressing trend of violence just outside their base. The day before, a few hundred yards from the front gate, insurgents blasted rocket-propelled grenades at an Iraqi-guarded checkpoint, followed the barrage with small-arms fire, then detonated two car bombs when American troops rushed to respond.

"What is it about this checkpoint that makes it such a magnet?" asked Lt. Col. Dale Kuehl, the battalion commander, studying a large aerial map of western Baghdad. "Why does it always get attacked?" he asked again, prodding his staff.

His soldiers answered that the recent arrival of Iraqi and U.S. soldiers in the embattled Sunni neighborhood had created an enticing target for insurgents. Kuehl agreed that the ambush may have been designed to draw out the Americans. "Yes, they probably have determined that we are here, and this would have been the route we would have taken to get out," he said.

Later that day, two mortar rounds landed about 50 yards outside another outpost the battalion had set up in a defunct shopping mall in the Adil neighborhood. The blasts struck a Humvee, deflating three tires. At a third new post, in a police station in the al-Khadraa neighborhood, soldiers have faced gunfire and a series of roadside bombs planted amid the trash along the one route to the base.

"I'm sure we're under surveillance, and I'm sure they're looking for our weak points, and that's for every one of these outposts," said Kuehl, who commands the 1st Battalion, 5th Cavalry Regiment, attached to the 1st Infantry Division. "We will never finish building the force protection around this place. It's got to be thought through every day and rehearsed."

The soldiers planned to erect new concrete blast walls on the northern and southern flanks of the two-story headquarters this week. Kuehl has instructed his soldiers to assume the perspective of the enemy and practice, or "red-team," ways to attack the compound. Up on the rooftop, soldiers are stationed at four sandbagged machine-gun turrets every hour of the day.

"I guess it is a little scary," said Pvt. Peter Lahoda, 22, as he gripped an M240 belt-fed machine gun in a turret that has been shot at three times from the street below. Positioned next to him was a life-size mannequin dressed in U.S. military fatigues, its middle fingers extended, that is used as a decoy for gunmen on the street. He said the attacks are often drive-by shootings, fired from a car's back seat or from holes punched in the trunk. "Up here, you're definitely organic to what's going on. You see VBIEDs, you see explosions like 200 meters away," he said, using a military abbreviation for car bombs.

The concern over security at the station imposes limits on one of its central missions: cooperating with Iraqi security forces. Iraqi soldiers at the station are prohibited from entering an operations room where U.S. soldiers discuss classified information. They are not allowed on the roof where Americans watch over the neighborhood. They live on the first floor while Americans inhabit the second. While certain information is shared with the Iraqi army leadership, the lower-ranking soldiers are kept out of briefing sessions, largely because the Americans are suspicious that information will be passed on to insurgents.

"There's a potential for a leak," said Capt. Ramiro Roldan, 25. "We tell them we're going to set up our vehicles at this location to cordon and search an area, there's a potential that we might get a VBEID attack there."

"We just came here, and we can't trust them so much," said Sgt. Freddie Torres.

It has been only a month since the battalion moved into the building, which had been occupied by Iraqi security forces. The Americans cleaned up a horrid tableau of human feces, trash and dead cats littering the premises.

DOJ_NMG_0138239

Some American soldiers say the days patrolling the streets and nights drinking tea and playing dominoes with the Iraqis have fashioned a fledgling camaraderie. The Americans also have grown closer to one another while enduring the spartan lodgings -- sleeping on cots, living without showers or toilets, burning their waste -- that feel far removed from the buffet dinners and air-conditioned gyms on the Camp Liberty base, near the Baghdad airport, they left behind.

"Liberty's like being in Kuwait," Torres said. "If we stayed at Liberty the whole time, then we're not bringing the fight to them. This at least gives us an intimidation factor, knowing we're out here on the grind ready to take it to them."

Kuehl said he believes that over time, operating out of smaller bases will be safer for his soldiers as the neighbors grow to appreciate their backyard policemen and act as an alarm system about impending trouble.

"We're going to get more information, and when we get that information, we can target better, and if we target better, we can get more bad guys off the street and we don't hurt the locals while we do it," he said. "And the other part of getting out here, and I think it's something we've missed in the mission for a while . . . is our purpose to protect the people."

U.S. commanders say they choose the location of the security stations and combat outposts based on where soldiers can most disrupt the insurgency. Kuehl said he moved a platoon into the second floor of the al-Khadraa outpost to stop insurgent weapons traffic through the area.

In the first 10 days since soldiers moved in, drive-by shooters have taken potshots and at least four bombs have exploded on the road outside the entrance, said Lt. Brian Larsen, 23, the platoon leader.

"As far as force protection measures go, this place needs improvement," said Sgt. 1st Class Kenneth Chaney.

The soldiers have stacked sandbags in their bedroom windows and draped green netting over their gun positions, and they are making plans to install light fixtures outside and raise the exterior walls by several feet to limit the risk from gunfire.

Sitting on his bunk inside the police station, Sgt. James Simpson, 30, of Atlanta, said grunts like him are prepared for the threats surrounding them.

"It's definitely more exposed, but that's the risk we take," he said. "The safest thing for everybody is to hurry up and beat these guys."

Saddam Ammo Still Kills Troops (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Four years after the Iraq war began, the country remains awash in Saddam-era munitions that provide key ingredients for homemade bombs used against U.S. troops, according to administration documents and military officials.

More than $1 billion has been spent to clear about 15,000 sites of the unsecured weapons. To clear the remaining 3,391 sites, the Pentagon says it needs a portion of a $1.2 billion request for items to protect U.S. troops in Iraq.

Improvised explosive devices that use the munitions have killed or wounded thousands of U.S. troops. Defense Secretary Robert Gates estimates that 70% of U.S. casualties in Iraq stem from IEDs.

"Insurgents use munitions from stolen caches to construct IEDs," according to the Pentagon's budget request released last month.

Hundreds of buildings, in-ground bunkers, warehouses and buried caches also contain uncleared ammunition, the Pentagon budget request shows. The Army Corps of Engineers runs the munitions-clearance program.

The problem of unsecured munitions was obvious soon after the fall of Saddam Hussein in spring 2003, Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I. said.

Reed, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee and former Army officer, said there weren't enough U.S. troops in Iraq to destroy the weapons. The munitions include bullets, artillery shells and missiles.

"It should have been taken care of immediately," Reed said.

Eliminating the munitions is a huge task, said Bill Sargent, who runs the munitions-clearance program for the Army Corps of Engineers.

More than 400,000 tons of weapons have been destroyed, and 19,000 tons have been set aside for the Iraqi army, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0138240

"There's no telling how many soldiers and Iraqi civilians that we've saved by the amount of stuff we're taking off the streets," Sargent said.

Munitions experts plan to have all major weapons sites in Iraq secured by April, Sargent said. They'll then move to smaller sites.

Allied troops find new ammunition sites in Iraq every day, Sargent said, which makes it hard to get exact details on how much loose ammunition remains.

It might be impossible to stem the supply of materials for IEDs because Iraq has so many weapons, said John Pike, director of military think tank GlobalSecurity.org.

Saddam "never wanted to run out of bullets," Pike said. "And he never did."

Local Sheik In Ramadi Adds Detail On Attack (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño And Naseer Mehdawi

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 28 -- A community leader in the western Iraqi city of Ramadi provided additional information Wednesday about a deadly car bombing earlier this week that U.S. officials said did not occur.

Raad Sabah al-Mukeilef, a sheik who said he lives about 500 yards from where the bomb exploded Monday, said in a telephone interview Wednesday that he believes members of the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq set off the bomb near a playground after being unable to get past a checkpoint that leads to his house, which is near a government building.

Children, ages 4 to 17, were playing soccer when a man at the wheel of a small truck pulled up next to the checkpoint, he said.

"He came in a pickup," Mukeilef said. "Instead of coming in my street, he did it in a small park for children." Mukeilef said he has participated in a U.S.-backed group of sheiks opposed to Sunni insurgents.

Mukeilef's account corroborated information provided Tuesday by Col. Tariq al-Alwani, the security supervisor in Anbar province in western Iraq. Both men said the blast killed 16 children and three women, one of whom died Wednesday from her wounds. Ramadi is the provincial capital.

A U.S. military official denied on Wednesday that children had been killed in a bombing in Ramadi. The U.S. military said it detonated a seized cache of explosives Tuesday elsewhere in Ramadi, injuring at least 30 civilians who were struck by flying glass and debris because military officials misjudged the power of the explosives. Some initial news reports indicated that children playing soccer at that location had been killed.

"We ran this down," said Rear Adm. Mark Fox, a top military spokesman in Iraq, at a briefing Wednesday. "There was no second blast and there were not 18 children killed. The soccer field that was touted in the erroneous report was across the street from the structure that was in the controlled detonation."

Mukeilef and Alwani said the detonation and the truck bombing occurred in separate parts of the city.

Another military official responded Wednesday night to an inquiry about the new accounts of Monday's bombing by reissuing the news release about Tuesday's "controlled" cache detonation.

Mukeilef said no U.S. military personnel responded to the bombing scene. News of Monday's blast traveled slowly because most reporters have fled Ramadi, a Sunni insurgent stronghold, fearing for their safety.

"We are very isolated," he said. "We don't have any media."

On Wednesday morning, another car bomb killed 10 people in southwest Baghdad in the Bayya district, according to Lt. Col. Salam Hanoun, a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry. The blast also wounded at least nine people and set cars and shops on fire.

Also Wednesday, the U.S. military said an American soldier was fatally shot Tuesday in western Baghdad.

Meanwhile, Syrian and Iranian officials confirmed they will attend a regional security conference in Baghdad on March 10, the Associated Press reported. The conference will include American representatives. U.S. officials have accused Syria and Iran of exacerbating violence in Iraq. The conference opens a door to diplomatic talks between Washington and representatives of those two countries.

Sunnis - Not Shiites - Biggest Threat To U.S. Troops (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sunni Muslim insurgents remain by far the biggest threat to American troops in Iraq, despite recent U.S. claims that Iran is providing Shiite Muslim militia groups with a new type of roadside bomb, a review of American casualty reports shows.

While U.S. military officials have held briefings to publicize their concerns about the potent bombs known as explosively formed projectiles (EFPs) or penetrators, casualty reports suggest that such weapons in the hands of Shiite militias are responsible for a relatively small number of American deaths.

U.S. officials have said that attacks with such weapons increased 150 percent in the past year. But a review of bombings by location shows that less than 10 percent of attacks that killed at least two American service members in the past 14 months were in areas where Shiite militias are dominant.

Those reports show that fewer than half the bomb attacks on heavily armored U.S. vehicles such as Abrams tanks and Bradley Fighting Vehicles were in areas where Shiite militias dominate.

While it's difficult to know which armed group planted a bomb, analysts say the casualty numbers show that U.S. officials are exaggerating the importance of EFPs, which military officials say have been used only by Shiites.

"There were relatively few American deaths from explosively formed penetrators until recently, but you can say the same thing about attacks on helicopters or chlorine attacks," said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst with the Lexington Institute, a policy research group in Arlington, Va. "The fact of the matter is that the insurgents, both Sunni and Shiite, are becoming a lot more sophisticated in their tactics. Explosively formed penetrators are only one part of that, and they are not a particularly important part."

Pentagon officials say the issue is important because the Iranian government appears to be involved.

"I think the issue is not whether or not materials and supplies are coming from Iran - they are - but rather how far up the Iranian leadership is involved," said Bryan Whitman, the Pentagon's chief spokesman.

U.S. military officials accuse Iran of supplying Shiite militants with EFPs, which fire a molten slug of metal that can punch through the thickest American armor, including tanks and other vehicles designed to withstand heavy blasts. The officials say the bombs have killed at least 170 U.S. and allied service members and wounded more than 620 since they were first discovered on the battlefield in mid-2004.

Those officials have declined to provide other information about the bombs' use, including when and where the explosions that killed Americans took place. They say that such information would tip off the enemy to its successes.

Roadside bombs have killed at least 1,150 Americans since the war began, according to Coalition Casualty Count, a Web site that tracks coalition casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan. Of those, 496 died from Dec. 1, 2005, through Jan. 31 of this year.

U.S. military officials point to the discovery of a weapons cache in a Shiite village near Baqouba, about 40 miles from Baghdad, as the latest evidence that Iran is supplying Shiite militants with weapons.

On Monday, the Defense Department posted a video of the discovery on the Web and American officers in Baghdad displayed weapons seized in the raid, including rocket-propelled grenades, 120 mm mortars and 122 mm rockets that they said bore markings that proved the weapons were made in Iran last year.

The find also included artillery rounds, land mines, detonation cord, triggering devices, C-4 explosives and more than 140 metal discs, which U.S. military officers said were components for making EFPs.

Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, the No. 2 commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, said earlier this week that the weapons clearly were linked to Iran.

"The mortar tubes were made in Iran," he said. "We know that the pieces of the explosively formed projectiles, the machine pieces, were made in Iran. So we know they're being developed and brought into Iraq."

Odierno said on CNN this week that he was convinced that the EFP materials were coming from Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0138242

"We have tried to see people replicate them here in Iraq, and they have not been able to do it," he said. "The machining required, the materials that are required, we think absolutely are coming from Iran, and you saw the big cache we found just the other day - almost 140 of these could be produced from that cache that we found."

Odierno said Iran's al Quds commando force was involved either in training or supplying Shiite groups, but the full extent of the Iranian government's involvement remains unclear.

Analysts say the evidence is far from clear that Iran could be the only source for the bomb components.

"Explosively formed penetrators are not some exclusive franchise for the Iranians," Thompson said. "They are fairly common around the world."

Explosively formed penetrators are also known as shaped charges. The warheads were developed after World War I to penetrate tanks and other armored vehicles. Rocket-propelled grenades and antitank missiles are conventional examples. Shaped charges also are used in the oil and gas industry.

John Pike, the executive director of GlobalSecurity.org, an online clearinghouse for military, intelligence and homeland-security information, said that while designing a shaped charge would require expertise, fabricating the devices was simpler, requiring only skill in using metal-machining tools.

"These are not factory-produced munitions," he said.

Asked who'd have the expertise to manufacture a shaped charge, Pike cited "people who had worked with explosives in the petroleum industry." In Iraq, he said, "there would be a fair number of those."

Roadside bombs have been the No. 1 killer of U.S. service members in Iraq for years, though the numbers were dropping last year compared with the year before until October, when they shot up sharply, according to the Coalition Casualty Count Web site. December was the deadliest month of the war for roadside bombs, with 67 American deaths, nearly half of which were in Baghdad.

Overall, however, the number of U.S. deaths from IEDs in 2006 was up less than 6 percent from the year before; 419 last year compared with 397 in 2005, according to Coalition Casualty Count.

The spike in the last quarter of the year corresponded with an increased use of explosively formed projectiles during the same period, according to American defense officials. Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said on the Senate floor recently that 90 percent of the EFPs detonated in Iraq had been used in Baghdad.

U.S. military officials say EFPs are more dangerous than other types of roadside bombs because they typically produce more casualties.

American casualty reports show that the deadliest roadside-bomb attacks of the war have occurred in predominantly Sunni areas or areas with mixed ethnic and religious populations.

Of the 81 roadside bomb attacks that killed two or more soldiers from December 2005 through January 2007, one-quarter occurred in western Iraq, which is predominantly Sunni, and nearly two-thirds took place in Baghdad and other ethnically and religiously mixed areas, the reports show. Fewer than 10 percent were in predominantly Shiite areas.

Of the 10 fatal bomb attacks on M1 Abrams tanks in the same period, four were in Baghdad and four in Anbar province, a mostly Sunni area. One each occurred in Balad and Taji, which have large Sunni populations and big U.S. bases.

Of the 11 fatal attacks on Bradley Fighting Vehicles during that period, four were in Baghdad. Four were in Taji, and one each occurred in Ramadi, Balad and al Muqdadiyah, all of which have large concentrations of Sunnis.

The three worst attacks on Bradleys were in Taji: Three American soldiers died in a roadside bombing Feb. 22, three in an attack last April 11 and four in a bombing Aug. 27.

US Post-Iraq Invasion Policies 'Incompetent': US Diplomat (AFP)

AFP, March 1, 2007

The US policy in Iraq following the 2003 invasion was "incompetent, foolish, dubious," the new US coordinator for Iraq's economic development said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0138243

Ambassador Timothy Carney told NPR radio that the US policy to exclude Iraqis from governing the country in the two years following the invasion was "an enormous foolishness" which contributed to the deterioration of security and lengthened the conflict in the country.

"We don't need to go into detail on that, but I think words such as incompetent, foolish, dubious in all of its aspects are the most charitable way to look at that period," he said.

Carney went to Iraq shortly after the March 2003 invasion to manage the country's industry and minerals ministry, but quit after two months and became an outspoken critic of US occupation policy.

"The major failing of policy and operations in 2003 was the failure to invite Iraqis into our councils. We actually thought we could govern this country," he told NPR.

"It was enormously costly in terms of time, and consequently in terms of our and Iraqi blood and the blood of many of our allies."

"What an enormous foolishness that was."

Carney, recently named by the White House to return to oversee rebuilding of the country, said he was appalled by the deterioration in the security situation since he was first there.

But he said he thought the United States still had a chance to achieve some if not all of its policy goals in the country.

"The Iraqis I've met with remain the very same smart, imaginative, creative and impatient people whom I met in 2003.

"It's for those reasons that I continue to believe that this effort can come out to the benefit of Iraq, perhaps not realizing all of the policy goals the United States seeks here, but certainly far more than we deserve, given the way we approached this in 2003 and 2004."

Iraq Carney Finds New Role: Reconstructing Iraq (NPR)

Morning Edition, February 28, 2007 · Diplomat Tim Carney left Iraq three years ago — angry and outspoken about United States policy there. Now the administration has asked him to return as the economic coordinator.

It's a surprise invitation for an official who has said that the U.S. was not listening to Iraqis after the invasion, and formulating policy in isolation from the people it affected.

Carney is a veteran diplomat; over the last three decades, he has served in Cambodia, Haiti and Sudan, among other posts. In his return Baghdad news conference, he stood by his earlier criticism of administration policy in Iraq.

"In 2003, the coalition, notably the United States, failed to invite Iraqis into our councils," Carney said. "And that failure is what has led to the situation in which the country finds itself today."

It's a situation where U.S. federal oversight agencies say billions of dollars in aid was wasted. But Carney says the situation is improving.

"The big difference now is that Iraqis are inviting us into their councils to try to help use our resources to actually get things done," Carney said.

As economic coordinator, Carney will juggle a dizzying, and often overlapping, list of U.S. funding organizations, including USAID, the U.S. Treasury, the U.S. Army Corp of Engineers and others.

But with American reconstruction money drying up, Carney's biggest job will be to help Iraqis spend their own money, primarily from oil revenues.

Despite the deteriorating state of the country's electricity system, road networks and other public services, the ministries have managed to spend as little as 15 percent of their budgets.

The reasons are numerous, including problems finding companies to work under dangerous conditions, a lack of skilled contracting officers and U.S. anti-corruption programs that have intimidated bureaucrats.

DOJ_NMG_0138244

"This is still a relatively new government. This government needs to demonstrate convincingly to the Iraqi people that they are governing for the benefit of all Iraqis," Carney said.

In part, Carney will rely on the State Department's "provincial reconstruction teams," known as PRTs.

The PRT program was launched a year ago to help the Iraqi government function better. There are 10 branch offices around the country.

Because of security concerns, the Baghdad PRT is a well-guarded office inside the heavily fortified Green Zone. If getting into the office is difficult, getting out to meet the Iraqi officials they want to help is even more so.

Each time he wants to leave, Deputy Director Bob Ruck has to organize an elaborate security convoy.

"We're trying to teach governance right now two hours at a time," Ruck said. "You get in a convoy, you drive down there, you meet with them, you leave; it's frustrating."

Ruck wants to place staff full time in key government offices. But security is an issue standing in the way of staff integration.

The program has also been criticized for not having people with the right backgrounds on staff. Baghdad PRT Director Joe Gregoire admits the State Department has had trouble hiring skilled people to work on PRTs.

"The problems is finding people who are very specific to certain subject matters," Gregoire said. "[Like] real business development [people], as you would expect from people who might be working for the Department of Commerce."

President Bush proposed last month doubling the number of teams, saying such civilians are now central to American efforts.

But just filling the jobs of the original PRTs is a challenge. U.S. officials say expanding them will take until the end of the year, at least. By then officials hope the risks will not be as great as they are now.

Death Penalty Gets A 2nd Global Look (WT)

By Betsy Pisik, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK -- The senior U.N. human rights official yesterday said she senses a global interest in revising the death penalty, triggered in part by the public execution of former Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein.

Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, said she does not expect to see a "spontaneous uprising or outcry" against capital punishment, but she does perceive a willingness among governments to consider restricting the death penalty -- or at least opening up the opaque process.

"I sense that this year there is an opportunity to move towards abolition in some countries, moratorium in others and transparency in some which still surround the application of the death penalty with secrecy," Mrs. Arbour told reporters here yesterday.

"The call for abolition is rarely the result of a spontaneous enlightenment. It is usually triggered by an event in countries that have the courage to face their own shortcomings," she said. "This event is sometimes a demonstrated wrongful conviction."

The executions in Iraq of Saddam and two of his associates "may have created an environment in which people are asking a lot of serious questions" about the need for a review of capital punishment, she said.

Saddam was hanged in December. Shouting and jeering by Shi'ites at the execution, which was caught on a cell-phone camera, drew condemnation from President Bush and other world leaders. When Saddam's half brother Barazan Ibrahim was hanged in January, his head was severed.

Mrs. Arbour was pragmatic on whether her agency could make inroads in the United States, where capital punishment is administered by states and appears to have popular support.

She indicated that she would not be bringing up the matter with the U.S. government or courts the same way her office does in other, more receptive countries.

"If the courts are willing to listen to us, we are not going to shy away," Mrs. Arbour said. "It depends on our own capacity to make a contribution in a case where the advocacy of international standards are not likely to be advanced by others."

Mrs. Arbour, a former Canadian justice and a prosecutor for the international criminal tribunals for Rwanda and Yugoslavia, is a tough-minded and plain-spoken advocate for what she sees as basic human rights.

The official U.N. position is that it respects the domestic laws of member states. However, Mrs. Arbour and others in the human rights sphere say that all people have the right to life, a de facto repudiation of capital punishment.

The Web site of the U.N. special rapporteur for extrajudicial, summary and arbitrary executions, Philip Alston, notes, in part: "Given that the loss of life is irreparable, the Special Rapporteur ... emphasizes that the abolition of capital punishment is most desirable in order fully to respect the right to life. He also wishes to mention that, while there is a fundamental right to life, there is no such right to capital punishment."

According to Amnesty International, 88 nations and territories have explicitly outlawed the death penalty, while 69 permit capital punishment for crimes of varying degrees of severity from rape to treason.

The European Union has shelved capital punishment, while the United States, Iran, Iraq, China and South Korea are among those that impose it.

U.S. Knew Of Threats As Cheney Visited Base (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa And Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 28 — NATO and American forces knew that a suicide bomber was at large in the Bagram area before the suicide bomb attack on Tuesday that killed 23 people at the main gate of the United States air base where Vice President Dick Cheney was staying, a NATO spokesman said Wednesday. But despite the vice president's presence, the Afghan police chief in the area said he had not been informed of the possible threat.

"We know for a fact that there has been recent intelligence to suggest that there was the threat of a bombing in the Bagram area," the spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, said at a news briefing in Kabul.

"It is clear there are suicide bombers' cells operating in this country," he said. "There are some operating in the city of Kabul and, as our intelligence suggests, they had the capability in the Bagram area."

The Afghan police chief of Bagram district, Muhammad Salem Ehsas, said Wednesday that he had been unaware of any threat of a suicide bomber in the area, suggesting a lack of coordination between the security forces on the ground even while Mr. Cheney was present.

Afghan police officers guard the outer gate at the Bagram air base, and it is possible that they let the bomber through to the second gate, which is operated by American soldiers and other members of the international military force. Commander Ehsas said it was also possible that the bomber gained access to the American gate through the residential areas near the base.

At least 19 Afghan workers, including a 12-year-old boy, were killed in the blast, as were a South Korean soldier, an American soldier, an American civilian contractor and the bomber, the military said in a statement. Many of the workers were lined up outside the gate, waiting to clear the security checkpoint before going to work inside.

Mr. Cheney spent the night at Bagram unexpectedly after heavy snow prevented him from getting to a meeting with President Hamid Karzai at the presidential palace in Kabul. Mr. Cheney was at the base when the bomber struck at 10 a.m. Tuesday, but he continued on to Kabul to meet President Karzai at midday as planned.

The Taliban claimed responsibility for the blast and said it had been aimed at Mr. Cheney, and even named the bomber, saying he came from Logar, a province south of the capital, Kabul. But Colonel Collins said that their claim was "absurd" and that the timing of the bombing could have been just a coincidence.

"Their claim is simply going for more psychological impact on the population," he said. "Clearly what they have done here is simply killing more innocent people."

Afghanistan has been hit by more than 100 suicide bombings in the past year, and many have appeared to be opportunistic attacks, where the bombers had been walking, loitering or driving around looking for a target, usually a foreign military convoy. Others have approached military bases and government buildings on foot and set off their explosion at an entrance.

The American military is conducting the investigation of the bomb blast, said Colonel Collins, the spokesman for the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, or ISAF.

DOJ_NMG_0138246

"Unfortunately, we do expect more attacks," he said. "And the enemy knows that they cannot defeat Afghan National Security Forces and ISAF forces in the conventional sense, so we do expect them increasingly to go after soft targets, which means civilians."

Mr. Ehsas said he also believed that it was more likely that the bombing was an opportunistic attack against the civilians lined up at the gate. "I don't think it was connected to Cheney's visit," he said. "The aim was the people in the crowd."

Threat To Bagram Was Known (WP)

By Jason Straziuso

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

KABUL, Feb. 28 -- Intelligence reports indicated that the Taliban had the ability to carry out suicide attacks near the main U.S. base in Afghanistan even before a deadly bombing during a visit by Vice President Cheney, NATO said Wednesday.

Col. Tom Collins, the top spokesman for NATO's force in Afghanistan, said suicide bomb cells were present in the capital, Kabul, just 30 miles south of Bagram air base.

A policeman helps a relative of one of at least 23 people who were killed in a suicide bombing Tuesday near Bagram air base, the main U.S. installation in Afghanistan. The blast occurred when Vice President Cheney was inside.

"We know for a fact that there has been recent intelligence to suggest that there was the threat of a bombing in the Bagram area," Collins said. "It's clear that there are suicide bomber cells operating in this country. There are some in the city of Kabul."

Tuesday's bombing killed at least 23 people, including two Americans, outside Bagram while Cheney was meeting with officials inside. The Taliban, an Islamic militia that ruled most of Afghanistan until the U.S.-led invasion in 2001, said the attack was aimed at Cheney, but officials said it posed no real threat to the vice president.

The attacker never tried to penetrate even the first of several U.S.-manned security checkpoints at Bagram, instead detonating his explosives among a group of Afghan workers outside the base.

"The Taliban's claims that they were going after the vice president were absurd," Collins said.

Collins said it was unclear whether the Taliban had really known of Cheney's visit, or if the timing of the attack was a coincidence. The last suicide bombing at Bagram was in June 2006, when an attack aimed at a U.S. convoy wounded two Afghans near a market area outside the base.

U.S. Ambassador Ronald E. Neumann said he did not believe that the Taliban had responded to Cheney's presence, given that he arrived on Monday and stayed the night only because bad weather forced him to postpone a meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

"I just have not seen the ability to react that quickly, to grab your handy-dandy latest suicide candidate, who is usually not your brightest fellow around, and get him mobilized and get him up to the gate," Neumann said. "It strains credulity for me."

Pakistan Denies Hosting Bin Laden, Camps (AP)

By Munir Ahmad

AP, March 1, 2007

Pakistan on Wednesday rejected a claim by the U.S. intelligence chief that Osama bin Laden and his deputy were hiding in northwestern Pakistan, and that al-Qaida was setting up camps near the Afghan border.

President Gen. Pervez Musharraf, however, acknowledged that foreign militants were in Pakistan's tribal regions along the Afghan border and warned them to leave, the state-run news agency reported. It was not clear from the report whether Musharraf named any particular militants.

Musharraf spoke a day after new U.S. intelligence chief Mike McConnell told a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing that al-Qaida is trying to set up training camps and other operations in Pakistan tribal areas near Afghanistan.

"It's something we're very worried about and very concerned about," McConnell said. U.S. intelligence officials believe that bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, were trying to establish an al-Qaida base in the region, he said. McConnell noted the camps are in an area that has never been governed by any state or outside power.

"We deny it," Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao told The Associated Press, referring to McConnell's remarks.

DOJ_NMG_0138247

Sherpao told The Associated Press there were no al-Qaida training camps in his country and U.S. officials had not provided any intelligence suggesting there were.

On a visit to Pakistan on Monday, Vice President Dick Cheney met with Musharraf to seek his aid in foiling an anticipated spring offensive by the Taliban and al-Qaida against coalition forces in Afghanistan.

Cheney was accompanied by Deputy CIA Director Stephen Kappes, suggesting that the U.S. officials were prepared to buttress their allegations about al-Qaida operations with intelligence data.

Musharraf told Cheney that Pakistan was already doing all it could to fight the militants, his office said.

Musharraf vowed Wednesday to take "stiff action" to expel foreign militants from Pakistan's mountainous border regions, the Associated Press of Pakistan news agency reported.

"People have come there from outside. They are living in our mountains and spreading terrorism not just in Pakistan but in the entire world," APP quoted Musharraf as saying at a public meeting in the southern Sindh province.

"These people are putting Pakistan in danger. These people should leave and go, otherwise we will have to deal with them and we are dealing with them," APP quoted him as saying.

U.S. officials are concerned about a peace deal Pakistan signed with tribal leaders of the North Waziristan region in September. In that agreement, the tribes promised to respect the authority of the Pakistani government and curtail cross-border attacks by militants.

In return, Musharraf returned some of the tribes' weapons, released some prisoners and withdrew from posts inside North Waziristan.

At Tuesday's hearing, Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said the tribes have not abided by most terms of the agreement. McConnell added U.S. intelligence believes al-Qaida's training and related capabilities increased as a result of the deal.

Musharraf's office confirmed that during the meeting, Cheney expressed concern that al-Qaida was "regrouping" in the tribal areas and that the vice president "called for concerted efforts in countering the threat."

Sherpao insisted Pakistan was "fighting the scourge of terrorism in the best interest of Pakistan."

Musharraf is a key ally of the United States in its fight against Islamic militants.

Taliban Official: Bin Laden Is Alive (AP)

AP, March 1, 2007

A senior Taliban commander says Osama bin Laden is alive and in contact with leaders of Afghanistan's Taliban insurgents, according to an interview aired on British television.

Mullah Dadullah said he had not met bin Laden since the fall of the Taliban regime after the U.S.-led invasion of Afghanistan in 2001, but said "we know he's still alive."

"He's not yet martyred. Such information would be easy to get — his comrades stand shoulder to shoulder with us. They keep us informed," Dadullah said in an interview broadcast Wednesday by Channel 4 News.

The authenticity of the information could not be confirmed. Channel 4 did not say how it had obtained the footage, and it was not known when or where Dadullah made the comments, which were translated into English.

Dadullah, commander of Taliban operations in eastern and southeastern Afghanistan and a trusted associate of Taliban leader Mullah Omar, said bin Laden met outsiders rarely. Dadullah did not comment on bin Laden's whereabouts.

"Only his comrades see him; we exchange messages with each other to share plans," Dadullah said. "We also go to the battlefield together. We actually meet very rarely, just for important consultations. It's hard for anyone to meet Bin Laden himself now, but we know he's still alive."

Dadullah said the Taliban had "hundreds more" suicide bombers ready to attack NATO forces in Afghanistan. NATO commanders have said they believe the Taliban plans a spring offensive against alliance troops in the country.

Keep Pressuring Musharraf (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138248

SINCE 9/11, THE United States has been trapped in an increasingly loveless marriage with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Like many a miserable mate, the Bush administration has been known to rue the failings of its partner in private. Yet it has always defended Musharraf in public, arguing that whatever his shortcomings, the alternative is far worse.

Such forbearance may be changing. For the first time, the Bush administration this week let Islamabad know, through Vice President Dick Cheney, that it is unhappy with Pakistan's performance in fighting the resurgent Taliban. And it hinted that if things don't improve, the White House might not be able to keep the Democratic-controlled Congress from cutting U.S. aid to Pakistan.

This burst of candor is long overdue — and so is an overhaul of U.S. policy toward Pakistan. Musharraf, who ousted an elected government in a 1999 coup, has received between $8 billion and $10 billion in direct U.S. aid since 9/11 (and perhaps almost as much in covert aid) yet shows no signs of winning the war against Islamic extremism or of advancing democracy in Pakistan. On the contrary, his hold on power exists in part because of his unholy alliance with Islamist legislators.

President Bush and Congress have been willing to ignore these problems so long as Pakistan was seen as an indispensable ally in the struggle against Al Qaeda and the Taliban, was rolling up the Abdul Qadeer Khan black-market nuclear operation and appeared to be improving relations with India. But Islamabad's failed peace deal in North Waziristan, an escalation in cross-border attacks into Afghanistan and reports of Taliban bases in the tribal areas on Pakistani territory have made that bargain less satisfying. Congress is considering placing conditions on aid.

Meanwhile, the Pakistanis are having their own doubts about the marriage. They believe that the U.S. is just using them in the war on terror and will dump them as soon as they're no longer needed. And they say they are being blamed for NATO's failure to curb the Taliban inside Afghanistan — a weakness highlighted by the suicide bombing Tuesday outside Bagram air base during Cheney's visit.

The U.S. has a profound interest in the welfare of this strategic Muslim state with nuclear weapons. But what is the purpose of sending $80 million a month in "coalition support" to a Pakistani military that is not willing to fight in the tribal areas? Some conditions need to be imposed on U.S. aid, and some of the aid needs to be redirected to education, development and the building of democracy, including political parties, so that popular alternatives to Musharraf can one day emerge.

Supporters of the status quo say pressuring the politically fragile Musharraf risks his fall and the rise to power of a radical Islamic regime with nuclear weapons. This is unlikely. The Islamists have never gotten more than 11% of the vote, and fared badly in the last (albeit rigged) municipal elections. But the U.S. could increase the likelihood of Islamist success if it continues to allow Musharraf to repress the moderate opposition while making deals with the Islamists.

The U.S. may well be destined for a long marriage of convenience with Pakistan. But its spouse need not necessarily be named Musharraf.

US Troops In Philippines Defy Old Stereotype (CSM)

By Simon Montlake

The Christian Science Monitor, March 1, 2007

ZAMBOANGA, PHILIPPINES

When US troops arrived in the southern islands in December 2001, a decade after closing its bases in the Philippines, critics assailed the move. They predicted a return of permanent US camps in its former colony, and a repeat of the sleazy bars and clubs still surrounding its former bases near Manila.

More alarming to US ears were dire warnings of resistance from Muslims whose island communities were to be rid of militants by US-assisted Philippine troops. Observers warned that the foreign presence could inflame the situation, as well as revive memories of a bloody US military campaign in the early 1900s to subdue Muslim-inhabited Mindanao.

Today, these warnings mostly ring false. About 450 US soldiers are still here, based inside Philippine military command centers in Zamboanga and the nearby island of Jolo. But the expected nightlife boom hasn't happened. Nor have militants taken the fight to the foreigners deployed here, though a US serviceman died in a bomb attack on a restaurant in 2002.

US officers say their small footprint in Mindanao, as well as a focus on joint development projects and counterinsurgency training of the Philippine Army, have smoothed their path. But further challenges lie ahead as US troop, and their Philippine counterparts who are notorious for human rights abuses, continue pursuing Muslim insurgent cells on the islands.

DOJ_NMG_0138249

One measure of the US approach can be found on Basilan, where US troops first deployed in 2002. At the time, the extremist group Abu Sayyaf had turned the island, a 30-minute ferry ride from Zamboanga, into a no-go zone with a string of abductions, bombings, and beheadings.

Commander Steve Kelley, a naval engineering reservist, says it was a tough mission. "It wasn't a warm welcome," he recalls. But humanitarian projects, including the construction of an 80- kilometer (50-mile) coastal road and a series of mobile clinics, won residents over. "It was a huge turnaround," he says. Local officials say the improved security has restored normalcy.

Muchtar Muarip, a contractor who worked on the US-funded road, says that the civil outreach convinced some Muslims of their benign intentions. "The US troops promoted development projects that awakened the mind of people in Basilan. It showed that if other people were concerned [about them], they should be concerned," he says.

Still, suspicions die hard.

Mr. Muarip says that his brother, a Muslim who favors adoption of sharia Islamic law in Mindanao, is skeptical of US largesse and rejects the deployment in the Philippines. Other critics say that the arrival of US troops, whatever their intentions, stirs anxiety among Muslims.

"The face of the US in our area is the face of an American soldier, so any good that they do is neutralized by fear of the American military," says Amina Rasul, co-founder of the Philippine Council for Islam and Democracy and scion of a prominent royal family here.

National hackles were also raised by a highly publicized trial of a US marine convicted on Dec. 4 of raping a Philippine woman in 2005. After Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith was sentenced to 40 years in prison, a row erupted over US insistence that he remain in their custody pending an appeal. When the court balked, the embassy vowed to cancel a joint military exercise. Ultimately, the Philippines caved; the exercise begins this week.

Lawyers for the victim protested the handover, and the blunt wielding of US leverage, such as military aid that has totaled more than $300 million since 2002. US officials argue, however, that their request was explicitly ensured in a treaty.

While US forces reaped a degree of goodwill in Basilan through their civil-outreach programs, Jolo may prove more testing. Denied sanctuary on Basilan, Abu Sayyaf has since regrouped on this island, where a US-backed Philippine military offensive against the group is now under way. Also on the run in Jolo are Indonesian militants whom US officials have linked to the 2002 Bali nightclub bombings. The jungle-clad hills hold bitter memories of a US occupation in 1898 that met fierce resistance for more than a decade.

Zain Jali, a spiritual adviser to an insurgent group that signed a 1996 peace deal, says distrust of the Philippine Army and its US advisers runs deep. "In the mind of the people, Americans are their enemy, their historical enemy," he warns.

US officers deployed on Jolo say such attitudes appear to be softening, as humanitarian programs with the Philippine Army and civilian-aid projects bear fruit. USAID has funneled $300 million into Mindanao since 1996.

Dems Seek Testimony From Fired Attorneys (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 1, 2007

Democrats are moving to compel some of the eight U.S. attorneys who have been ousted to tell their stories publicly, under oath, after a federal prosecutor claimed he was fired for political reasons.

A House subcommittee is slated to vote Thursday on subpoenas for four of the eight dismissed U.S. attorneys. The Senate Judiciary Committee, meanwhile, will send letters to those fired before voting next week on compelling their testimony, according to officials with both panels.

The prosecutors have privately told both committees that they would not testify voluntarily but would honor a congressional subpoena, according to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and an official close to the House subcommittee on commercial and administrative law.

House subcommittee Chairwoman Linda Sanchez said her panel will vote on subpoenas for fired prosecutors Carol Lam of California, David Iglesias of New Mexico, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Washington.

"In order to get the full picture of why these U.S. attorneys were fired, we need to hear from the Justice Department and the U.S. attorneys themselves," said House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich.

Schumer, in a telephone interview Wednesday with The Associated Press, said: "If they say they won't come voluntarily, Senator Leahy will authorize subpoenas." The Senate panel is expected to vote on whether to issue the subpoenas next week, said Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the positions are "too important to be politicized." One of the dismissed U.S. attorneys is from Reid's home state.

Spurring the developments was a new report that one of the eight, New Mexico's David Iglesias, claims to have been forced out after refusing a request by two congressmen to rush an indictment that might have helped Republicans in the 2006 election. In the story and a subsequent interview with the AP, Iglesias refused to identify the members of Congress.

The Justice Department staunchly denied the charge that Iglesias or any of the eight federal prosecutors were dismissed for political reasons.

"The suggestion that David Iglesias was asked to resign because he failed to bring an indictment ... is flatly false," Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said in a statement. "This administration has never removed a United States attorney in an effort to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a public integrity investigation."

As to why Iglesias was dismissed, Roehrkasse said: "We made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns."

Federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president and can be fired for any reason — or none at all.

But Democrats say the eight firings — some without cause, according to the Justice Department — indicate the Bush administration is using a new provision in the Patriot Act to reward political allies with coveted jobs as U.S. attorneys.

The new provision, enacted a year ago with the reauthorization of the Patriot Act, removes a time limit within which appointees to such posts must be confirmed by the Senate. Democrats say that's a Bush administration effort to get around the confirmation process.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has said he intends to submit the name of every nominee to vacant U.S. attorney posts to the Senate for confirmation.

Still, Democrats tried to revive a bill Wednesday that would reimpose the time limit. An objection by Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., killed the measure. On Wednesday, its sponsor, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., tried to attach it as an amendment to an omnibus bill to tighten the nation's homeland security. Kyl was again expected to block the measure, his spokesman said.

The Justice Department says a 120-day limit isn't enough time for an appointee to be recommended by home-state senators, nominated and confirmed.

But raising the issue on the Senate floor allowed Feinstein to read a news story into the record that fueled the matter anew Wednesday.

In Wednesday's editions, McClatchy Newspapers quoted Iglesias as claiming that two members of Congress contacted him in the weeks before the 2006 election to ask about an investigation of a kickback scheme. He said the members, whom he refused to identify, appeared eager to see an indictment just before the elections.

Corruption charges against two previous state New Mexico treasurers — both Democrats — became an issue during the election; further charges could have helped the Republicans. Iglesias, a Republican, refused to name the members of Congress in the report because he feared retaliation, according to McClatchy Newspapers. Contacted by the AP, Iglesias said: "I've got nothing further to say about that."

The Justice Department's Roeherkasse said that the U.S. Attorneys Manual calls on federal prosecutors to notify the agency of any calls from members of Congress.

"We are unaware that anyone in Main Justice (department headquarters) was notified of any conversations between U.S. Attorney Iglesias and members of the New Mexico Congressional delegation," Roehrkasse said.

Earlier Wednesday, Iglesias' last day on the job, he told reporters at a news conference in Albuquerque, N.M., that the Bush administration's call for his resignation came without warning and was rooted in politics — not performance.

"This episode came like a thief in the night," he said of the Dec. 7 request for him to step down. He added, "Obviously, I tripped some wire."

Associated Press writers Jennifer Talhelm in Washington and Sue Major Holmes in Albuquerque contributed to this report.

Ex-Prosecutor Says Politics Was Motive For Dismissal (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — David C. Iglesias, who was dismissed as the United States attorney in New Mexico, has said he believes that he was ousted because he resisted pressure before the 2006 elections to bring corruption charges against a Democrat in his state, a Democratic senator said on Wednesday.

Mr. Iglesias has told Congressional aides that two federal lawmakers had separately called him in mid-October asking about the status of an inquiry involving a statehouse construction contract and a former Democratic state lawmaker, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York said in a statement Wednesday on the Senate floor.

Mr. Schumer did not identify the lawmakers who made the calls either by name or party affiliation, but he suggested that they wanted Mr. Iglesias to move quickly with indictments before the November elections to help Republicans.

Mr. Iglesias is one of eight United States attorneys known to have been dismissed in recent months by the Justice Department. Each had been appointed by President Bush during his first term, but Democrats have criticized the removals as politically motivated. Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said in a floor statement that the firings represented an effort "to bring political operatives into these offices."

Mr. Iglesias's account of the calls was first reported on Wednesday by the McClatchy Newspapers, which said the prosecutor would not identify the lawmakers because he feared retaliation. But in that report, he described the contacts as "appalling."

Justice Department officials said politics was not a factor in Mr. Iglesias's ouster. "The suggestion that David Iglesias was asked to resign because he failed to bring an indictment over a courthouse construction contract is flatly false," said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman. Mr. Roehrkasse added, "This administration has never removed a United States attorney in an effort to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a public integrity investigation."

The former United States attorneys were not given explanations for their dismissals at the time of their removals, but senior Justice Department officials have said that most were asked to step aside because of job performance problems — an accusation that has angered several and that some have publicly denied.

Mr. Iglesias could not be reached on Wednesday. But The Associated Press reported that at a news conference in Albuquerque on Wednesday, his last day in office, Mr. Iglesias said his dismissal was unrelated to his office's work.

"I know it's not performance-related," Mr. Iglesias told The Associated Press. "I know it's not misconduct. What does that leave? Politics."

Democrats on the House Judiciary Committee said they would invite Mr. Iglesias and some of the other ousted prosecutors to appear before the panel, even though some have said privately that they would not testify unless they were subpoenaed. Democratic lawmakers have questioned the Justice Department's motives because such dismissals are unusual and because six of the eight prosecutors, including Mr. Iglesias, had received favorable job evaluations.

A Justice Department review of Mr. Iglesias's job performance, dated November 2005, concluded that he was "respected by the judiciary, agencies and staff" and had a strategic plan that "complied with the department's priorities."

Other ousted prosecutors had similarly positive evaluations. A March 2006 performance review of John McKay, who was removed from the United States attorney's office in Seattle, found him to be "an effective, well regarded and capable leader." A December 2003 review of Paul K. Charlton, who was ousted as the top federal prosecutor in Arizona, concluded that he was "well respected" by his staff, American Indian nations, local law enforcement and the judiciary "regarding his integrity, professionalism and competence."

Fired U.S. Attorney Says Lawmakers Pressured Him (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

A political tempest over the mass firing of federal prosecutors escalated yesterday with allegations from the departing U.S. attorney in New Mexico, who said that two members of Congress attempted to pressure him to speed up a probe of Democrats just before the November elections.

David C. Iglesias, who left yesterday after more than five years in office, said he received the calls in October and believes that complaints from the lawmakers may have led the Justice Department to fire him late last year.

Iglesias also responded to allegations from Justice officials that he had performed poorly and was too often absent, citing positive job reviews and data showing increasing numbers of prosecutions. He also noted that he is required to serve 40 days a year in the Navy Reserve.

Iglesias declined to name the lawmakers who called him, but he said in an interview: "I didn't give them what they wanted. That was probably a political problem that caused them to go to the White House or whomever and complain that I wasn't a team player."

Iglesias's allegations were met with strong denials from the Justice Department yesterday but prompted the Democratic-controlled House and Senate judiciary committees to announce that they would issue subpoenas for testimony from Iglesias and other fired prosecutors if necessary. Iglesias said he would not testify unless subpoenaed.

Spokesmen for Rep. Steve Pearce (R-N.M.) and the state's two Democratic lawmakers, Sen. Jeff Bingaman and Rep. Tom Udall, said the lawmakers and their staffs had no contact with Iglesias about the case. The offices of New Mexico's two other Republican lawmakers, Sen. Pete V. Domenici and Rep. Heather A. Wilson, did not respond to repeated requests for comment.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse called Iglesias's allegations "flatly false." Roehrkasse said that Iglesias should have reported any calls from lawmakers, as required under department guidelines.

"The administration has never removed a U.S. attorney in an effort to retaliate against him or inappropriately interfere with a public-integrity investigation," Roehrkasse said.

In briefings about the firings on Capitol Hill, Justice Department officials had said that Iglesias was the target of complaints from members of Congress, according to several sources familiar with the meetings, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss personnel issues. The Justice briefers did not specify the nature of those complaints, the sources said.

Iglesias, 49 and the son of a Baptist minister, is a Navy Reserve commander whose role as a defense lawyer in a famous military hazing case was the basis for the Tom Cruise character in the movie "A Few Good Men." He held a news conference in Albuquerque yesterday, in which he said that he was fired for political reasons.

Iglesias was among seven U.S. attorneys notified by phone on Dec. 7 that they were being fired without explanation. An eighth prosecutor, in Little Rock, also was removed in December, to make room for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

The charges by Iglesias added a new dimension to the ongoing controversy over the fired prosecutors, at least four of whom were presiding over major public-corruption probes. Although other fired prosecutors have publicly defended their records, they have never alleged that political pressure related to an ongoing criminal investigation played a role in their dismissals.

In addition to Iglesias's probe of Democrats, fired prosecutors in Arizona, Nevada and California were conducting corruption probes involving Republicans at the time of their dismissals.

"These are extremely serious and very troubling allegations coming from a man of great integrity," said Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who has been leading a Senate Judiciary Committee inquiry into the firings. "They call into question every other firing. We will continue to pursue this until we get to the bottom of what happened and pass legislation to prevent it from ever happening again."

The dismissals have angered Democrats and some Republicans on Capitol Hill, in part because they followed a little-noticed change in federal law that lets Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely. Legislation has been introduced in both houses to repeal the provision.

Justice officials have acknowledged that they did not fire Bud Cummins from his Little Rock post for cause but have said the others were ousted for "performance-related" reasons. Records show, however, that at least six of the prosecutors, including Iglesias and Cummins, received mostly positive job evaluations before they were forced out.

In an interview Tuesday, Iglesias said the two lawmakers called him about a well-known criminal investigation involving a Democratic legislator. He declined to provide their party affiliation, but his comments indicated the callers were Republicans.

New Mexico media outlets reported last year that the FBI and the U.S. attorney's office in Albuquerque had opened a probe into allegations involving former Democratic state senator Manny Aragon and government construction projects in Bernalillo County. No charges have been filed in the case.

Iglesias said the lawmakers who called him seemed focused on whether charges would be filed before the November elections. He said the calls made him feel "pressured to hurry the subsequent cases and prosecutions" but said he did not receive similar contacts from anyone in the executive branch. He acknowledged he made a mistake by not reporting the calls to the Justice Department.

Referring to the calls, Iglesias said: "I suspect that was the reason I was asked to step down, but I don't know that I'll ever know."

Iglesias said other criticisms of his performance by the Justice Department "are demonstrably untrue statements." He added: "We all have a right to defend our honor. I felt like my honor and the honor of my office was attacked."

Iglesias produced statistics showing that his office's immigration prosecutions had risen more than 78 percent during his tenure and said the office prosecuted record numbers of narcotics and firearms cases as well.

Iglesias cited a January 2006 letter from Michael A. Battle -- the Justice official who fired him -- commending him for "exemplary leadership in the department's priority programs." A November 2005 evaluation obtained by The Washington Post also said Iglesias was "experienced in legal, management and community relations work and was respected by the judiciary, agencies and staff."

Former deputy attorney general James B. Comey, now general counsel for Lockheed Martin, this week praised Iglesias as "one of our finest and someone I had a lot of confidence in as deputy attorney general."

But Roehrkasse said Justice "had a lengthy record from which to evaluate his performance as a manager, and we made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns."

Political Interference Is Alleged In The Sacking Of A U.S. Attorney (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - Congressional leaders said Wednesday that they'd seek testimony from several U.S. attorneys who were summarily fired by the Bush administration, hours after the top federal prosecutor in New Mexico alleged that he was fired because of political interference.

Democrats in both the House of Representatives and the Senate vowed to hold a new round of hearings to determine if partisan politics played a role in the firings of eight U.S. attorneys across the country. The House is set to vote Thursday on whether to issue subpoenas to four of the prosecutors. The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to ask the U.S. attorneys to testify voluntarily before it decides whether to subpoena them.

The controversy flared up early Wednesday afternoon after David Iglesias, the departing U.S. attorney from New Mexico, told McClatchy Newspapers that he believes he was forced out because he refused to speed up an indictment of local Democrats a month before November's congressional elections.

Iglesias said that two members of Congress called separately in mid-October to inquire about the timing of a federal probe of a kickback scheme. They appeared eager, he said, for an indictment to be issued before the elections in order to benefit the Republicans. He refused to name the members of Congress because, he said, he feared retaliation.

Two months later, on Dec. 7, Iglesias became one of six U.S. attorneys who've been ordered to step down for what administration officials have called "performance-related issues." Two other U.S. attorneys also were asked to resign.

Iglesias, however, had received a positive performance review before he was fired and said that he suspected he was forced out because he resisted the pressure and didn't indict anyone before the election.

"I believe that because I didn't play ball, so to speak, I was asked to resign," Iglesias, who stepped down Wednesday, told McClatchy.

A Justice Department spokesman denied hearing of any congressional interference in the investigation and said Iglesias wasn't fired because of the case.

"The suggestion that David Iglesias was asked to resign because he failed to bring an indictment over a courthouse construction contract is flatly false," said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman. "This administration has never removed a United States attorney in an effort to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a public integrity investigation."

Roehrkasse said the department has encouraged federal prosecutors to go after corruption cases leading to a number of high-profile corruption indictments.

Justice Department officials have defended the firings of the U.S. attorneys as legitimate administrative decisions meant to improve the workings of the attorneys' offices. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate last month that most of the forced resignations were motivated by "performance-related" reasons.

However, McClatchy Newspapers reported last month that five out of the six attorneys that McNulty mentioned had received positive job evaluations.

Iglesias acknowledged that he had no proof that the pressure from the members of Congress prompted his forced resignation. But he said the contact violated one of the most important tenets of a U.S. attorney's office: Don't mix politics with prosecutions.

"I was appalled by the inappropriateness of those contacts," Iglesias said of the calls.

U.S. attorneys are appointed by the president in a political process that includes Senate confirmation. But as soon as they assume office, they're expected to refrain from being politically active and to resist the urge to allow their political leanings to affect the outcomes of cases.

Iglesias said the two members of Congress not only contacted him directly, but also tried to wrest details of the case from him. Iglesias wouldn't comment on the case to McClatchy, but the local media have reported on aspects of the investigation, including allegations that a former Democratic state senator took money to ensure that an $82 million courthouse contract would go to a specific company.

Congressional questions about ongoing cases are supposed to go through the Justice Department's Office of Legislative Affairs to avoid the appearance of impropriety.

Local media had reported that Iglesias' office might issue an indictment before the elections.

Iglesias said he refused to tell the lawmakers when any indictment would be issued, although he'd decided that the investigation needed more time.

He said he now regrets that he didn't report the calls to the Justice Department, as required by policy.

"I thought it would blow over," he said. "But I was wrong."

Democrats have described the midterm firings of the Republican-appointed U.S. attorneys as unprecedented and questioned whether the firings were politically motivated to root out moderates and install candidates loyal to the administration.

"I called this meeting because we pledged to do everything we can to get to the truth of what could be brazen abuse of power by the Bush administration," said Rep. Linda Sanchez, D-Calif., the chairwoman of the House judiciary subcommittee that'll vote on the subpoenas.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., took to the Senate floor Wednesday afternoon to question the Bush administration's rationale for the firings.

"Clearly, the performance of these U.S. attorneys was not a reason to fire them," Feinstein said.

The decision to fire the U.S. attorneys first came under scrutiny earlier this year after Senate Democrats discovered that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales could use a little-noticed change in the Patriot Act to fill vacancies with interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms without Senate approval.

DOJ_NMG_0138255

Iglesias and former U.S. attorneys Carol Lam in San Diego, John McKay in Seattle and Bud Cummins in Arkansas could be subpoenaed to testify before the House subcommittee. Iglesias said he would testify only if he were subpoenaed.

Iglesias' allegation raises new questions about the firings and appears to undermine the theory that the administration singled out moderate Republicans. Iglesias, a former military lawyer whose work helped inspire the Tom Cruise character in the movie "A Few Good Men," describes himself as a social conservative who strove to implement the administration's policies. Iglesias also was the first Hispanic to serve as U.S. attorney in his state in decades.

"I represent three huge voting blocks of the Republican party," he said. "I don't know why they would let someone go with those political credentials who has demonstratively done a good job."

Jude McCartin, a spokeswoman for Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., said she hadn't heard of the allegations and couldn't comment on them.

"It wasn't us - that's all I can say," she said.

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., didn't contact Iglesias about the courthouse investigation, Pearce spokesman David Host said.

Rep. Tom Udall, D-N.M., also didn't call about the case, said Marissa Padilla, Udall's spokeswoman.

Sen. Pete Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson, both Republicans, didn't return phone calls.

Domenici wasn't facing re-election in November, but the state's two other Republicans, Pearce and Wilson, were up for election. Both won, but Wilson beat her opponent by only 875 votes out of nearly 211,000.

Senators Seek Testimony Of Ex-prosecutors (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, March 1, 2007

The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to compel some of the eight U.S. attorneys who have been ousted to tell their stories publicly under oath after a federal prosecutor claimed he was fired for political reasons, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said. He said some of the prosecutors have privately said they won't testify voluntarily but would honor a congressional subpoena. The panel will vote on subpoenas next week, said Tracy Schmaler, a spokeswoman for Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

One of the eight, David Iglesias of New Mexico, said he was forced out after refusing a request by two congressmen to rush an indictment that might have helped Republicans in the election in 2006.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the Bush administration has never removed a prosecutor "to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a public integrity investigation." Iglesias was let go "based on performance-related concerns," Roehrkasse said.

House Republicans want La.'s Jefferson off panel

House Republicans are challenging Speaker Nancy Pelosi's appointment of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., to the Homeland Security Committee. Republicans cite an FBI report that says agents who raided Jefferson's home found $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer.

House Republican Leader John Boehner said Democrats booted Jefferson off the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, "so it is difficult to comprehend how they can approve" of him being on a committee "with access to America's most sensitive and closely guarded intelligence information."

Brian Kennedy, spokesman for Boehner, quoted federal security clearance guidelines that say "conditions that could raise a security concern and may be disqualifying" include an "allegation or admission of criminal conduct," regardless of whether the person was charged.

New NASA space vehicle will be delayed for months

NASA chief Michael Griffin said the vehicle to replace the aging space shuttle would be delayed four to six months because of budget problems. Its earliest launch would be in 2015, he told a Senate subcommittee on space. President Bush ordered NASA to retire the shuttle in 2010 and launch a successor ship no later than 2014, creating a four-year span in which the United States would have no means for sending humans into space.

JOHN L. SMITH: Let's Hope U.S. Attorney Toasts Few More Indictments For Road (LVRJ)

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 1, 2007

Beyond packing boxes and a pat on the back, it's hard to know what to give a U.S. attorney who's getting the shove from his superiors.

There's the obligatory rubber chicken farewell lunch and a plaque. And the folks around the office can take up a collection for some golf balls or a Target gift certificate. But I'm guessing that nothing would bring a smile to the face of a federal prosecution chief on his last day in office like an indictment on a juicy case-fixing scheme involving doctors and lawyers.

Advertisement

At least, that's the sense I get on this, the final day on the job for U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden.

Not only have witnesses recently been invited to answer questions in front of the grand jury, but the word is the doctor-lawyer investigation has reached a turning point -- coincidentally at the time Bogden can use an appropriate send-off.

In recent weeks, the names of legal/medical consultant Howard Awand and personal injury attorneys Robert Vannah and Robert Eglet have surfaced in the local media as subjects of interest in the FBI inquiry. Sourced speculation has placed a second set of physicians in the government's camp as politically penitent cooperating witnesses.

A well-placed insurance industry source said he expected movement in the case this week.

With multimillion-dollar jury awards and suspicious coziness between the players and some local judges, the case holds a world of intrigue.

But it's by no means the only bell-ringing business to emanate during Bogden's tenure. The public corruption investigation involving former topless bar mogul Michael Galardi, the charges stemming from the deadly Hells Angels-Mongols brawl at the Laughlin River Run, and the Crazy Horse Too investigation are three of the more notorious cases handled by his office.

There have been mixed results and a few embarrassments, but no one can say the U.S. attorney's office under Bogden failed to take a swing at the ball. Even his enemies and critics in the legal community give him that.

For no good reason any credible source can name, Bogden was unceremoniously sacked a few weeks ago in an apparent bit of nervous housecleaning by the Department of Justice.

Beyond a respectable win-loss record in prosecuting some of the biggest federal cases in recent Las Vegas history, Bogden can take solace in the fact that he's not alone. Six other Western U.S. attorneys were also notified that their services were no longer needed.

Because the Department of Justice and the Bush administration have done such a terrible job spinning this case, the terminations have given rise to several theories, all of them unflattering to the suits in Washington.

There's the belief that some of those being ousted weren't willing enough to use the death penalty.

And there's the hypothesis that they were terminated because they failed to carry the anti-illegal immigration banner high enough to suit the administration.

Although San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam's office handled fewer illegal immigration cases than it previously had, it was also her office that scored devastating convictions of corrupt Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham and the San Diego phase of the Galardi political fixing case.

Then there's the one about letting those solid veteran prosecutor/administrators go to bring in a group of well-connected neophytes whose resumes would benefit from a line stating "U.S. Attorney."

It's an intriguing thought, and when Karl Rove intimate Tim Griffin recently replaced H.E. "Bud" Cummins in the Eastern District of Arkansas, Senate Democrats roared charges of political cronyism. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, who said Bogden had done a "remarkably good job," had a field day with the issue.

Those Republican appointees will have to be confirmed by a Senate committee dominated by Democrats. The cronies could end up looking like kamikaze pilots.

As of Monday, federal sources still had heard nothing about a possible replacement for Bogden. Will Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wait until the day Bogden leaves to name his replacement?

Through it all, Bogden has taken the high road, maintained his composure, and commented little on the turn of events.

For now, the real reason behind the decision to let him go remains unclear.

An indictment in the doctors-lawyers case would be the best parting present Bogden could receive.

It's harder to gift-wrap, but it sure beats golf balls.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

U.S. To Charge At Least 1 In Trading Probe (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Federal authorities plan to file criminal and civil charges as early as today against one or more UBS employees for providing traders with advance notice of stock-rating adjustments in exchange for cash payments, according to sources familiar with the case.

The charges mark the latest attempt by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission to stanch the flow of improper tips to traders, including hedge funds and private equity firms, who seek to collect information that helps them profit in advance of notable corporate announcements.

Representatives for the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Southern District of New York and the SEC declined to comment yesterday on the months-long probe, as did a spokesman for UBS. The possible charges were reported by the online editions of BusinessWeek.

Sources briefed on the case spoke on condition of anonymity because the charges had yet to be publicly filed. The sources said at least one UBS worker had provided multiple traders with tips that UBS analysts had decided to upgrade or depress their ratings on a stock. Access to such information before it is disseminated to the public could allow a favored group of traders to profit at the expense of average investors.

Earlier this year, the SEC's Office of Compliance Inspections and Examinations requested a wide batch of trading data from investment banks and brokerage firms from the third quarter of last year in an effort to determine whether brokers may be passing inside information to hedge funds, which pay steep fees.

Former McGuireWoods Partner Arrested On Fraud Charges (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, March 1, 2007

A former New York law firm partner who allegedly made almost $18 million trading in the securities of his clients has been arrested on fraud charges.

Louis W. Zehil, until Feb. 16 a partner in the New York office of Richmond, Va.'s McGuireWoods, allegedly used his position as issuer's counsel in seven private placement transactions occurring between January 2006 and last month to accumulate millions of discounted shares, absent the sale restrictions such discounts generally entail. He allegedly sold the stocks at a vast profit.

Zehil, 41, now faces up to 20 years in prison and millions in fines on fraud charges brought by the Southern District U.S. Attorney's Office. He is also facing a civil suit brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is seeking disgorgement of his allegedly ill-gotten gains.

The ex-partner was arraigned Wednesday before Southern District of New York Magistrate Judge Henry Pitman but not required to enter a plea. He was released on a $250,000 personal recognizance bond. Andrew M. Lawler, Zehil's lawyer, declined to comment on the case Wednesday.

The case has unfolded swiftly. According to the criminal complaint issued Wednesday, Zehil's actions were first uncovered by a McGuireWoods associate, who reported them to firm management on Feb. 9. The firm then conducted an internal investigation, contacted clients, sought Zehil's resignation and referred the matter to the SEC.

"The actions described in today's filings are totally inconsistent with the high standards of ethics and integrity that are the very foundation of our firm," McGuireWoods chairman Richard Cullen said in a statement Wednesday. He added that Zehil had apparently acted on his own benefit and that the 750-lawyer firm would continue to cooperate with authorities in the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0138258

A onetime Navy lieutenant, Zehil joined McGuireWoods' 35-lawyer New York office as a partner in 2004. He had previously been an associate in the New York office of Jones Day. A 1995 Columbia Law School graduate, Zehil also previously worked in New York for Hale and Dorr and White & Case.

Zehil specialized in representing small companies in so-called reverse mergers and PIPE (private investment in public equity) transactions. In the former, small companies go public by merging into publicly traded shell corporations. Reverse mergers are often financed through PIPE transactions in which investors in the new entity are allotted blocks of discounted shares, the sale of which are restricted for a period of time.

Such shares are supposed to bear a restrictive legend. But Zehil, hired as counsel to seven companies participating in PIPE transactions, allegedly sent opinion letters to the companies' stock transfer agents directing them to issue shares without such legends to two investment groups, Strong Branch Ventures IV and Chestnut Capital Partners II.

According to prosecutors, the sole shareholders in these two entities were Zehil and his wife. When confronted by McGuireWoods, Zehil allegedly admitted issuing the opinion letter but denied ownership of either the Strong or Chestnut groups. But prosecutors say Zehil was the only person authorized to trade their securities and that he had personally directed the transfer of millions of dollars for his personal benefit, including the purchase of real estate and jewelry, the services of an interior decorator and a country club membership.

Through Strong and Chestnut, Zehil allegedly purchased large blocs of discounted shares, which he was then free to sell immediately. According to the SEC, the partner netted about $17.8 million from a series of stock sales, the most recent of which took place earlier this month. The SEC claims Zehil still had almost 3 million unsold shares at the time he was caught.

The seven small companies Zehil was representing were Gran Tierra Energy Inc.; Foothills Resources Inc.; MMC Energy Inc.; Alternative Energy Sources Inc.; Ethanex Energy Inc.; GoFish Corp.; and Kreido Biofuels Inc. Most were involved with either energy exploration or the development of renewable energy sources. GoFish operates a video Web site similar to the more well-known YouTube.

McGuireWoods spokesman William Allcott said Wednesday that the firm had discussed the matter at length with all of the companies.

"We have been very gratified by the support of our clients who recognize this was a complete aberration," he said.

Though previously listed on the firm's Web site as a partner in its New York office and only admitted to practice in New York, Zehil was a resident of Ponte Vedra Beach, Fla., who also frequently worked out of McGuireWoods' Jacksonville, Fla., office.

The SEC charges that the Strong and Chestnut investment groups both used Zehil's Florida address.

Enron Broadband Charge Will Be Pursued By Justice Department (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, March 1, 2007

The Justice Department will seek to preserve through an appeal one of five jury convictions won last year against the former finance chief of Enron's broadband division, according to a court filing.

Prosecutors filed a notice this week saying they will appeal U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore's late January decision to erase Kevin Howard's conviction of falsifying books. That appeal would go before the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which already tossed out convictions in a separate Enron case because of the same issue that prompted Gilmore to wipe Howard's record clean.

Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch declined comment beyond the filing. Jack Zimmermann, one of Howard's attorneys, declined to comment.

Gilmore threw out all five convictions that prosecutors won against Howard in a retrial last year. His first trial alongside four other ex-broadband executives ended in 2005 with a few acquittals and jurors hung on dozens of other counts.

Last year, the government conceded that Howard's four convictions of conspiracy and wire fraud should be erased because they were unlikely to stand up on appeal.

Prosecutors based that concession on an August 2-1 ruling from a 5th Circuit panel that overturned most convictions of four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in a 2004 Enron-related trial.

DOJ_NMG_0138259

In that ruling, the panel said prosecutors improperly presented jurors with a theory that the executives deprived Enron of their honest services when they helped push through a deal that the government said was a loan disguised as an asset sale.

Prosecutors in Howard's case used the same honest services theory in a case about the sale of future profits in a video-on-demand deal from which Enron booked immediate earnings. But they argued the fifth conviction of falsifying books was unspoiled by using the theory and should stand.

Gilmore tossed out that conviction along with the others because she said an instruction she gave to jurors — at prosecutors' request — tied it to one of the tainted counts.

SEC Details McAfee Plan For Options (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The former chief executive of McAfee Inc., George Samenuk, knew about a change to a 2002 stock-option grant made in his favor by a subordinate, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint filed yesterday in federal court.

The complaint charged Kent H. Roberts, McAfee's former general counsel, with fraud for his alleged role in options manipulations at the computer-security software vendor. It follows a criminal indictment of Mr. Roberts handed up Tuesday.

The complaint notes that Mr. Samenuk, who wasn't charged by either the grand jury or the SEC and wasn't identified by name in either complaint, participated in email traffic in which the manipulated grant was discussed.

"George Samenuk hasn't been charged, and we don't expect him to be," Elliot Peters, Mr. Samenuk's lawyer, said in a statement.

On Jan. 15, 2002, the compensation committee of McAfee's board approved a grant of 420,000 options to purchase shares at that day's closing price, $27.19, the SEC complaint says. That day, Mr. Roberts sent an email to Mr. Samenuk and another executive confirming the grant and its price, it says.

The next day, the SEC charges, shares of the Santa Clara, Calif., company fell, and Mr. Roberts sent a note to Mr. Samenuk and the second executive: "Let's price the 420,000 option shares at today's closing price of $25.43." That change would have a big effect, increasing Mr. Samenuk's potential profit from the grant by $739,200. (Mr. Samenuk was paid $714,922 in salary in 2001.)

The next week, according to the SEC, Mr. Samenuk wrote back to the two executives: "On January 16 it appears that the stock price finished at $25.43...is this the price that the new options will be set at?? Is that the low for those days after the Board Meeting??"

Mr. Roberts, the SEC said, replied that the figure was "the right price." According to the agency, Mr. Roberts wrote up false board minutes saying that the grant was intended to be made Jan. 16.

Mr. Roberts' lawyer, Stephen Neal, wrote in a statement that he intends to "vigorously defend against the charges against Mr. Roberts," but he didn't comment further.

In his statement, Mr. Samenuk's lawyer, Mr. Peters, said: "The Company's General Counsel determined what was the 'right price.' The paperwork Mr. Samenuk signed relating to this grant (which was not exercised) showed the higher price of $27.19." It isn't clear why the paperwork would show a higher price. The company's securities filings record the lower one.

The McAfee case is one of about 140 being investigated by federal authorities who are probing whether companies retroactively picked favorable stock-option-grant dates to enrich their executives.

Mr. Samenuk left McAfee in October 2006 in the wake of an internal probe of the options troubles, and McAfee late last year repriced his grant to the Jan. 15 closing price of $27.19.

Is The S.E.C. Changing Course? (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138260

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — In his first year as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Christopher Cox confounded both supporters and detractors by taking a more moderate and nuanced position than they had predicted on a variety of regulatory issues, based on his record as a conservative Republican lawmaker.

In recent weeks, however, Mr. Cox has begun to send signals, both directly and through aides, that he may be swinging the pendulum more toward business and Wall Street interests and against investor groups.

Some investor advocates and securities law experts say that Mr. Cox, by not pushing for tighter regulation of hedge funds and by urging the Supreme Court to adopt a tougher standard for investors in lawsuits, has begun moving closer to the business view that the administration overreacted to the corporate scandals that began with the collapse of Enron in 2001.

They have also criticized his recent decision to appear at the Chamber of Commerce in two weeks just as it is to issue a report criticizing the Bush administration and the S.E.C. for being too hard on companies.

"You look at a parade of items and it begins to look to me like this commission is starting to take an historic shift away from investor interests," said James D. Cox, a law professor at Duke University.

The S.E.C. chairman strongly disputes that view, noting, for instance, that his appearance before the chamber should not be perceived as a change in the tilt of the agency.

"The United States government has an agency that services business and it is the Department of Commerce," he said. "Our role is to be the investors' advocate. I want to make sure that every company understands that so long as they treat their investors well, the S.E.C. will be friendly to them.

"And if they attempt to drive a wedge between the interests of investors and the interests of management," Mr. Cox added, "we will be their relentless adversaries."

It has not been easy to pigeonhole Mr. Cox. As an influential congressman from Orange County in California, he sponsored a measure to loosen accounting standards for stock options granted to senior executives and another making it harder for investors to sue companies.

But soon after he arrived at the commission in the summer of 2005, Mr. Cox advanced investor-friendly rules to make executive pay packages more transparent. He announced that he would continue to support the initiatives of his predecessor, William H. Donaldson, who ran up against a powerful Wall Street constituency with a great deal of clout in the Bush administration when he sought to regulate hedge funds and mutual funds more tightly.

And Mr. Cox initially disappointed some business groups that had urged him to dilute the force of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the post-Enron legislation that tightened accounting and governance rules, on small companies.

In an hourlong interview this week, Mr. Cox challenged the criticism that he is retrenching from any of that, saying that he has responded to court decisions and budget constraints but that he remains committed to protecting investors.

Moreover, he said that he sharply disagreed with the view, put forward by several business groups in recent months, that tough regulation was making American markets less competitive and driving companies issuing stock to overseas exchanges.

"The inference that some have drawn that this competition is caused by regulation is wrong," Mr. Cox said. "Some have made the case that our strong regulation and enforcement are indeed the cause of the opposite, of our strength. At the Securities and Exchange Commission it is our intent to make those observations true."

But his critics still contend that signs of back-pedaling have begun to emerge.

After the commission suffered a legal setback on tightening hedge fund regulation, Mr. Cox decided to neither appeal the decision nor seek to overturn it. Instead, he abandoned the effort begun by Mr. Donaldson to force all of the firms in the $1 trillion hedge fund industry to be registered and open their books to government examiners. The commission has embarked on a more modest effort to raise the financial qualifications for investing in such funds.

After a second court opinion that questioned the commission's decision to require mutual funds to have independent chairmen, officials said they did not expect the agency to resurrect the proposal.

Earlier this month, the commission filed a brief with the Supreme Court asking the justices to adopt a legal standard that would make it significantly more difficult for investors to sue corporations for fraud.

And it was announced this week that Mr. Cox will be a keynote speaker when the United States Chamber of Commerce holds a daylong conference to issue a long-awaited report recommending that the government relax its criminal pursuit of corporations, limit the civil liability of accounting firms, and water down the corporate and accounting rules that were written in response to the collapse of Enron and other scandals.

Senior Democratic and Republican lawmakers will be at the event, but for the commission, it will represent an awkward appearance.

Over the last five years, the chamber has been a powerful nemesis of the agency, viewing it as a major impediment to its antiregulatory agenda, repeatedly suing the S.E.C. over its rules and heavily lobbying Congress to overturn them.

But to some investor groups and corporate law experts, Mr. Cox's appearance is reflective of a broader political dynamic at the commission, created 73 years ago in the depths of the Depression to police the nation's stock markets, protect investors and keep corporate America honest.

"His presence before the chamber is appalling, and you are beginning to see a real shift into a new high gear," said Barbara Roper, director of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America.

Lately, Ms. Roper said, the tide has begun to turn as the Bush administration enters its final years in office and business groups have complained that the administration had overreacted to a series of corporate scandals that have now faded from the headlines.

It is possible "that we simply misread him," Ms. Roper added, but "as you know, there has been enormous pressure from the business community for some kind of life as they know it pre-Enron and the way it is supposed to look in a Republican administration."

Mr. Cox promised an active pro-investor agenda for the coming year. He said it would include a rewriting of one set of regulations to make fees of 401(k) programs more transparent. In response to local financing scandals, most recently in San Diego, he also plans to begin rewriting the disclosure and accounting rules governing the way cities raise money through bond offerings.

He seemed uncomfortable when asked about his decision to appear before the Chamber of Commerce as it prepared to lobby for less regulation, although he noted that the conference would include the participation of a number of other senior S.E.C. officials, along with Democratic and Republican lawmakers.

He also said that his appearance should not be seen as an endorsement of the chamber's broadly deregulatory set of recommendations, which he said he had not seen.

Mr. Cox, 54, was appointed by President Bush in June 2005 to replace Mr. Donaldson, who abruptly resigned after alienating powerful Wall Street and business interests by embracing some investor causes. Mr. Donaldson sought unsuccessfully to overhaul the way mutual funds are governed, force greater disclosure of hedge fund operations and give institutional shareholders more of a say in the election of directors.

Signaling the prospect of some significantly divisive votes in the coming months, Mr. Cox said that he was not driven to seek consensus or unanimity among the commission's polarized members. Asked about the observations by some that he is driven by consensus, he replied: "That has been oft repeated, but it's not my approach."

He said that after listening to one another, "there is no requirement that we all have to agree," suggesting that he was girding for some policy differences to become public.

Indeed, that seems almost inevitable if the agency is to advance a new agenda.

The agency's longest-serving member, Paul S. Atkins, is a libertarian who has been critical of some rules and has fought both in public and behind the scenes with the agency's two Democrats, Annette L. Nazareth and Roel C. Campos. The fifth commissioner, Kathleen L. Casey, recently joined the agency. Even though she has little record, officials say she has emerged as an important ally of Mr. Atkins.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jury Withdraws Question As Deliberations Continue (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138262

WASHINGTON -- The first question from jurors at the perjury trial of ex-White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby prompted a lot of head-scratching Wednesday but shed little light on their progress.

The jury, now down to seven women and four men, stumbled briefly over legal language in one of the five counts against the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney but resolved the issue quickly and continued deliberating. They went home Wednesday evening without a verdict.

The jurors had sent a note to the judge seeking clarification late Tuesday at the end of their fifth day of deliberations.

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton and nearly a score of defense lawyers and prosecutors spent part of Tuesday evening in their offices and a portion of Wednesday morning in court puzzling over what the jurors were asking and how to respond. Judge Walton remained uncertain, so he sent the jurors a note late Wednesday morning asking them to clarify their question.

By that time, the jurors had resolved their difficulty on their own and moved on. "After further discussion, we are clear on what we need to do," the jury wrote back. "No further clarification needed. Thank you. We apologize."

This episode set off a welter of speculation among lawyers and reporters over what it might reveal about the jurors' deliberations since they got the case at midday last Wednesday.

Only one thing could be said for certain: They had not told the court they were deadlocked.

Mr. Libby is accused of obstruction of justice and of lying to the FBI and a grand jury in 2003 about how he learned the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame and what he said to reporters about the woman, who is married to prominent Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson.

The jurors asked about the third of five counts, leading some observers to speculate they might be halfway through their work. Others, however, suggested the jurors might have reviewed testimony and exhibits before considering specific charges, and then begun with the third count because it is the least complex.

Jurors asked about the charge that Mr. Libby lied to the FBI about his conversation with Time magazine's Matthew Cooper. Mr. Cooper testified that Mr. Libby confirmed for him that Ms. Plame worked for the CIA. Mr. Libby told the FBI he had only told Mr. Cooper he'd heard that from reporters but didn't know if it was true.

Most observers thought the jurors wanted to know if they were to decide whether Mr. Libby's or Mr. Cooper's account of the conversation was correct or whether what Mr. Libby claimed to have told Mr. Cooper was true.

Some, noting that the defense questioned the accuracy of FBI note-taking, thought the jurors wanted to know if they were to decide whether Mr. Libby even gave the FBI that account of the conversation.

All the while, the jurors never emerged from their deliberation room.

Mr. Libby faces up to 30 years in prison if convicted, though he would be likely to get far less time under federal sentencing guidelines.

Libby Jury Asks, Then Figures It Out (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Jurors in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby got back to work late Wednesday morning, after resolving a question about the wording of one of the five charges against the former vice presidential aide.

As court adjourned Tuesday, jurors had passed U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton a note asking for "clarification" of count three of the Libby indictment.

That count charges that Libby lied to FBI investigators about his conversation with Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper. Cooper testified that Libby told him that Valerie Plame, who is married to Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson, worked for the CIA. Libby said he only told Cooper he'd heard that but didn't know if it was true.

In their note, jurors asked whether the lying charge referred to the "content" of Libby's statement or the fact that the statement was made.

On Wednesday morning, Walton asked jurors to "clarify" their question.

Instead, jurors sent back a note indicating that they had resolved their confusion and that "no further clarification (was) needed."

DOJ_NMG_0138263

The notes were the first communication from jurors since they asked for Post-It notes, an easel, masking tape and pictures of witnesses last Wednesday and early last Thursday, shortly after deliberations began.

The notes offered few clues as to how deliberations were proceeding, other than confirming that jurors had not reached a decision on at least one count.

Jurors may have already decided counts one and two, though there is no guarantee that they took up the charges in numerical order.

Through mid-afternoon Wednesday, jurors had deliberated more than 33 hours since getting the case Feb. 21. The jury is now down to seven women and four men after one juror was dismissed Monday.

Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Cheney, is charged with lying about conversations he had with Cooper and NBC reporter Tim Russert about the CIA affiliation of Plame.

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald argued that Libby's wife's name was leaked as part of an attempt to undercut former ambassador Wilson, who accused the Bush administration of "twisting" pre-war intelligence about Iraq's nuclear program after making a CIA-sponsored trip to Africa.

Libby's defense team, led by attorney Theodore Wells, has countered that there was no leak campaign and that Libby is guilty at worst of a faulty memory.

Libby Jury Hits Short-Term Snag On Sixth Day (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

A week into deliberations in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, jurors yesterday provided the first glimpse of the issues they are weighing by signaling confusion over how to interpret one of the five felony counts against the vice president's former top aide.

According to that charge, Libby lied to the FBI about a conversation with a Time magazine reporter.

The jury's confusion, relayed in a note to the presiding judge and released by the court yesterday, proved short-lived. When U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton asked them to clarify their question, the jury members swiftly sent him an apologetic second note, saying they had talked further and "now are clear on what we had to do."

The jury completed its sixth day of deliberation without reaching a verdict.

Libby, 56, is charged with lying to the FBI and a grand jury during a federal investigation into the Bush administration's 2003 leak of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity, and of trying to obstruct the probe. Prosecutors allege that Libby lied about how he learned about Plame and whom he told about her.

Plame is the wife of former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who was sent by the CIA in 2002 to determine whether Iraq was seeking nuclear material in Niger. He found the claims groundless and later accused the Bush administration of twisting his conclusions to justify the war in Iraq. Prosecutors say administration officials disclosed Plame's identity to discredit Wilson by insinuating he was sent on the mission because of nepotism.

Libby's attorneys say their client has a bad memory and inaccurately remembered conversations he had about the couple with colleagues and journalists. Libby is not charged with the leak itself.

The jury's temporary confusion revolved around a false-statement charge that outside legal experts have described as potentially the most difficult of the five counts to prove. It stems from Libby's account to FBI agents of his July 12, 2003, telephone conversation with Matthew Cooper, then a White House reporter for Time magazine.

The outside prosecutors and defense lawyers said there are fewer conflicts between Libby's and Cooper's versions of events than there are in the facts of a second false-statements charge, which arises from a conversation Libby had with NBC News's Washington bureau chief, Tim Russert. They also said defense attorneys had raised doubts during the trial about the FBI's precision and the accuracy of Cooper's note-taking.

FBI agents say Libby told them that in his conversation with Cooper he merely relayed scuttlebutt from other reporters that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA, adding that he did not know whether that was true. Cooper testified he had asked Libby whether

Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and that Libby responded to the effect of "I've heard that, too," without mentioning other reporters or his uncertainty about the truth.

In a three-sentence note sent to the judge late Tuesday afternoon, the jury asked: "Is the charge that the statement was made or is it about the content of the statement itself?"

Yesterday morning, Walton told lawyers for both sides that he was not certain he understood what the jury was asking. The lead defense attorney, Theodore Wells Jr., told the judge the parties believed they understood it.

Deliberations Continue In Libby Case (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

A question sent to the judge by the jury that is deciding the perjury case of I. Lewis Libby Jr. created a stir but did not provide any clarity about the status of the deliberations. The message was received late Tuesday, after the jury had deliberated for more than four days, and was confusing enough for Judge Reggie B. Walton to respond Wednesday morning that he did not fully understand the question. When he asked for clarification, the jurors sent back a second message: Never mind. “We are clear on what we need to do,” the second message read. “No further clarification needed. We apologize.” After the exchange, the jurors continued discussing the case through the day, departing without a verdict.

'Sex Tourists' Warned: Law Is Watching (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, USA TODAY

USA Today, March 1, 2007

U.S. travelers who book trips to countries that are hot spots for child prostitution will begin this month to see ads, brochures and billboards warning that sexual adventures abroad could land them in prison here.

The warnings, written and distributed by religious organizations, child-welfare groups and the federal government, are a sign of a new assault by the Bush administration on the international child sex trade. They also reflect a new law intended to catch U.S. residents who engage in or promote sex with children overseas.

"People assume they can go out of the country and get away with exploiting children in this horrific way," says Mike Garcia, assistant secretary of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement. "We're sending a message. We have the power to (arrest them), and we have the will."

In the past six months, U.S. authorities have arrested two men from Washington state who are accused of having sex in Cambodia with underage boys, and an 85-year-old Los Angeles man is accused of trying to fly to the Philippines for sex with two preteen girls.

Another man, Richard Schmidt, 61, of Baltimore, arrives in the USA today to face charges that he traveled to Cambodia and the Philippines for sex with children. An indictment unsealed Wednesday charges him with molesting eight boys. Schmidt, a former teacher, has been convicted three times of molesting children in the USA. He was released from prison in July 2000. Schmidt fled to the Philippines in June 2002 after Maryland authorities issued an arrest warrant for parole violations, U.S. Department of Justice officials said Wednesday.

Investigators from Immigration and Customs Enforcement have more than 20 other cases underway, including 11 American men who were arrested by Mexican authorities and are awaiting extradition.

Effects of new law

The arrests were made under a child-protection law President Bush signed April 30. It includes a provision that U.S. law enforcement officials say gives them a new tool to prosecute hard-core pedophiles and "sex tourists" who want to engage in sex with children.

Although it had been illegal since 1986 to go abroad with the intent to have sex with someone under 18, prosecutors say the crime was difficult to prove in court. To get a conviction under the new law, prosecutors do not have to prove that U.S. residents left the country specifically to have illegal sex — only that they had illegal sex or tried to do so.

The law doubles the penalties to a mandatory 30 years in prison for each offense. Authorities can use it to arrest owners of travel websites and travel agencies that promote sex tours or arrange for clients to have sex with children.

DOJ_NMG_0138265

The law was a result of pressure on Bush and Congress from conservative religious groups to be more aggressive in fighting the sexual exploitation of children worldwide.

The administration has joined with religious groups to promote the crackdown. And it is getting help from groups with missions in countries where the sex trade is rampant.

Child-advocacy groups estimate that 2 million children worldwide are working in the sex trade. The Internet is rife with tour companies that pitch travel for legal prostitution and make veiled references to sex with children. There are chat rooms in which participants discuss the best locations to find the prettiest girls, the cleanest rooms and the cheapest prices. And the Web allows people to make arrangements to travel to countries, such as Cambodia, Thailand, Costa Rica, Mexico and the Philippines, where child sex is plentiful and law enforcement has been lax.

One destination is Svay Pak, a small town about 7 miles outside the Cambodian capital of Phnom Penh. There, about 30 ramshackle brothels line the streets.

Joe Mettimano, director of the child sex tourism prevention project for World Vision, an international Christian relief organization, visited Svay Pak last year.

"I got 5 feet down the dirt road and I was approached by a young boy asking if I want young girls. He said, 'I can get you 9, 10 years old,' " Mettimano says. For an hour, he observed men going in and out of the brothels. "You hear very distinct Australian, American and European accents."

World Vision is one of several organizations working with the U.S. government to devise pop-up ads on travel websites, posters and pamphlets in airports, and billboards in destination countries that warn of the new penalties. World Vision has received a $500,000 State Department grant for its part of the project.

Because hard-core pedophiles may not be deterred by the ads, they serve more as a warning to "sex tourists." These are the "businessmen and holiday travelers who see the sex trade happening all around them and decide to experiment," Mettimano says.

"Some of these men actually believe that when they go abroad it is acceptable and that they are helping poor people support their families," says Carol Smolenski, executive director of End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes USA. "If you are really concerned about them, then just give them money and don't ask for sex."

Joint enforcement efforts

Travelers who fail to heed the warnings could get nabbed overseas in a joint enforcement effort involving missionaries, social workers, local police and the federal government. Employees and members of charity and religious groups overseas watch for Americans who engage in sex with children. They will turn over names, photos and other evidence to local police, who can arrest offenders and turn them over for prosecution in the USA.

When Cambodian authorities arrested Gary Jackson, 56, of Bainbridge Island, Wash., in September and accused him of having sex with three boys under 16, the charges were based on evidence collected by a social-service organization in Cambodia.

The Cambodian government turned Jackson over to U.S. authorities on Nov. 20 after a federal grand jury in Seattle charged him.

Jackson's defense attorney did not return phone calls. Jackson, who was convicted of a sex offense in Washington in 1981 and sentenced to 10 years in prison, is being held in jail until trial in March.

Records Sought From Corzine (PHI)

By Elisa Ung, Jennifer Moroz

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 1, 2007

TRENTON - The U.S. attorney yesterday subpoenaed records from Gov. Corzine's office, part of a widening investigation into whether lawmakers personally profited by steering money to certain causes.

The subpoenas delivered to the offices of the governor and his chief counsel demand all documents regarding grants that legislators have put in state budgets since 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0138266

An attached letter from U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie requests, in particular, e-mail relating to "grants and assistance, popularly known as 'Christmas Tree items.' "

That phrase refers to last-minute grants secured as officials finalize the state budget each year. Also commonly called "pork," they are a tradition for the ruling party in Trenton, and have gone to such pet projects as a flagpole, park improvements, and community center expansions.

Last month, the U.S. Attorney's Office subpoenaed six Assembly and Senate leaders and Democratic and Republican legislative offices for similar information.

Corzine spokesman Anthony Coley said that the administration would cooperate fully and that the governor had asked Attorney General Stuart Rabner, who previously headed the U.S. attorney's criminal division, to oversee compliance along with the chief counsel's office. The information is due at a grand jury hearing on March 8.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, declined to comment.

The investigation into the closed-door, late-night budget process grew out of a federal criminal probe of State Sen. Wayne Bryant (D., Camden).

The U.S. Attorney's Office is investigating whether Bryant was paid a part-time salary at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey to do nothing other than use his chairmanship of the Budget and Appropriations Committee to steer money to the school. Bryant is no longer chairman.

Though the Legislature decides which grants get added, the governor must approve them when he signs the final state budget. Last year, Corzine cut $52 million from the last-minute additions before signing it.

The information demanded yesterday would also include the administrations of former Govs. Jim McGreevey and Richard J. Codey, who still serves as president of the state Senate. McGreevey did not return a request for comment.

Yesterday, Codey (D., Essex) said much of the paperwork would have already been collected from a subpoena to the Treasury Department last fall. Otherwise, there's not much of a paper trail, he said. "I think we all know that these items are added verbally," Codey said.

Codey is leading an effort to make the grant process more transparent, including a requirement that legislators put their funding requests in writing, names attached, for public review. "I've said before that 95 percent of them go for great causes," he said of the grants. "The other 5 percent can be debated."

While the investigation into Bryant has not yet concluded, Codey said: "I have no knowledge of anybody else who would have traded off putting something in the budget for monetary gain."

Codey said he believed Corzine would fully comply. "I'm sure it wasn't aimed at him," Codey said.

Edwin Stier, a former federal prosecutor and former head of the New Jersey Division of Criminal Justice, said it wasn't unusual for prosecutors to ask for a wide range of information to determine whether a pattern existed. If prosecutors were investigating a zoning board member for bribery, for example, they might ask for other documents to review the conduct of other zoning board members, too.

But while "there have been investigations of high-level officials in both the legislative and executive branches over the years," he said, "I don't recall any situations ever having occurred... where such broad subpoenas are being served on the legislature and now on the governor's office."

Rider University political science professor David Rebovich called the subpoena flurry "a public-relations disaster."

"This ethics investigation could certainly hurt the party in power," Rebovich said, though he added that it would give Corzine "a stick to swing at lawmakers to get through his ethics reform."

Both parties have participated in the process of stuffing last-minute grants into budgets. But Republicans have been quick to note that Democrats ruled the Legislature during the years now under investigation.

"This is the first time I can remember that both the Legislature and the governor's office has the FBI and the U.S. attorney looking into it," said Assembly Minority Leader Alex DeCroce (R., Morris), a legislator since 1989. "So, obviously, something's wrong with the way they [the Democrats] are operating the system."

Subpoenas Delivered To Corzine's Office Seek Budget Documents (NSL)

By Jeff Whelan

Newark Star-Ledger, March 1, 2007

Federal investigators delivered a subpoena to Gov. Jon Corzine's office this afternoon, demanding budget documents in the latest development of a widening corruption probe into millions of dollars in special interest grants.

In an effort to determine what the governor's office knew about the grants, federal prosecutors are seeking budget records, e-mails and other documents for the budget years 2004, 2005 and 2006.

That period spans the administrations of governors James E. McGreevey, Richard Codey, and Corzine, who are all Democrats. While the grants are initiated by lawmakers in a secretive process, the governor must approve them or use his line-item veto to strike them from the budget or reduce them.

Today's move came less than two weeks after U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie served similar subpoenas on both the Democratic and Republican leadership in both the Senate and the Assembly, seeking information on how millions in public funds were handed out over the past three years.

The governor's office confirmed FBI agents delivered the subpoena to the governor's counsel's office this afternoon.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office declined comment.

At issue is more than $1.2 billion in secretive, last-minute budget additions that the Legislature has tacked on to the budget over the past five years. The grants - typically earmarked for pet projects in legislators' home districts - have long been known in Trenton as "Christmas tree items," and have been utilized by lawmakers from both parties for things like road construction, ball fields, school or non-profit programs.

The money has usually been disproportionately distributed in the districts of whatever party controls the Statehouse, records have shown. Sources with direct knowledge of the probe have said that prosecutors are exploring whether any lawmakers sought to steer money to organizations that would have directly benefited them or their families.

Treasury Department records related to the Christmas tree grants have already been subpoenaed by the U.S. Attorney, indicating a growing interest in the matter by prosecutors as far back as November.

The investigation grew out of an ongoing inquiry into Sen. Wayne Bryant (D-Camden).

Corzine's Office Subpoenaed By U.S. Attorney On Budget Documents (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) -- Gov. Jon S. Corzine's office was subpoenaed Wednesday by the U.S. Attorney's Office, a spokesman confirmed.

"We have received them," Corzine spokesman Anthony Coley said.

It's the latest round of subpoenas from federal investigators looking into how the state budget has been developed since 2004.

The records requested from the governor's office span the administrations of Democrats James E. McGreevey, Richard J. Codey and Corzine.

On Feb. 16, the U.S. attorney subpoenaed documents from legislative leaders and their staff offices on grants that have been placed in the budget without public review just before the budget is adopted.

The grants stem from lawmakers, but the governor approves them when signing the budget legislation.

The U.S. Attorney's Office subpoenaed documents from the state Treasury Department and Senate Democrats last year, along with various public agencies where Sen. Wayne Bryant, the former Senate budget chairman, has worked.

Michael Drewniak, spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie, declined to comment on Wednesday.

FBI Serves Subpoenas To State Lawmakers (NEWHOUSE)

Newhouse News Service, March 1, 2007

State Sen. Majority Leader Bernard Kenny, D-Hoboken, was among a number of state lawmakers hit with federal subpoenas Feb. 16, authorities said.

The volley of subpoenas, served on both Democratic and Republican leaders in the Senate and Assembly, were reportedly part of a rapidly expanding corruption investigation into the Statehouse by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie.

DOJ_NMG_0138268

The subpoenas, delivered by FBI agents as lawmakers were heading home that Friday, left many in Trenton thunderstruck.

"Trenton is on fire," declared Assemblyman Kevin O'Toole, R-Wayne, as news of the subpoenas broke. "This is equivalent to Rome burning."

It was the latest development in a federal probe that began last April with an investigation into state Sen. Wayne Bryant, D-Camden. The matter has now expanded into an inquiry into how lawmakers divvy up public funds.

Lawmakers and other Statehouse veterans could not recall a federal probe ever going as deeply into the state's budget process.

In addition to Kenny, subpoenas were delivered to Senate President Richard Codey, D-West Orange; Senate Minority Leader Leonard Lance, R-Flemington; and Assembly Speaker Joseph Roberts, D-Camden, among others.

Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, had no comment and would neither confirm nor deny the issuance of subpoenas.

Sources with direct knowledge of the probe have said that prosecutors are exploring whether some lawmakers have sought, through the state budget process, to steer money to nonprofit organizations that would have directly benefited them or their families.

Codey said lawmakers would provide the information being sought.

"We will comply 100 percent, in every way, shape and form," he said.

State Sen. Jerry Cooper's Trial Reset To June 4 (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. (AP) -- A federal judge in Chattanooga has delayed state Sen. Jerry Cooper's fraud trial two months, agreeing to give the Morrison Democrat until June 4 to recover from a wreck that got him charged with driving under the influence.

Before Cooper's February 7th single-vehicle accident, U.S. District Judge Curtis L. Collier had refused Cooper's request to delay the March 5 trial until after the legislative session ends in May.

Cooper was seriously injured when his sport utility vehicle overturned several times on Interstate 24 in Rutherford County after he attended three legislative receptions in Nashville.

The DUI charge follows a blood-alcohol test by the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation lab.

Cooper is recovering at home and District Attorney William Whitesell has withheld results of the DUI test while allowing the senator to surrender on the charge when he feels well enough.

In the pending federal case, the senator has pleaded not guilty to charges of bank fraud, mail fraud and conspiracy to commit bank and mail fraud. The charges involve a land deal.

Cooper Fraud Trial Delayed Until June 4 (CHAT)

The Chattanoogan, March 1, 2007

The fraud trial of Sen. Jerry Cooper has been delayed until June 4 due to the single-vehicle crash he was involved in on Feb. 7.

The accident left Cooper with a cerebral concussion, multiple fractured ribs and other serious injuries, making it impossible for the politician to assist in preparing for a federal fraud trial that had been scheduled to begin on March 5, prosecution and defense attorneys in the case had agreed.

Judge Curtis Collier set the new trial date.

He declined a prosecution motion for a hearing to determine if Sen. Cooper was healing quicker than expected.

Cooper, who federal authorities say used his political influence to get a fraudulent appraisal on a lumber mill that he was selling to an Alabama couple, is charged with bank fraud, mail fraud, and conspiracy to commit bank and mail fraud.

Cooper also faces DUI and speeding charges in connection with the wreck.

THP Chief Says Sen. Cooper Hasn't Been Given Favoritism (AP)

By Bill Poovey

DOJ_NMG_0138269

AP, February 28, 2007

CHATTANOOGA - When state Sen. Jerry Cooper overturned his sport utility vehicle after attending three legislative receptions, the Tennessee highway patrol commander rushed to the wreck behind working patrol officers and emergency responders.

A Department of Safety spokesman initially said preliminary reports showed no alcohol in the Morrison Democrat's vehicle, but at least one witness who stopped on Interstate 24 the evening of Feb. 7 said there was an empty Jack Daniel's bottle nearby.

The Tennessee Bureau of Investigation rushed Cooper's blood-alcohol test and gave the results to the Department of Safety.

Cooper was charged with driving under the influence and speeding.

But three weeks after the wreck, the results of the test still haven't been released to the public. The department also has refused to say how fast Cooper was driving.

At the time of the accident, Cooper was free on a federal bond, a court-ordered agreement requiring him to obey all state laws pending a bank fraud and mail fraud trial. Cooper's injuries have prompted a federal judge in Chattanooga to delay the trial two months, to June 4. The delay order Tuesday did not mention the DUI charge or the bond.

The handling of Cooper's single-vehicle wreck and subsequent DUI charge has raised questions about whether the lawmaker got special treatment because of political favoritism.

Col. Mike Walker - commander of the Tennessee Highway Patrol, still trying to shake off a political favoritism scandal - said this week that Cooper has received no preferential treatment from him or the Highway Patrol.

Walker said he lives close to the wreck site in Rutherford County and went to assist, partly because Cooper was saying in the moments after the accident that his wife was with him.

"People can question a lot of things about me but not my professionalism or my integrity," said Walker, who was promoted to commander last year after an overhaul of the troopers' top brass. "I did not get into the investigation."

Tennessee Department of Safety Commissioner David Mitchell said there were "absolutely not" any favors by the Highway Patrol.

After two weeks of recovering at home, Cooper was back in a hospital Tuesday, scheduled for surgery that will likely keep him there for a week.

Imam Gets 8 Years On Weapons Charges (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 1, 2007

A West Philadelphia imam who argued that he was entrapped by federal agents investigating unfounded terrorism suspicions was sentenced yesterday to eight years and four months in prison on weapons charges.

Wayne Hogue, who is also known as Imam Wadir and Shaheed Bay, was secretly recorded selling 11 guns, including three assault rifles, to an FBI informant working for the Joint Terrorism Task Force.

In early 2002, terrorism task-force agents had asked the informant, Hezekiah Salone, to keep "his ears and eyes open" for trouble at Hogue's mosque, at 52d and Chestnut Streets in West Philadelphia, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Zaleski.

Salone did not find evidence of terrorism or drug-dealing.

U.S. District Judge Timothy Savage, who has privately reviewed secret FBI files in the case, said yesterday that the mosque was not suspected of any wrongdoing.

However, after spending more than a year developing Hogue's confidence, the informant was able to record 11 gun sales in a 10-month period. Zaleski said Hogue initiated the purchases.

Hogue's lawyer, Paul J. Hetznecker, said that the informant was the one who initiated them.

At trial, public defenders Dina Chavar and Catherine Henry portrayed the informant, who called himself Rocky, as an untrustworthy opportunist who was paid $46,000 by the FBI and targeted Hogue to keep himself in the agents' good graces.

Hogue, a street vendor who is well known for running a neighborhood chess game, yesterday told the judge that he had tried to help Salone because he believed he was a wayward drug dealer.

DOJ_NMG_0138270

"But as I was trying to pull him out, he was pulling me in," Hogue said.

"If it wasn't for the bionic rat," he said, referring to Salone, "I wouldn't be here... . These people hoodwinked and bamboozled me... . The money was good... . He was good. I was sucked in."

Savage replied: "You knew better. Someone could have been seriously hurt or killed... . You not only betrayed your family, you betrayed your faith... . You betrayed your ideals."

Two More Plead Guilty In Reputed Mob Trash-hauling Scheme (WESTJN)

By Timothy O'Connor

Westchester Journal News, March 1, 2007

Two former managers at a Mount Kisco trash transfer station have pleaded guilty to their part in a reputed mob-backed racketeering effort to control the garbage-hauling industry in southern Connecticut and parts of the Lower Hudson Valley.

Scott McGowan, 37, of 2 Morningside Ave., Yonkers, and Jeremy Everett, 31, of Shelton, Conn., pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven, Conn., to conspiring to commit racketeering. The crime carries a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison. But federal sentencing guidelines will likely call for a much lesser sentence.

Twenty-nine people were indicted in June by a federal grand jury in New Haven in what federal prosecutors said was a scheme by some trash haulers to carve up territory, inflate prices, and not compete against each other for contracts. The alleged conspiracy was backed by mob muscle, federal authorities said, as a means to persuade haulers to play by the scheme's rules.

The pleas by McGowan and Everett bring to 13 the number of people who have been convicted in connection with the plot.

In December, Matthew "Matty the Horse" Ianniello, 86, of Long Island, the reputed former head of the Genovese Crime Family, pleaded guilty to taking part in the scheme. Authorities charged that Ianniello received a quarterly "mob tax" of $30,000 from the conspiracy's participants. James Galante, a trash magnate from Danbury, Conn., and his reputed silent partner, Thomas Milo of Mamaroneck, were accused of being leaders of the plot. Milo's daughter, Anna Priskie, 45, of Cortlandt, was sentenced two weeks ago to six months' house arrest and probation after admitting she had a no-show job at Galante's companies in Danbury.

McGowan was Allied Waste's manager of the Westchester County Transfer Station in Mount Kisco. Everett was the sales manager. In one secretly recorded telephone conversation, the two men were heard agreeing to ban another hauler from using the transfer station to help another co-conspirator punish the hauler for not participating in the "property rights" scheme.

Allied Waste has since sold its Mount Kisco operation to Regus Industries.

Everett is expected to be sentenced May 16. McGowan will be sentenced May 17. Neither man could be reached for comment.

'Old Man' Pleads Guilty To Racketeering (MIH)

By Nikki Waller

Miami Herald, March 1, 2007

Reputed mobster Albert Facchiano, 96, will likely get house arrest for charges that, if not for his age, could have meant 20 years in prison.

Albert Facchiano, a 96-year-old Miami man believed to be the oldest person ever indicted by federal authorities, pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges of racketeering, loan sharking and intimidating a witness who was poised to testify against the Genovese crime family.

Facchiano appeared in federal court in Fort Lauderdale and used headphones to hear the judge and his attorneys.

Because of back troubles, he sat, instead of standing, to enter his guilty plea.

He could face up to 20 years for federal conspiracy and racketeering charges filed in Florida, and up to 10 more for federal charges of witness tampering filed in New York.

Facchiano, who turns 97 this month, sees a doctor four times a week and "couldn't have withstood two trials," said his lawyer, Brian McComb.

Prosecutors said Facchiano, nicknamed "The Old Man," supervised associates who committed crimes including extortion, robberies, money laundering and bank fraud.

Federal prosecutors in both states, along with the U.S. Department of Justice, have recommended that Facchiano be sentenced to house arrest.

McComb, said he believes U.S. District Judge James Cohn will go along with those recommendations at sentencing in May.

"The judge is cognizant of his medical condition and his age," McComb said.

With Witnesses At Risk, Murder Suspects Go Free (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

NEWARK, Feb. 27 — When Yusef Johnson, a 15-year-old honors student, was killed outside an apartment complex here so gang-infested it is known as Crazyville, a witness came forward within days and told the police she knew the man she had seen fire the fatal shots.

In another case three months later, in November 2005, officers found two people who identified a street gang leader as the man they saw kill a marijuana dealer named Valterez Coley during a dispute over a woman.

And when Isaiah Stewart, a 17-year-old wearing an electronic monitoring bracelet from a recent brush with the law, was gunned down that December, another Newark teenager sketched a diagram of the crime scene, correctly identified the murder weapon and named a former classmate as the person he had watched commit the crime.

They seem like slam-dunk cases, but none of the three suspects have been arrested. It is not that detectives are unsure of their identity or cannot find them. Rather, it is because so many recent cases here have been scuttled when witnesses were scared silent that the Essex County prosecutor has established an unwritten rule discouraging pursuit of cases that rely on a single witness, and those in which witness statements are not extensively corroborated by forensic evidence.

The 3 are among at least 14 recent murders in Newark in which witnesses have clearly identified the killers but no charges have been filed, infuriating local police commanders and victims' relatives.

In 8 of the 14 cases, according to court documents and police reports, there was more than one witness; in two of them, off-duty police officers were among those identifying the suspects. But in a DNA era, these are cases with little or no physical evidence, and they often involve witnesses whose credibility could be compromised by criminal history or drug problems, or both.

"No one wants to solve these cases and lock up the killers in these cases more than we do," the county prosecutor, Paula T. Dow, said in a recent interview. "But we have to weigh the evidence and move forward only if we believe that the witnesses are credible and that they'll be there to testify at trial."

The tension between the police and prosecutors here over the evolving standards of evidence required to authorize arrest warrants is a stark example of the profound effect witness intimidation is having on the criminal justice system in New Jersey and across the country.

Surveys conducted by the National Youth Gang Center, which is financed by the federal Department of Justice, have found that 88 percent of urban prosecutors describe witness intimidation as a serious problem.

In both Baltimore and Boston, where "stop snitching" campaigns by rap artists and gang leaders have urged city residents not to cooperate with the authorities, prosecutors estimate that witnesses face some sort of intimidation in 80 percent of all homicide cases.

In Essex County, prosecutors report that witnesses in two-thirds of their homicides receive overt threats not to testify, with defendants and their supporters sometimes canvassing witnesses' neighborhoods wearing T-shirts printed with the witnesses' photographs or distributing copies of their statements to the police.

Dozens of New Jersey murder cases have been undone over the past five years after witnesses were killed, disappeared before trial or changed their stories.

In 2004, the Newark police determined that four people found dead in a vacant lot had been killed to silence a witness to a murder; a witness to that quadruple homicide was later shot to death as well.

DOJ_NMG_0138272

Ms. Dow, who was appointed in 2003 amid criticism of county prosecutors' ability to close cases, said she was simply adapting to the evolving code on the streets, where gang violence and widespread distrust of law enforcement have deprived prosecutors of one of the legal system's most crucial components: dependable witnesses.

The state's attorney in Baltimore, where witness intimidation is a notorious problem, has taken an even more rigid stand, refusing to file charges in any single-witness case without extensive forensic corroboration.

But that approach differs sharply from those of prosecutors in many other urban areas, like Brooklyn, where the district attorney, Charles J. Hynes, has in recent years taken to reviewing all single-witness cases personally.

In Newark, where the homicide rate has risen in the past few years, the police, local politicians and victims' relatives are all questioning why prosecutors are holding detectives to a higher standard than the law requires — and letting dangerous criminals remain on the streets.

"How can they leave him out there?" asked Yusef's mother, Tosha Braswell, referring to the man who shot him. "Are they waiting for him to kill someone else's son?"

Tension Between Officials

Newark's mayor, Cory A. Booker, who was elected last year on a promise to reduce crime in the city, recently met with Ms. Dow to ask her to be more aggressive in filing charges. In recent years Newark police officials have accused the prosecutor of being reluctant to take on cases that could be difficult to win because her office was criticized after losing a succession of high-profile trials.

The police director, Garry F. McCarthy, worries that the prosecutor's approach undermines his crime-fighting strategy of focusing on the small group of criminals responsible for a disproportionate amount of crime.

"The law states the standard for arrest is probable cause, which is different than what is required for conviction beyond a reasonable doubt," Mr. McCarthy said. "Our goal is to arrest quickly to avoid the potential for additional crime. An arrest does not prevent an ongoing investigation from proceeding."

Ms. Dow declined to discuss details of any open cases. But she said that she was proud of her office's performance, and that she hoped her rigorous standards for filing charges would lead investigators to work harder at getting corroboration.

"It's easy for the police to point fingers when they haven't done enough detective work to get a conviction," she said.

In Essex County, the conviction rate for homicides, which includes plea agreements, was 79 percent in 2006, up from 74 percent when Ms. Dow took over three years earlier (but down from 86 percent in 2005 and 83 percent in 2004).

In Baltimore, prosecutors under Patricia C. Jessamy, the state's attorney, obtained convictions in 65 percent of homicide cases last year, up from 59 percent in 2005 and 52 percent in 2004.

While prosecutors are often measured by such conviction rates, it is difficult to tell through statistics whether they are shying from hard-to-win cases.

What most irks the police is the failure to even file charges in cases in which witnesses have solidly identified a suspect, like the 14 here in Newark over the past three years in which Ms. Dow has declined to authorize arrest warrants. Six of these cases rely on a single witness, including the slayings of Yusef Johnson and Valterez Coley.

Yusef was a football star with a 3.7 grade-point average before he was killed in August 2005. According to police reports, a woman told detectives she had seen the shooting from 30 feet away and was well acquainted with the gunman, a member of the Crips street gang, because he frequently sold cocaine to her.

The case helps illustrate why prosecutors may shy away from single-witness cases: Given the suspect's status as both a gang member and the witness's drug supplier, even detectives have their doubts about whether the woman would ultimately testify at trial — or be believed.

On the night Mr. Coley was gunned down near a porch in Newark's Central Ward, two men told the police they had seen the gunman, whom they identified as a leader of the 252 Bloods street gang. The witnesses said the gunman was looking to settle a score with a young man who had a relationship with his girlfriend, and mistook Mr. Coley for his rival.

But one of the men soon fled the state, leaving the police with a lone witness — and thus no charges have been brought.

Danger in Cooperation

DOJ_NMG_0138273

Gregory DeMattia, chief of the Essex County prosecutor's homicide division, said his investigators saw fallout from witness intimidation every day. When they arrive at a crime scene, he said, bystanders scatter so neighbors will not think they are cooperating with the police.

Those who do help often do so surreptitiously — leaving detectives a note in a trash can or asking to be taken away in handcuffs "so that neighbors will think they're in trouble with the police and not cooperating," Mr. DeMattia said.

Prosecutors in other cities tell similar stories about their witnesses being pressured, and say they are cautious about pursuing cases based on lone witnesses because of worries about faulty memory, ulterior motives and, as in the Yusef Johnson case, credibility.

That is part of why Ms. Jessamy, in Baltimore, has all but refused to file charges in single-witness situations.

But across Maryland in Prince George's County, where there is also a serious gang problem, State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey has taken the opposite tack. He insists on pursuing single-witness cases even though he was criticized publicly for losing 4 of them in 13 months.

"If you have a single witness and you believe their story, I believe you've got to go forward, even if it's a case you might lose," said Mr. Ivey, whose office's conviction rate on homicides is more than 80 percent. "I'm not going to give the gang members, the murderers and the rapists an easy out. And if they know that all they have to do is get your case down to one witness, I think it would encourage them to use even more intimidation." Here in Newark, even in cases with multiple witnesses — and occasionally even when one of those witnesses is a police officer — the prosecutor has sometimes been unwilling to authorize arrests.

Take the case of Lloyd Shears, an Army veteran killed during a robbery in December. A man told the police he had seen his neighbor fire the fatal shots. A woman who had been standing next to him told detectives she heard the shots, and then turned to see the neighbor running from the scene. But the neighbor has not been charged.

Or consider the killing of Shamid Wallace, an 18-year-old found face down in the street last August with several gunshot wounds in his torso. Detectives found two witnesses who identified the man they said they saw kill Mr. Wallace. An off-duty Newark police officer heard the gunshots, saw a man fleeing with a gun and later picked the suspect out of a photo array. The suspect has not been arrested.

Then there is Farad Muhammad, who was stabbed to death last July. One witness told the police she had seen someone she knew running away from Mr. Muhammad's body. An off-duty police officer from neighboring East Orange identified the same man, saying he had seen the suspect chasing Mr. Muhammad with a knife. Again, no charges were filed.

Yusef's parents, who keep a shrine of photographs surrounding his school sports trophies, still hope that his suspected killer will be arrested soon.

"It's like they don't care enough," said his father, Scottie Edwards, a delivery truck driver.

Wielding Fear Like a Weapon

But to those who suggest Ms. Dow is overreacting to the problem of witness intimidation, her supporters point to the death of Steven Edwards, who was shot and killed in a car on South Eighth Street in January 2006. Within a month, detectives had three witnesses identifying the gunman.

One of the witnesses, a gang member, quickly announced he would never testify for fear he would be ostracized for helping the police — or wind up murdered himself. Six months later, another witness was himself charged in two homicides, shattering any credibility.

The third witness picked the suspect out of a photo array, but immediately began to waver when asked about testifying in open court.

"She would not say she was 100 percent sure," said a police report on the case, "because she was afraid of retaliation."

Prosecutors Help The Fearful Be Good Witnesses (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

In their Forestville neighborhood, Lionel D. Gilliam and his criminal cohorts trafficked in cocaine and fear.

DOJ_NMG_0138274

Between July and October 2002, Gilliam, then a teenager, killed four men as he spearheaded a crack cocaine ring.

Gilliam killed two of his victims because he thought they were providing information about him and his accomplices to police, according to testimony in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt. On Feb. 8, after a six-week trial, a federal jury convicted Gilliam of four murders and other crimes.

Gilliam, now 23, fatally gunned down a longtime friend, Donald "Tweedy" Twitty, July 16, 2002. Gilliam thought Twitty was providing police with information about his criminal activities, according to testimony.

Three months later, Gilliam fatally shot Juan J. Clark 11 times with an AK-47. One government witness testified that in the moments before the killing, Gilliam accused Clark of talking to police.

Gilliam was also convicted of a slew of other violent crimes and drug offenses. Sean A. Simpson, 24, was convicted of one count of murder in one of the four killings. Norberto Quinones, 24, was convicted of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances and other offenses.

The violence committed by Gilliam and Simpson made them feared figures in their neighborhood, federal prosecutors said.

At least five government witnesses testified they were reluctant to take the stand, and some said they feared for their safety. Nonetheless, by keeping in contact with their witnesses -- and recording their grand jury testimony -- federal prosecutors succeeded in getting them to appear at the trial, providing important testimony for the government.

State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey said he is considering emulating the methods federal prosecutors used to obtain the testimony of fearful witnesses. Ivey said he distributed copies of a news article about the convictions to prosecutors in his office to get them to start thinking about using the federal approach.

He has reason to look at other ways to win convictions.

In the 13 months beginning in January 2006, cases against 12 defendants charged with murder in Prince George's County Circuit Court never made it to a jury, primarily because of problems with witnesses.

Circuit Court judges dropped charges against two defendants, and prosecutors dropped charges against the other 10. In cases involving six defendants, prosecutors couldn't find vital witnesses as trials were about to start. In one case involving two defendants, a key prosecution witness stopped cooperating on the eve of trial. In two other cases, prosecutors determined that their lone, uncorroborated witness was unreliable.

Although he could not point to specific attacks on state witnesses, Ivey said he thinks many witnesses made themselves scarce because they were fearful of retaliation.

In the Gilliam trial, federal prosecutors overcame that with a straightforward approach and some old-school technology, said Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein.

When his office wins an indictment, a lead prosecutor and a case agent (from the FBI, in this instance) are assigned, and it is their responsibility to stay in touch with witnesses and make sure they appear in court, Rosenstein said.

Federal prosecutors also make it clear to witnesses that they can face legal consequences if they do not appear for court.

"We are very aggressive in assuring that witnesses show up," Rosenstein said. "If they don't show, we get an arrest warrant, and they can be prosecuted for contempt of court or obstruction. If they take the stand and testify falsely, they can be prosecuted for perjury."

To guard against witnesses who at trial suffer sudden memory loss or deviate from their grand jury testimony, federal prosecutors often record the grand jury testimony of government witnesses, Rosenstein said.

In the case involving Gilliam and his drug ring, government witness Iesha Nicole Johnson of Prince George's County, 20, testified at the trial that she did not remember testifying before the grand jury. U.S. District Judge Roger W. Titus allowed federal prosecutors to play an audiotape of Johnson's grand jury testimony, in which Johnson said Gilliam had admitted to killing Twitty and someone else.

Ivey said he is considering taping the grand jury testimony of state witnesses who might be subject to intimidation. Typically, such testimony is recorded by a court reporter.

"That's something we're looking to do," Ivey said. "I think it's absolutely a great way to go."

Channeling Garth Brooks, Ney Sends Farewell E-mail (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, March 1, 2007

Former Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), who will report today to federal prison in West Virginia, issued an emotional goodbye e-mail (see below) yesterday to friends and colleagues. He thanked them for their support over the past six months and told them he had "gained a higher power" to help him through his incarceration.

The e-mail closed with a quote from Garth Brooks's "The Dance": "And now I'm glad I didn't know/ The way it all would end, the way it all would go/ Our lives are better left to chance/ I could have missed the pain/ But I'd have had to miss the dance."

Ney will serve a sentence of 30 months on federal bribery charges. He resigned from Congress in November after pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy and making false statements.

In his letter, Ney expressed a mixture of hope and regret.

"Someone asked me the other day, if I wish I had never ran for office," he wrote. "I answered that I am glad that I did ... Nothing can erase the wonderful memories, thoughts, constituents, and changes that we, working together with the Republicans and Democrats, have been able to do."

He expressed sorrow for the crimes he had committed and said he was willing to accept the consequences of his actions.

"My family and I have lost everything on an economical basis, house, health care, possessions, but so have other people, people in the district, many, have lost all," he wrote. "And yes, that is painful for anyone that has gone through it, but, I am so fortunate to have my wife and children, we are so rich with family, friends like you, loved ones that are there for us, and full of hope for a good future.

"The darkest days are not ahead, I have gained a higher power, the god of my understanding, is with all of us and that allows me to view tomorrow, although as a day of loss of freedom, as a day of enlightenment and of life to come," concluded Ney.

Ellen Ratner, a close friend of Ney's, said the former congressman is particularly grateful that he is sober. Before his sentencing, Ney completed a month in an alcohol treatment facility.

"He has thanked me numerous times for helping him achieve his sobriety," Ratner said. "I'm just mad at myself for not doing it earlier."

Ratner said she dined last week with Ney and that she comforted the lawmaker and told him that his incarceration could be a positive experience.

"Obviously he is scared, but he believes he is going to get through this," she said. "I think he has learned and knows that it can be an extremely positive experience, by using it as a time to reflect."

"Bob made some serious mistakes, and he and his family are paying a steep price for them," said another Ney associate, who did not want to be named. "But he's taken responsibility for his actions and he still has many people who care deeply for him. Over the course of his long career, Bob helped countless people and thousands of lives were improved because of his hard work and compassionate spirit."

The associate added, "It's very sad that all of that will be overshadowed for the foreseeable future, but hopefully one day more people will look back and recognize that this is a decent man who did a lot of good and who is determined to make amends for his terrible mistakes in judgment."

Ratner agreed. "I don't think we have seen the last of Bob Ney," she said. "I think people are going to see that he is a very good person. It may take some time, but they will."

Ney first signaled the problems that lay ahead when he resigned from his chairmanship on the powerful House Administration Committee last August and announced he would not run for reelection. Ney later admitted he accepted thousands of dollars of gifts from lobbyists in exchange for legislative favors, and he formally confessed his wrongdoings in November. On Jan. 19, he became the first lawmaker sentenced for involvement in the scandal surrounding former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

His ex-chief of staff, Will Heaton, was sentenced on Monday for his role in the scandal, which included concealing thousands of dollars in gifts from lobbyists for himself and Ney.

New Jersey Targets Sex Offenders' Internet Use, Online Dating Site Rules

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) -- Amid growing concern about child safety on the computer, New Jersey lawmakers are considering a measure to prohibit released sex offenders from using the Internet and to impose new rules for online dating sites.

"We're living in some very scary times," said Senate President Richard J. Codey, who is spearheading New Jersey's effort. "No matter how much you trust your kids, no matter how much you think you know what they're doing, there are some sick people out there who will stop at nothing to prey on them."

Released sex offenders caught using the Internet would face up to 18 months in jail and fines of up to $10,000. Sex offenders caught using the Internet to solicit a child would face a mandatory five years in jail, rather than the three years they face under the current law.

The measure also requires online dating sites to tell New Jersey residents whether they do background checks.

No federal law imposes Internet restrictions on convicted sex offenders, though Florida and Nevada have laws imposing computer restrictions on sex offenders.

The plan is to be considered soon by the state Senate, but already has raised constitutional questions. Internet companies like Yahoo!, AOL, eHarmony and Match.com are also concerned about the online dating rule.

Bill Ashworth, director of state government affairs at Yahoo!, said background checks are unreliable because of fraud and problems getting information from states with different laws on what information is available.

"Criminal background checks provide users of online dating with a false sense of security," he said. "The last thing we want users to do is let their guard down."

A 2000 U.S. Department of Justice survey of youths ages 10 to 17 found that about one in five received a sexual solicitation or approach over the Internet in the prior year. The concern has prompted several states to take steps against child solicitation through the Internet.

Last year, Colorado banned any person from using a computer to talk to an unrelated child under age 15 without parental permission if the person if at least four years older than the child. Kansas and Oklahoma have made electronic solicitation of a child a crime.

"People have to worry about people preying on their kids even when they're in the safety of their own home," said Codey, D-Essex.

The New Jersey proposal would apply to sex offenders subject to Megan's Law registration, community supervision for life and those on probation or parole.

Under the plan, convicted sex offenders would have to submit to periodic, unannounced examinations of their computer equipment, install equipment on their computer so its use could be monitored and inform law enforcement if they have access to a computer.

But Parry Aftab, a lawyer, author and executive director of WiredSafety.org, an online safety and education group based in Bergen County, said Internet restrictions for sex offenders may not survive a court challenge. She said the idea makes her "child protection hat conflict with my Internet privacy lawyer hat."

"So many human services and educational services are available online that I think they may not have access to services that they should have access to," Aftab said.

She said keeping sex offenders off the Internet would be difficult to enforce, but that monitoring equipment would help put people back in jail when they violate it.

"(The measure) is going to be ignored by anyone who's predatorial," Aftab said.

Tom Rosenthal, of the New Jersey Office of the Public Defender, said the office will look into the constitutional ramifications of the proposal and expressed concern that barring juvenile sex offenders from the Internet would deny them educational opportunities.

He said it may also be best to rely on parole officers' vigilance to decide whether computers need to be checked after finding probable cause.

DOJ_NMG_0138277

"We think it's best to leave discretion in the hands of professional law enforcement," he said.

Aftab also questioned whether the law regarding background checks for online dating sites, which she thought would be a first, would be effective.

Both Ashworth and Aftab said emphasizing safety tips on meeting people through the computer was the better approach.

Supreme Court Says Cross-Examination Rule Not Retroactive (LAW/AP)

By Mark Sherman, The Associated Press

AP, March 1, 2007

The Supreme Court unanimously reinstated a Nevada child molester's conviction Wednesday in a decision that continued the justices' refusal to apply recent rulings on criminal procedure to older cases.

Marvin Bockting was convicted in 1988 on the strength of his stepdaughter's statements to police. But then-6-year-old Autumn Bockting did not testify at Bockting's trial, so his lawyers never had the opportunity to question the child.

In 2004, the Court ruled that defendants have a constitutional right to cross-examine witnesses against them.

The question in this case was whether that rule would apply to older cases like Bockting's. Justice Samuel Alito, writing for the Court, said it would not. The 2004 case "did not effect a change of this magnitude," Alito said.

The Supreme Court has refused a dozen times over 17 years to apply new rules of criminal procedure to older cases.

Alone among federal appeals courts, however, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the rule should apply retroactively and overturned Bockting's conviction.

Nevada and the Bush administration urged the justices to conclude that the San Francisco-based court got it wrong. Among other things, they said courts would be burdened by defendants whose convictions depended on out-of-court statements that were not subject to cross-examination.

Franny Forsman, the federal public defender who represented Bockting, said the right to confront a witness was so important to the integrity of the trial that it deserved the same consideration as, say, the Court's landmark ruling in the 1960s that guaranteed a lawyer to defendants in criminal trials.

The Court, however, disagreed. Alito said the decision on cross-examination "is much more limited in scope" than the Court's ruling in Gideon v. Wainwright assuring representation for defendants.

Forsman had also discounted the argument that many convictions would be imperiled by a ruling favorable to her client.

The case is Whorton v. Bockting, 05-595.

An L.A. 'most-wanted' Gang Suspect Caught In Guatemala (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Patrick McGreevy

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

An alleged 18th Street gang member named three weeks ago as one of the Los Angeles Police Department's 10 most wanted gang members has been captured in Guatemala and deported back to Texas, officials said today.

Angel Zevallos, an alleged 18th Street Westside member who goes by the name "Spanky," was captured last week and deported by Guatemalan authorities, said Chief Inspector John Clark of the U.S. Marshals Service in Los Angeles.

Zevallos will appear before a judge in Texas and then face extradition back to California to face an attempted murder charge, Clark said.

Police Chief William J. Bratton confirmed the arrest as the first success of a new program in which the department released a list of its 10 most wanted gang members.

The listing of gang fugitives and of the 11 worst gangs is part of a new campaign to reduce gang violence, which increased more than 15% citywide last year. Bratton has redeployed more than 200 officers to the crackdown on gangs.

Zevallos allegedly wounded a man in a bar fight in Los Angeles.

"He was captured in Guatemala," Bratton said. "This is part of what we discussed at a recent conference about improving relationships with those countries. He is an attempted murder suspect, so they don't have problems about giving him back to us because there is no death penalty involved."

DOJ_NMG_0138278

Bratton said further coordination with the U.S. Marshals Service will be required for others on the top 10 list, "a lot of these people, we believe, are out of this country, and those not wanted for murder we have the ability to get back."

Many countries will not extradite suspects to the United States if they face the death penalty.

Bratton said Zevallos' place on the list will not be empty long.

"We will be putting a new person on the list," the chief said.

2 Paintings By Picasso Are Stolen In Paris (NYT)

By Alan Riding

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 28 — Two important paintings by Picasso estimated by the police to be worth a total of about $66 million have been stolen from the Left Bank home of his granddaughter Diana Widmaier-Picasso, the authorities announced Wednesday.

Paris police officials said the two oils, "Maya With Doll" from 1938 and "Portrait of Jacqueline" from 1961, were taken from Ms. Widmaier-Picasso's house on the Rue de Grenelle in the city's chic Seventh Arrondissement sometime overnight between Monday and Tuesday.

The police said that two drawings, one by Picasso, were also stolen, but this could not be confirmed by the Picasso family lawyer, Céline Astolfe.

In a telephone interview Ms. Astolfe said that Ms. Widmaier-Picasso and her mother, Maya, the daughter of Picasso's longtime mistress Marie-Thérèse Walter, were asleep in the house when the theft occurred.

"They heard a noise, went downstairs and saw nothing," Ms. Astolfe said. "They went to bed and the following morning they saw that two paintings were missing."

The lawyer said the theft appeared to be the work of professionals because the home's alarms were neutralized and there were no signs of a break-in. "They blocked the alarm, and they had either the code or keys," she said.

Although the paintings formed part of the Picasso family's private collection, they are nonetheless well known and, art experts said, would be difficult to sell on the open market. Ms. Astolfe said their value might exceed the police estimate.

"Maya With Doll" is a colorful Cubist portrait of Picasso's daughter as a child clutching a doll, while "Portrait of Jacqueline" is a black, gray and white Cubist oil of Jacqueline Roque, Picasso's second wife, whom he married in 1961.

Thefts of works by Picasso have become relatively common, not least because he was so prolific. London's Art Loss Register lists 444 missing Picassos in its database, including paintings, lithographs, drawings and ceramics. There is also an active industry making and selling fake Picassos.

The artist's descendants have had artworks stolen before. One famous theft involved pieces worth about $17 million, taken from the Cannes home of Marina Picasso, another of his granddaughters, in 1989. Those were later recovered. Seven Picasso oils stolen from a gallery in Zurich in 1994 have yet to be found.

Neither Diana Widmaier-Picasso nor her mother could be reached on Wednesday.

Like other members of the family they are active in studying and overseeing the artist's legacy. Maya Widmaier-Picasso is often called on to verify questionable works attributed to Picasso, while her daughter, an art historian, recently published an illustrated book of Picasso's erotic works called "Art Can Only Be Erotic."

A Museum To Honor Law Enforcers (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

You're a cop. You've been summoned to an alley behind a strip mall that's a known drug hangout. You hail a man and two women lounging by an old car.

The man, a beefy guy in a plaid work shirt, gets belligerent and starts toward you. One of the women grabs his arm to hold him back, and as you focus on them, the other woman slips a pistol from her pocket and opens fire.

Bang. You're dead.

DOJ_NMG_0138279

This big-screen interactive simulation of an eight-second slice in the virtual life of an everyday cop was demonstrated yesterday as the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund kicked off the money-raising campaign for a new museum, planned to open in 2011 near Judiciary Square.

Nearly $30 million has been raised for the museum, which is designed to showcase police work and the history of American law enforcement. Yesterday's event began a drive to raise the rest of the $80 million cost, with officials previewing some of the attractions.

The police training simulation, in which participants must make snap shoot-or-don't-shoot decisions, is one of several interactive features. Visitors also will be able to attend a simulated autopsy -- which will be "instructive, not gross" -- do realistic forensic and detective work, and see a word-class collection of police memorabilia, according to museum officials.

The fundraising drive was launched at the National Press Club with a boost from former presidents Bill Clinton and George H. W. Bush, who spoke via video recording, and former U.S. attorneys general John D. Ashcroft, Dick Thornburgh and Edwin A. Meese, who spoke in person. Several local officials also attended, including D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, D.C. Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier, Prince George's County Police Chief Melvin C. High and Fairfax County Police Chief David M. Rohrer.

Also present was Jean Hill, president of Concerns of Police Survivors, which supports families and friends of slain police officers. Hill is the mother of Barry Hill, a 38-year-old Harris County, Tex., deputy sheriff, who was shot seven times and killed while trying to arrest a car thief Dec. 4, 2000.

"It's a matter of honor that we not forget the sacrifice of the living or the dead, and with the construction of the National Law Enforcement Museum we will forever be honoring all men and women who have taken the oath to protect and to serve," she said.

Her son was among numerous slain or wounded law enforcement officers remembered yesterday. Among them were J.D. Tippit, the Dallas police officer who was killed by Lee Harvey Oswald on Nov. 22, 1963, and Fairfax County's Vicky O. Armel and Michael E. Garbarino, who were fatally shot by a disturbed teenager last May.

Plans call for the 90,000-square-foot museum to be built mostly underground in the 400 block of E Street NW, across from the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial, according to the fund's chairman, Craig W. Floyd.

A sampling of museum artifacts on display yesterday included historic handcuffs and badges, some collectible crime cards, featuring the likes of Machine Gun Kelly and John Dillinger, and an original "Wanted" poster from the 1932 kidnapping of the son of famed aviator Charles Lindbergh.

Among other things, the museum will enable visitors to practice being a 911 operator, enter actual prison cells the museum hopes to acquire from New York's Sing Sing prison, and enter a hall of remembrance honoring the country's 17,500 fallen police officers.

Officials said the autopsy will feature a table bearing a manikin on which a simulated post mortem will be projected from overhead cameras. It won't be too graphic, exhibits designer Christopher Chadbourne said. But a sign will be posted outside to warn the squeamish.

CIVIL LAW:

Court Leery Of Suits By Taxpayers (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court justices appeared ready Wednesday to limit taxpayers' ability to challenge government funding of groups with religious affiliations.

Several justices were skeptical of a lower court decision allowing a Wisconsin group, the Freedom From Religion Foundation, to sue the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. The foundation says the White House office — created by President Bush to help religious groups compete with secular ones for federal social services grants — aims to support an unconstitutional government endorsement of religion.

Some justices, including Chief Justice John Roberts and Antonin Scalia, suggested that if the lower court's decision were affirmed, taxpayers would bring frivolous lawsuits challenging government spending that touches religion.

Roberts told Andrew Pincus, representing the Wisconsin group, "I don't understand, under your theory, why any taxpayer couldn't sue our marshal for … saying (as is customary at the start of a court session), 'God save the United States and this honorable court.' Her salary comes from Congress."

Taxpayers typically cannot sue over how the government spends money, based on the theory that the link between the expenditure and an individual taxpayer is remote. In a 1968 case, Flast v. Cohen, the court made an exception for lawsuits alleging a breach of the separation of church and state.

At issue now is the breadth of that exception. U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement, defending the administration, called it narrow and suggested at the close of his argument that the court abandon the exception. Twelve states have urged the court to bar all such lawsuits by taxpayers.

Wednesday's case does not involve a specific grant. It focuses on Bush's executive order that led to a series of regional conferences that promoted the administration's faith-based initiative. Freedom From Religion says the conferences boosted the funding prospects for religion-based groups over secular community-based organizations.

Clement said taxpayers may not challenge a program unless it is funded through a congressional appropriation and the expenditure itself led to a constitutional violation. The First Amendment says government "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

Pincus argued that it should not matter whether the funding comes through the legislative or executive branch. He said an expenditure may be challenged if it is "discrete and identifiable" and "arises with respect to religious activities."

Justice Anthony Kennedy said: "It seems to me unduly intrusive for the courts to tell the president that (he) cannot talk to specific groups … to make sure that all of their energies are used properly."

More sympathetic to the challengers, Justice Stephen Breyer said that "people become terribly upset when they see some other religion getting the money from the state."

Top Court To Rule On Aid For Religious Charities (FT)

By Patti Waldmeirin Washington

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

A case that could test whether the Bush administration has crossed the constitutional line between church and state by channelling federal aid to religious charities was brought before the US Supreme Court yesterday.

The case was brought by taxpayers looking for a way to challenge the White House's "faith-based initiative", which tries to increase the role of religious groups in fighting poverty, drug addiction and other social problems.

The Freedom from Religion Foundation, a group of atheists and agnostics, says they should be allowed to sue to prove that the White House violated the constitution by spending money on conferences designed to give religious organisations an inside track in obtaining federal grants.

The issue is whether the courthouse door should be open to any taxpayer who wants to challenge such spending on the basis that it violates the constitution, or whether only religious opponents who have been discriminated against directly should be allowed to sue.

A federal appeals court in Chicago sided with the atheist group but the US Justice Department says the ruling should be overturned on the grounds that it could lead to a flood of taxpayer lawsuits challenging all sorts of government spending.

Justice Antonin Scalia said that if the suit was allowed to proceed, taxpayers could challenge White House spending on security for President George W. Bush when he attended religious events, as he often does. Justice Anthony Kennedy said: "We'd be supervising the White House in . . . who it can talk to."

The case provoked angry exchanges between several justices and lawyers. Justice Stephen Breyer said: "There are strong feelings when government spends money on one religion and not another. We see that in the world today."

Mr Breyer appeared concerned that if taxpayers could not bring such suits, they could not rein in excessive government involvement with religion - even if government went so far as to build a network of state churches around the country to promote a particularreligion.

Sureme Court Takes Up Bush's 'faith-based Initiative' (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0138281

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a closely watched church-state separation case, a Bush administration lawyer urged the Supreme Court Wednesday to shield the president's "faith-based initiative" from legal challenges in court.

U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement said taxpayers who believe the White House is unconstitutionally promoting religion should not be accorded legal "standing" to sue in court. It would be too "intrusive on the executive branch" to permit lawsuits contesting how the president and his advisers conduct their affairs, he said.

The case involves a Wisconsin group called Freedom From Religion that sued in 2004 to challenge the "faith-based initiative" on First Amendment grounds. The group said the White House officials were using public money to help church-based groups win grants and contracts.

It is the first major religion case to come before the Supreme Court since President Bush's two appointees took their seats. In their questions Wednesday, both Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. sounded as though they sided with the administration.

Overall, the nine justices seemed split during the hour-long argument. If they adopt the administration's view, the ruling could make it harder for critics to sue officials who use public money in ways that support religion. If the justices rule in favor of Freedom From Religion, the group would still have to prove its case in court.

Roberts made clear he thought the group's claims should be thrown out of court. If taxpayers can sue the government whenever an official invokes God or religion, why couldn't anyone "sue our marshal for standing up and saying 'God save the United States and this is honorable court'?" asked Roberts, citing the invocation heard each day when the justices enter the court.

Justice Antonin Scalia appeared to agree. Otherwise, he said, taxpayers could sue the president for having spent tax money to promote religion simply because he flew across the country to give a speech to a religious group. "The whole trip is about religion," Scalia said, but "it really doesn't make any sense" to permit lawsuits challenging this spending.

Taking up the opposite view, Justice Stephen G. Breyer said courts and lawsuits are needed to enforce the separation of church and state. "People become terribly upset when they see some other religion getting the money from the state" to subsidize their faith, he said.

"We have a pretty clear, simple rule," he said, that allows lawsuits "when the government spends money in violation of the establishment clause." The First Amendment says "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

The issue of who has standing is technical, but crucial. It can determine when and whether the government's conduct can be challenged in court.

Normally, persons must say they have suffered a personal injury of some sort before they can sue in court. For example, taxpayers cannot sue to stop the war in Iraq simply because they disagree with it.

But nearly 40 years ago, the court under then-Chief Justice Earl Warren made an exception for challenges to government spending that promotes religion.

In Wednesday's argument, Clement urged the court to narrow that exception considerably. In one exchange, he said taxpayers should not be allowed to sue even if officials use tax money to build a church.

The Bush administration said Freedom From Religion's suit should be thrown out on the grounds that the challengers did not have standing to sue in court. However, the U.S. appeals court in Chicago allowed the suit to go forward. In a 2-1 ruling, Judge Richard Posner said plaintiffs sought to show the White House-sponsored meetings were "propaganda vehicles for religion."

But before it could be heard, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the administration's appeal filed on behalf of Jay Hein, who directs the White House Office of Faith-based and Community Initiatives.

Clement said the government should be shielded from suits over how officials use general tax money. He agreed taxpayers could sue if Congress passed a law that distributed money directly to churches or religious groups. But it is different matter if the White House uses general funds to encourage religious groups to do charitable work, he argued.

A coalition of liberal groups filed a friend-of-the-court brief that urged the court to reject the administration's argument.

DOJ_NMG_0138282

"Tax dollars may not be used to subsidize religious activity," said Steven Shapiro, the American Civil Liberties Union's legal director. "Barring taxpayers from enforcing this fundamental principle in court would effectively license the government to violate the Constitution."

The case will be decided in several months.

Court Spars Over Faith-Based Office (WSJ/AP)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A sharply divided U.S. Supreme Court on Wednesday sparred over the ability of an atheist organization to, as taxpayers, challenge the activities of President Bush's faith-based initiative office.

The high court appeared torn over whether its precedents allowed the court challenge, which alleges the White House initiative violates the freedom of religion Establishment Clause in the U.S. Constitution. A lower court allowed the lawsuit to proceed. But at the oral arguments, the federal government doggedly argued the group didn't satisfy the required test to sue as a taxpayer upset about how the government is spending money.

"The court of appeals decision below substantially expanded the scope of taxpayer standing," U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement said.

Washington, D.C. attorney Walter Pincus, representing the Wisconsin-based Freedom From Religion Foundation, accused the Bush administration of trying to improperly bar taxpaying citizens from suing over religious initiatives by the government. "We think there's no basis for drawing the arbitrary line suggested by the government."

As with many other social issues before the high court, the justices appeared to divide along conservative and liberal lines, with Justice Anthony Kennedy, a moderate conservative, controlling the outcome.

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. led the charge for finding in the government's favor, arguing that allowing the lawsuit could open the government up to a flurry of challenges whenever religion is raised, even trivially. He cited the Supreme Court marshal's opening statement -- "God save the United States and this honorable court" -- as a possible violation that could trigger a lawsuit under the legal standard proposed by Mr. Pincus. Justice Roberts also wondered whether the White House could spend money on security and food at a presidential speech before a religious prayer breakfast or other event.

Mr. Pincus said a taxpayer challenge for a constitutional Establishment Clause violation requires that the government action spend money specifically promoting a particular religion over another, as opposed to "incidental" spending. "The injury is the expenditure of funds that violates the Establishment Clause," Mr. Pincus said.

Justice Roberts wasn't convinced, however, and made it clear he thinks drawing the line at "incidental" costs is a problem. "That shows how totally manipulable your incidental test is," Justice Roberts told Mr. Pincus at one point.

Justice Kennedy was also troubled by the group's arguments, remarking at one point that "I'm not sure that this make sense."

Justice Stephen Breyer said he was searching for a standard that lets taxpayers, who provide the funds the government spends, have an appropriate check on the government's involvement in religious activities.

A wild card in the outcome could be Justice Antonin Scalia, who appeared troubled with Supreme Court precedents limiting when Establishment Clause suits could be brought and concerned with making it easy to challenge a variety of government activities.

President Bush created an office for religious-based community initiatives in 2001. The aim of the office is to make it easier for religious groups to win contracts and get federal funding for programs such as social-services aid.

Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc., an atheist and agnostics group from Madison, Wis., sued the government, alleging the program violates the freedom of religion Establishment Clause in the U.S. Constitution.

The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago in May 2006 ordered a federal trial court to reopen the lawsuit after a U.S. District Court judge had dismissed the group's claims.

The case is Hein v. Freedom From Religion.

Court Reinstates Conviction

DOJ_NMG_0138283

Also Wednesday, the high court unanimously reinstated a Nevada child molester's conviction in a decision that continued the justices' refusal to apply recent rulings on criminal procedure to older cases.

Marvin Bockting was convicted in 1988 on the strength of his stepdaughter's statements to police. But then-6-year-old Autumn Bockting did not testify at Mr. Bockting's trial so his lawyers never had the opportunity to question the child.

In 2004, the court ruled that defendants have a constitutional right to cross-examine witnesses against them. The question in this case was whether that rule would apply to older cases like Mr. Bockting's. Justice Samuel Alito, writing for the court, said it would not. The 2004 case "did not effect a change of this magnitude," Justice Alito said.

The Supreme Court has refused a dozen times over 17 years to apply new rules of criminal procedure to older cases.

Alone among federal appeals courts, however, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the rule should apply retroactively and overturned Mr. Bockting's conviction.

Nevada and the Bush administration urged the justices to conclude that the San Francisco-based court got it wrong. Among other things, they said courts would be burdened by defendants whose convictions depended on out-of-court statements that were not subject to cross-examination.

Franny Forsman, the federal public defender who represented Mr. Bockting, said the right to confront a witness was so important to the integrity of the trial that it deserved the same consideration as, say, the court's landmark ruling in the 1960s that guaranteed a lawyer to defendants in criminal trials.

The court, however, disagreed. Justice Alito said the decision on cross-examination "is much more limited in scope" than the court's ruling in Gideon v. Wainwright assuring representation for defendants.

Ms. Forsman had also discounted the argument that many convictions would be imperiled by a ruling favorable to her client.

The case is Whorton v. Bockting.

Justices Weigh Right To Sue Over Church-State Separation (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The Supreme Court, for the first time under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., confronted yesterday the devilishly complicated issue of church-state separation, and whether ordinary taxpayers have the right to sue over the Bush administration's embrace of faith-based organizations.

With Roberts and newest member Samuel A. Alito Jr. active in the discussion, the justices bombarded the lawyers before them with questions about what kinds of government action could warrant a taxpayer suit. A church built by the government? The number of times a president appears at prayer breakfasts?

Roberts even wondered whether opponents of the administration's initiatives would extend their concerns to the court itself, which opened yesterday's session, as it always does, with a marshal appealing for God to "save the United States and this honorable court."

Constitutional scholars and some justices say that the First Amendment's religion clauses present some of the most difficult questions to interpret. Justices must balance the establishment clause -- Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion-- with the free-exercise clause -- or prohibiting the free exercise thereof-- which immediately follows.

The case before the court involves a lawsuit that the Freedom From Religion Foundation, a Wisconsin-based group of agnostics and atheists, brought against the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. President Bush established the office in 2001 because, he said, he wanted to level the playing field between religious-based and secular groups vying for grants to provide social services. But the foundation said conferences held by the office favored the religious groups over the secular groups.

The question before the justices, though, is whether the complaints can even be brought to court.

The Supreme Court decided decades ago that taxpayers generally do not have the right, or "standing," to challenge government spending decisions simply because they do not agree with them. But it carved out an exception in 1968, in a case called Flast v. Cohen, for taxpayers to challenge congressional spending that violated the establishment clause.

DOJ_NMG_0138284

A lower court said the Freedom From Religion Foundation's suit did not meet the Flast test, because it involved the executive branch, not Congress's taxing and spending powers. But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit disagreed.

The court's 2 to 1 majority opinion said the suit should go forward because "there is so much that executive officials could do to promote religion in ways forbidden by the establishment clause."

Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, who represents the Bush administration, said in a brief asking the Supreme Court to review the case that that decision would "create a roving license for any one of the more than 180 million taxpayers in the United States to challenge any action of the executive branch that offends that individual's own view" of church-state separation.

Conservative groups and 12 states, including Virginia, that support the government would like to see the Flast exception overturned. And while Clement stopped just short of that, he told the court yesterday that the right to sue established in Flast was a very narrow one. Fielding hypotheticals from the justices, he found few instances in which he thought taxpayers would have a standing.

But with helpful commentary from Roberts, he said that citizens who believed that they had been specifically harmed -- for instance, members of one denomination who thought that the government was discriminating against them -- could have the right to sue.

"I think it's important to emphasize that if this Court recognizes that there is not taxpayer standing, that does not mean that there won't be lawsuits, that there won't be directly injured plaintiffs that can bring claims," Clement said.

Alito, Justice Antonin Scalia and Roberts -- whom Clements three times said was "exactly right" in his view of the case -- seemed most sympathetic to the government's argument, and Justice Anthony M. Kennedy worried about the courts "supervising the White House." Justice Clarence Thomas did not ask questions, but has written in the past that he does not think that the establishment clause gives rise to individual complaints.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer seemed most skeptical of the government's position that only congressional action involving taxing and spending was open to taxpayer challenge. "What's wrong with just saying that Flast stands for the proposition that when the government spends money in violation of the establishment clause, a taxpayer -- after all, the money comes from the taxpayer -- can bring a lawsuit?" he asked.

The foundation's lawyer, Andrew Pincus, agreed. "There's no basis in history . . . for the government's claim that executive branch decisions are somehow different and insulated with respect to spending," he said.

Court Hears Arguments Linking Right To Sue And Spending On Religion (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — The question for the Supreme Court on Wednesday was a jurisdictional one: whether taxpayers who object to the way the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives spends its money can get into federal court to make their case.

Whether the office or its programs actually run afoul of the Constitution was not before the justices.

But any notion that this jurisdictional question was the sort of arcane, technical issue that only a law professor could love was quickly dispelled by the intensity of the argument, one of the liveliest of the term.

The fast-paced hour ended with the clear impression that the Roberts court will soon put its own stamp on the law of taxpayer standing, with potentially significant implications for the relationship between government and religion.

The real question by the end of the argument was whether a majority would be content simply to scale back a Warren court precedent that allows taxpayers to challenge the use of public money for religious purposes or whether the court would disavow the precedent altogether and keep such suits out of federal court.

Solicitor General Paul D. Clement revealed his hand slowly, bringing his argument to a pinpoint landing at the precise close of a three-minute rebuttal. If the justices could not see their way to applying the precedent narrowly, Mr. Clement said, the court should simply overrule it. “If something has to go in this area,” he said, “I think it’s an easy choice.”

Under either option the administration advocated, the court would reject a suit that the federal appeals court in Chicago reinstated last year, a challenge to conferences that Bush administration officials have held to advise religious groups on how to apply for federal grants as part of the effort to bolster the role of such groups in social service programs.

The plaintiff is the Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc. of Madison, Wis., which advocates strict separation of church and state. In a complaint filed initially in 2004, the organization argued that officials who convened and addressed the conferences used congressionally appropriated money in a way that "violated the fundamental principle of the separation of church and state."

Under the ordinary doctrine of "standing," which defines who may bring a suit, people who object to a government policy but who cannot claim a concrete injury from that policy have no right to sue. But in a 1968 decision, the court carved out an exception for religion cases. The case, Flast v. Cohen, gave taxpayers standing to challenge federal laws that authorized expenditures for purposes alleged to violate the First Amendment prohibition against the "establishment" of religion.

The administration position in the case argued on Wednesday, Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc., No. 06-157, is that the Flast decision should be understood to include two limitations. First, Mr. Clement said, taxpayers should be limited to challenging Congressional statutes, not executive branch programs like that in this suit. Second, the solicitor general argued, taxpayers should be able to challenge only spending outside the government, not internal spending like that cited by the Freedom From Religion Foundation.

Did that mean, Justice Antonin Scalia asked Mr. Clement, taxpayers could challenge a statute that gave money to outside groups to build churches, but not one that directed the government to build its own church?

It was a "horrible hypothetical," Mr. Clement replied, but Justice Scalia had understood him correctly: taxpayers should not have standing to challenge "an internal government church."

Andrew J. Pincus, representing the foundation, told the court there was "no basis for drawing the arbitrary lines that the government suggests." The Flast decision did not include such limitations, he said.

Mr. Clement was unruffled as the justices tossed various hypothetical questions his way. Could a taxpayer challenge a law that commemorated the Pilgrims "by building a government church at Plymouth Rock where we will have the regular worship in the Puritan religion?" Justice Stephen G. Breyer asked.

"I would say no," Mr. Clement said.

Justice Breyer persisted, asking about a law requiring the government to build churches "all over America" dedicated to one particular sect. "Nobody could challenge it?" he asked.

"There would not be taxpayer standing," Mr. Clement replied.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. observed that members of other denominations would not need taxpayer standing and that as victims of government discrimination, they could sue under ordinary principles of standing. This was one of the times the chief justice intervened to make the point that in practical application the government's position was perhaps not as extreme as it sounded.

His interventions in the other side's argument seemed to have the opposite goal, rejecting Mr. Pincus's effort to depict his client's position as modest. When Mr. Pincus said taxpayers should not be permitted to challenge merely "incidental" spending, the chief justice said that was no real limitation because it would ensnare the courts in deciding "whether the activity you're challenging is incidental or not."

Mr. Pincus denied that this initial inquiry would make much work for the courts. For example, he began, "if someone's claim is that people in the White House have five meetings in the course of a year that they're upset about — — "

Chief Justice Roberts cut him off, saying, "Well, then, five meetings isn't enough. How many?"

"What about 10?" Justice Scalia offered.

"Twenty?" the chief justice asked.

"We'll litigate it," Justice Scalia said. "We'll figure out a number eventually, I'm sure."

For Mr. Clement, the most helpful hand was that of Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. As the solicitor general batted back tricky hypothetical questions, Justice Alito asked him whether the lines he was drawing "make a lot of sense in an abstract sense" or were "the best that can be done" under existing precedents.

DOJ_NMG_0138286

"The latter, Justice Alito," Mr. Clement said, evoking laughter. "I appreciate the question."

High Court Mulls Faith-based Initatives (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 1, 2007

The Supreme Court wrestled Wednesday with the question of whether taxpayers have the right to challenge the White House's aggressive promotion of federal financial aid for religious charities.

At issue is whether a Wisconsin-based group of atheists and agnostics have legal standing, by virtue of being taxpayers, to bring their complaint in the federal court system.

Taking one extreme, Justice Stephen Breyer asked a lawyer for the White House whether a taxpayer would be able to challenge a law in which Congress sets up a church at Plymouth Rock.

"I would say no," responded Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, but he added that such a church could be challenged in other ways — just not on the basis that a taxpayer has been injured. Clement is representing the Bush administration, which is trying to prevent the taxpayer suit over its aggressive promotion, through the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, of federal financial aid for religious charities.

Taking the opposite extreme, Justice Antonin Scalia asked a lawyer for the Wisconsin group, Andrew Pincus, whether taxpayers would be able to sue over the use of security money for a presidential trip where religion is discussed.

Pincus said that taxpayers would not have standing to do so, arguing that in such a case the money spent would be "incidental," and not central to the issue.

The case may turn on a 1968 Supreme Court decision that created an exception to the general prohibition on taxpayer challenges to the government spending of tax revenue. In an 8-1 decision by Chief Justice Earl Warren, the court allowed taxpayers to challenge congressional spending for private religious schools.

But the Bush administration says spending for speeches and meetings of executive branch officials does not involve spending federal money outside the government and therefore taxpayers are not entitled to challenge it.

In the current case, the Bush administration organizes conferences where faith-based organizations are allegedly singled out as being particularly worthy of receiving federal money.

The group challenging the Bush administration, called the Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc., characterizes the White House's initiative as a singling out of faith-based organizations to the exclusion of other organizations.

Last year, a federal appeals court allowed the group to pursue its lawsuit. Instead of going through Congress, President Bush issued executive orders to create the White House office and similar centers in 10 federal agencies during his first term.

One of the goals Bush set for these offices was to help religious and community groups compete for federal funding to fight poverty, substance abuse and other social problems.

The 7th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in Chicago sided with the anti-religion group, and the Justice Department wants the Supreme Court to overturn the lower court.

The case is Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc., 06-157.

High Court Debates Suit Against White House's Faith-Based Initiative (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 1, 2007

Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer looked skyward Wednesday as he tried to come up with a "more amazing" hypothetical during arguments in a key church-state case. With or without divine intervention, he found one: Could the federal government fund churches and ministers of a single religion nationwide "dedicated to the proposition that this particular sect is the true sect," without fear of taxpayer lawsuits against it?

"Horrible hypothetical," growled Solicitor General Paul Clement, but he went on to say yes. "The bottom line is that there would not be taxpayer standing." With a helpful suggestion from Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., Clement qualified his point by asserting that adherents of other religions could file suit against such a program on the basis that they were being discriminated against. But Clement held firm on the point that taxpayers, merely as taxpayers, could not challenge a network of government-funded churches.

That exchange may prove crucial in determining the outcome of the case before the Court, Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation. The Wisconsin-based foundation filed a taxpayer lawsuit against the Bush administration's funding of faith-based initiatives, claiming that conferences sponsored under the funding program favor religious groups. The government defended the program, claiming the plaintiffs did not have standing, but the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the foundation could continue with its suit.

The case is an important test not only for the faith-based initiative but also for a 39-year-old precedent that has treated First Amendment establishment-clause cases differently when it comes to standing.

In other contexts, taxpayers can't challenge government programs in court solely on the grounds that their tax dollars are being misused. To prevent trivial lawsuits, the high court has required plaintiffs to show a more direct injury or a bigger stake, such as a violation of rights or a denial of benefits.

But in the 1968 case of Flast v. Cohen, the Court made an exception. It ruled that taxpayer status alone was enough to achieve standing when the claim is that a congressional expenditure violates the First Amendment's bar against establishment of religion. In making the exception, the Flast Court hearkened back to the framers' reason for creating the Establishment Clause in the first place: to prevent government from taxing and spending to favor one religion over another, even if only "three pence" of the taxpayer's money is used for that purpose, in the words of James Madison.

Madison's formulation was invoked often on Wednesday -- Justice David Souter quaintly pronounced it "thruppence" -- as the justices struggled to figure out how and whether to honor that Madisonian goal.

Clement argued that the Flast exception allows taxpayer standing only to those challenging congressional spending that benefits an outside party or church -- not in cases like the faith-based initiatives, in which the executive branch, acting on its own, has done something that the taxpayer dislikes. Broadening the exception to cover executive-branch activities, Clement said, would threaten the separation of powers and invite lawsuits every time a government official makes a religious reference.

Several justices seemed to think that was an artificial distinction and taxpayers might have standing whether a congressional or executive-branch activity is involved. Clement struggled to define the difference, and when Breyer pinned him down with his hypothetical, it appeared that Clement may have taken his point too far by suggesting that taxpayers could not challenge even such an overtly religious program.

But both Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito Jr. threw Clement lifelines. At one point, as justices tried to follow Clement's answers, Alito pointedly asked him, "Are you arguing that these lines that you are drawing make a lot of sense ... or are you just arguing that this is the best that can be done ... within the body of precedent that the Court has handed down in this area?"

Clement replied, "The latter, Justice Alito. And I appreciate the question."

Amid laughter, Scalia said, "I've been trying to make sense out of what you're saying." Clement shot back, "And I've been trying to make sense out of this Court's precedents." At which point Stevens chimed in, "Do we think we have a duty to follow precedents that don't make any sense?"

But as much as the justices seemed troubled with Clement's position, they also seemed troubled about siding with the foundation.

Washington, D.C., lawyer Andrew Pincus, representing the foundation, said Clement had drawn "arbitrary lines" that did not conform to Court precedent or to the First Amendment's history. Pincus is a partner at Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw.

Roberts, nodding toward the Court's marshal, Pamela Talkin, asked whether, under the foundation's theory, a taxpayer could sue her for saying "God save this honorable Court" at the start of Court sessions.

Scalia offered another hypothetical, asking whether taxpayers could sue when Air Force One and Secret Service agents are used in the course of a presidential trip to a religious event.

Pincus said taxpayer standing would not extend to religious activities that are "incidental" to government expenditures, and he served up his own hypothetical: government funds "paying for bagels at a prayer breakfast" would not, he suggested, trigger a valid lawsuit. Scalia later skewered that hypothetical, arguing that if the bagels went only to prayer breakfasts for evangelical groups, someone who is Jewish might feel that is not incidental or trivial at all: "You know, what could be worse than not buying bagels for a Jewish prayer breakfast?"

High Court Takes On Faith-based Initiatives (MJS)

By Katherine M. Skiba

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 1, 2007

Wisconsin woman leads charge against Bush programs

Washington - Anne Gaylor, Wisconsin's best-known atheist, has fought to keep church and state separate for almost 30 years. But the 80-year-old Gaylor marked a first Wednesday when a lawsuit she brought was heard by the United States Supreme Court.

Attorneys said the case, the subject of hourlong arguments Wednesday, is the first challenge to the Bush administration's faith-based initiatives to reach the high court.

The separation-of-church-and-state case, also the first of its type to be heard under Chief Justice John Roberts, hinges on a narrow but key legal question: Can the average taxpayer allege violations of the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, which states: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion . . . "

Gaylor, who lives in Madison, was on hand with other officials of the Freedom from Religion Foundation, which she founded in 1978. The dispute arose when Gaylor and her foundation filed suit against the Bush program in federal court in Wisconsin in 2004.

A judge tossed out the case, saying the plaintiffs lacked standing, which is a legal concept establishing whether someone has the right to appear in court to pursue his or her claims. The judge said the case failed a test established by the Supreme Court in that the plaintiffs' case involved the executive branch, not Congress' taxing and spending powers.

The Chicago-based 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed with the lower court. Its 2-1 majority said the foundation's suit should go forward because "there is so much that executive officials could do to promote religion in ways forbidden by the establishment clause."

That prompted the director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives to ask the Supreme Court to weigh in. Created in 2001

It was 2001, early in his presidency, that Bush used an executive order to create the faith-based initiatives office. It helps fund religious and community groups so they may fight crime, addiction, poverty and other social woes. The money is for social programs - not for proselytizing or purely religious activities. Under Bush, similar initiatives have been launched in a host of federal agencies, such as the Department of Health and Human Services.

Gaylor and her side said conferences put on under the banner of faith-based initiatives favored religious groups over secular organizations.

Two others from Wisconsin have high-profile roles in the litigation.

Jay F. Hein of Shawano has directed the White House's faith-based initiatives office since August. He, too, was in court, but let the Justice Department do the talking.

Doing that was Paul D. Clement, the U.S. solicitor general, who grew up in Cedarburg.

Clement told the nine justices on Wednesday that it was important to emphasize that if the high court found that Gaylor and her group did not have legal standing, that won't rule out lawsuits brought by "directly injured plaintiffs."

Washington lawyer Andrew Pincus, who is representing Gaylor and her group on a pro bono basis, drew a question from the chief justice. Roberts asked whether, under Pincus' theory, a taxpayer might be able to sue the high court's marshal for the words used to open sessions of the court: "God save the United States and this honorable court."

Pincus disagreed, saying legal precedents require a taxpayer to identify discrete, identifiable and non-incidental expenditures.

Roberts and several of the justices peppered counsel with questions, seemingly split on the issue.

Observers say the case could have tremendous significance since it might limit the number of establishment clause challenges from taxpayers, even before the court considers the underlying issue: Do Bush's faith-based initiatives violate the Constitution?

The case is expected to be decided before the court begins its summer recess, expected in June. Women's rights was start Gaylor is president emeritus of her foundation, led by her daughter, Annie Laurie Gaylor, 51, and her husband, Dan Barker, 57, both of Madison. They, too, were on hand.

The daughter put the foundation's membership at 9,000 and called the members a mix of "atheists, agnostics, rationalists, skeptics and free-thinkers."

The elder Gaylor said her fight to keep religion out of the public square flowed from earlier battles for women's rights and abortion rights. She said the realized in those campaigns, "the enemy was the same: organized religion, specifically the Catholic religion and fundamentalist sects."

"You really couldn't grow up in Wisconsin without feeling the heavy hand of religion," said Gaylor, who grew up in Tomah and graduated with an English degree from the University of Wisconsin in 1949.

This longtime crusader has had deaths threats because of her beliefs; once she was attacked on the set of a TV program in Philadelphia by a woman who said she "was going to drive the devil" out of her.

She won't venture a guess how the case will be decided, but is hopeful.

"I don't see how there should be any doubt: We are talking about the expenditure of billions of dollars, taxpayer money. Billions." Key points

• President Bush's faith-based initiatives give money to religious and community groups so they may fight crime, addiction, poverty and other social woes.

• The issue: It's a narrow one - Can the average taxpayer allege violations of the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, which states: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion . . . "

• This is the first case involving separation of church and state to be heard under Chief Justice John Roberts (above).

War On Warming Begins At (Al Gore's) Home (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Fresh off his victory lap at the Academy Awards, former vice president Al Gore -- who has not closed the door on a 2008 bid -- found himself in a more familiar position: on the receiving end of a political attack.

The barb came via the Tennessee Center for Policy Research, a Nashville-based think tank that advocates "limited government through policy solutions," according to its Web site.

"As the spokesman of choice for the global warming movement, Al Gore has to be willing to walk the walk, not just talk the talk, when it comes to home energy use," said the group's president, Drew Johnson, in a release alleging that Gore's house in the Volunteer State uses 20 times as much electricity as the average household nationwide.

Kalee Kreider, a spokeswoman for Gore, called the statement misleading.

"The power coming into their residence is green, renewable power," she said, explaining that the Gores participate in a program called Green Power Switch, which is run through the public Tennessee Valley Authority. Green Power Switch supplies energy from renewable sources to its members.

Kreider added that a renovation of the Gores' house is underway to make it more energy efficient, an update that will include the addition of solar panels.

Johnson was unimpressed. "The energy he receives into his house is no different than what I receive into my house," he said. "He doesn't have a green power line hooked to his house."FEC Fines Anti-Kerry 527 Group

The Federal Election Commission levied one of its largest fines ever yesterday against the Progress for America Voter Fund, a conservative group that raised $44 million to help undermine Democrat John Kerry's 2004 presidential bid.

DOJ_NMG_0138290

The fine was the latest in a series of FEC penalties imposed on high-profile independent groups that operated on both sides of the 2004 presidential elections. The FEC is trying to send a message to the "527" organizations, FEC Chairman Robert Lenhard said in a statement.

"It should now be clear to organizations that want to be active in the 2008 cycle that the activities we saw in this case are prohibited under the law," Lenhard said.

Progress for America agreed to pay the $750,000 fine as part of the deal, which did not require the group to admit wrongdoing. The group took issue with the penalty, arguing that the FEC had not clarified how the newly enacted McCain-Feingold provisions would affect 527s and had not explained what campaign-related activities 527s were allowed to perform.

FEC commissioners have said the penalties should serve as guidelines for what will and will not be permitted. In the case of Progress for America, the FEC noted that the group made clear "through its public statements, activities, and solicitations for contributions" that it should have registered as a traditional political committee.Daley Cruises to Sixth Term

Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley (D) crushed two little-known opponents Tuesday to win a sixth term in his post, putting him on the verge of a historic achievement.

Daley received roughly 71 percent of the vote. Cook County Circuit Court Clerk Dorothy Brown (20 percent) and activist William "Dock" Walls III (9 percent) split the remaining votes.

With the win, Daley is positioned to break his father's record for consecutive years of service as mayor. Richard J. Daley held the post from 1955 until his death in 1976. Richard M. Daley was first elected in 1989.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Plans To Revisit Orangeburg Massacre (TSSC)

By Rick Brundrett

The State, March 1, 2007

The FBI might reopen an investigation into the 1968 slayings by police of three black students at S.C. State College — known as the Orangeburg Massacre — and two other civil rights-era deaths in South Carolina.

The S.C. cases are among about 100 death cases nationwide the FBI said it will re-examine in partnership with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, National Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller on Tuesday announced the “Civil Rights-Era Cold Case Initiative” with leaders of the civil rights organizations.

Cleveland Sellers, who was among 30 people shot during the Feb. 8, 1968, incident at the S.C. State College campus, said Wednesday an investigation of the Orangeburg case is “certainly overdue.”

“The Orangeburg Massacre is, in fact, a litmus test for racial relations in South Carolina,” said Sellers, 63, now head of the African-American studies department at the University of South Carolina. “I want the incident to be thoroughly investigated and the truth to come out.”

Lonnie Randolph, president of the state NAACP conference, said his organization recommended the Orangeburg case to the FBI after polling member branches statewide.

“Our goal always is for justice to prevail, “ he said. “To kill three people — it’s hard to think justice has been served when individuals are shot in the back.”

Former Gov. Robert McNair, who has been criticized by black leaders for his handling of the incident, said Wednesday in a prepared statement that any decision by the FBI and U.S. Department of Justice to reopen their investigation is “certainly up to them.”

“Immediately after the tragedy at Orangeburg, we requested that the FBI and Department of Justice conduct a full and comprehensive investigation of all of the events surrounding this incident since we felt very strongly that the state of South Carolina could not investigate itself,” said McNair.

McNair, in a biography released last year, said he accepts responsibility for the tragedy — his strongest statement to date about the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0138291

The initial FBI probe led to federal charges against eight state troopers and another police officer. They were acquitted later by a mostly white jury.

Besides that incident, the FBI said this week it also will re-examine the death of a 13-year-old Edisto Island boy whose body washed ashore in Charleston County in 1960, and the 1965 shooting death of a man in an area of Allendale County where civil rights demonstrations were held. Both victims were black.

Most of the cases referred to the FBI are from the South. Georgia, for example, has 13 cases, and North Carolina, three.

Thom O'Neill, spokesman at the FBI office in Columbia, said Wednesday the decision whether to formally reopen any of the three S.C. cases will be made by Brian Lamkin, special agent in charge of the FBI's S.C. operations. No deadlines have been set to complete investigations, he said.

O'Neill acknowledged the cases could be difficult to investigate, depending, for example on what records exist and how easy it will be to track down witnesses. The Orangeburg case could raise constitutional questions because the charged officers were acquitted.

"That one's a little sticky," O'Neill said.

Sellers, then a young civil rights activist who was the only person sent to prison in the incident, said he's not interested in seeing new charges brought against officers involved in the shooting. Sellers was convicted of inciting a riot and served seven months in prison but received a full pardon from the state in 1993.

Instead, Sellers said, he wants state lawmakers to create a special commission to investigate the case. Previous bills aimed at doing that have died in the Legislature.

"I am hopeful that the state, through the Legislature, will step forward and raise the veil of secrecy and silence," said Sellers, whose son, Bakari Sellers, D-Bamberg, was elected to the S.C. House in November. "They (authorities) have created culprits and placed the blame for what happened on innocent victim-citizens."

Like Sellers, U.S. Rep. Jim Clyburn, D-S.C., who graduated from S.C. State in 1961, experienced firsthand what it was like to be a civil rights protester in those days.

"There was a tension hanging all over Orangeburg that went back to the 1950s," Clyburn said Wednesday. "We were protesting policies, procedures and laws that were unjust."

In 1960, Clyburn was charged with breach of the peace during a demonstration in Columbia. His conviction later was overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Louisiana Victims Helped Move FBI To Reopen Cold Cases (SHREVET)

Shreveport Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Nine Louisianans are included in a list of 76 suspicious or criminal deaths in the 1950s and 1960s that spurred the FBI to reopen investigations into possible civil rights abuses from that turbulent time.

Bureau officials on Tuesday announced the investigations amid a Justice Department focus on cracking unsolved cases from the nation's civil rights era.

The high-priority cases, which FBI Director Robert S. Mueller described as numbering between 10 and 12, are among an estimated 100 that investigators nationwide are looking at as possible civil rights-related murders.

None of the nine Louisiana cases in the list maintained by the Alabama-based Southern Poverty Law Center occurred in the immediate Northwest Louisiana area. But several did take place in Ruston and Monroe, including one 1960 shooting rampage where four people were killed.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged that many of the cases may be beyond the boundaries of what the federal government can legally prosecute. But they "remain on our radar," he said.

"Much time has passed on these crimes," Gonzales told reporters in Washington. "The wounds they left are deep, and still many of them have not healed. But we are committed to re-examining these cases and doing all we can to bring justice to the criminals who may have avoided punishment for so long."

Addressing civil rights violators, Gonzales said: "You have not gotten away with anything — we are still on your trail."

DOJ_NMG_0138292

Officials declined to release details about which cases have been reopened, or where, but said that nearly all are located in 14 states in the South. Investigators later confirmed, for example, that the unsolved 1946 lynching of four sharecroppers on Moore's Ford Bridge near Monroe, Ga., was among those being investigated.

But they declined to comment on whether another high-profile case was being included — that of Maceo Snipes, a black World War II veteran who in 1946 was shot in the back by four white men a day after he voted for the first time. No one was ever arrested in that killing in rural Georgia, about 90 miles south of Atlanta, and there is no evidence a criminal probe in the case was ever opened.

Richard Cohen, president of the Southern Poverty Law Center, said the government's renewed focus on the cold cases could help uncover what he called "a few burning embers.

"There are a lot of stones to turn over," Cohen said. "I think it would be wrong to give families false hope, but I think it would be right to say that people still care."

Mueller said the FBI began re-examining its old case files more than a year ago amid a spate of civil rights cases that investigators and prosecutors successfully solved.

Most recently, the Justice Department brought kidnapping and conspiracy charges last month against James Ford Seale, 71, in the 1964 abductions and murders of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee in southwest Mississippi. Seale has pleaded not guilty and is due for trial in April.

Horace Harned, 86, a former Mississippi legislator and member of the segregationist Sovereignty Commission, said he'd prefer that authorities leave the past in the past and not reopen the cases, but "I don't think there's anything we can do to stop it.

"I think we shouldn't dig up too much of these things," Harned said.

He added: "We'll have to let justice prevail. I believe in the jury system. As long as the jury system is maintained properly, we should go to it and let justice prevail."

Editorial: Till Case: Time Takes Its Toll On 1955 Case (JCL)

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, March 1, 2007

The LeFlore County grand jury has decided not to issue any indictments in the 1955 slaying of Emmett Till. That may be disappointing to those who have worked to bring justice in this case. But the grand jury did its job. The tragedy is that it took so long for the case to be fully considered.

District Attorney Joyce Chiles of Greenville should be commended for reviewing the 8,000 pages of evidence and presenting it. Only time seems to have killed chances for prosecution, not lack of diligence today.

The Aug. 28, 1955, slaying of Till remains a pivotal moment in the civil rights movement. Till was killed after he reportedly whistled at a white woman, Carolyn Bryant, the last known living suspect. Her then-husband, Roy, and his half-brother, J.W. Milam, admitted they killed Till after an all-white jury had acquitted them. Both have since died.

But the case is also noteworthy, since it:

Is one of 29 killings from the civil rights era since 1989 reopened, leading to 28 arrests and 22 convictions;

Should spur a "cold case" unit of the Justice Department to investigate unsolved civil rights killings in a bill before Congress.

Justice can come still.

City, Justice Dept. Meet With NAACP (CTPOST)

By Melvin Mason

Connecticut Post, March 1, 2007

ANSONIA — For the second time in as many months, city officials and officers with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People met with staff from the U.S. Depa

DOJ_NMG_0138293

As was the case after a similar January meeting, attendees were vague about what was discussed with officials from the Department of Justice's Community Relations Service, designed for resolving conflicts dealing with race, color and national origin.

The two-hour meeting, held in the Erlingheuser Room at City Hall, was closed to the public and the media.

Attending Wednesday's session were Mayor Jim Della Volpe, Police Chief Kevin Hale, Corporation Counsel Kevin Blake, local NAACP President Greg Johnson, Housing Authority Executive Director Jim Finnucan, former alderwoman Ralphine Ford and Riverside Apartments tenant leader Naomi Wallace. Johnson did not elaborate on concerns brought up at the meeting; he only said that he thought the meeting offered plenty of positives.

"It was to discuss strategies and ways to improve the quality of life for all citizens of Ansonia," Johnson said. "It was a very productive meeting."

He said "a gamut of things" was discussed.

Della Volpe was brief in his post-meeting comments, saying the group "had a very good discussion and a healthy discussion of the issues."

Francesco Amoroso, the regional director of the Community Relations Service, offered no comment, saying agency officials are not permitted to comment when called in to mediate.

Johnson said the group will meet again, but he did not say when.

Tenants at Riverside Apartments on Olson Drive have voiced concerns about their housing complex.

The city housing authority is in the middle of an 18-month plan to clear out three buildings slated for demolition, moving Riverside residents to other apartments in the complex or providing them with Section 8 vouchers to live elsewhere.

The authority has hired Mapplan Associates to create a possible new development on the Riverside site.

Housing authority officials say the existing Riverside complex is too expensive to maintain because it receives less money from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Some residents and local groups have criticized the demolition project, saying it is taking affordable housing away from people who need it.

High Court Case Tests Limits Of Student Speech Rights (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 1, 2007

When the Olympic torch passed through Juneau, Alaska, in 2002, high school senior Joseph Frederick thought it would be fun to get on TV. As the torch relay passed by his school, Frederick led his friends in unfurling a banner that read, "Bong Hits 4 Jesus."

It was, Frederick said later, an attempt to get attention with a nonsensical message.

Deborah Morse, the principal at Juneau-Douglas High School, saw something more. She tore down the banner and suspended Frederick for 10 days, saying that because "bong" was a reference to marijuana, the sign violated the school's anti-drug policy.

Five years later, the spat in Juneau has become a significant legal test of students' speech rights — and of how far school officials can go in limiting such rights to try to maintain order in schools. On March 19, when the U.S. Supreme Court hears arguments in Morse v. Frederick, school officials nationwide will be watching for signs of whether the justices will make it more difficult to enforce a range of campus speech regulations that have been imposed in recent years.

Such policies — many inspired by the slayings of a dozen students and a teacher by two outcasts at Colorado's Columbine High School in 1999 — have banned students from wearing clothing or posting signs that focus on drugs, guns or incendiary topics such as homosexuality, abortion and religion.

The Juneau case will be the first major dispute over student speech rights to come before the high court in nearly two decades. It requires the justices to revisit a landmark ruling from 1969, when the court decided a dispute involving three Iowa students who wore black armbands to school to protest the Vietnam War. They were suspended and went to court, saying their First Amendment speech rights had been violated.

The Supreme Court ruled for the teenagers, saying, "It can hardly be argued that either students or teachers shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate."

Since then, that view has been somewhat diluted by rulings that have allowed schools to ban "plainly offensive" speech of a sexual nature, and to have wide latitude over control of school-sponsored speech, such as articles in school newspapers. However, lower courts have not been consistent in determining what kind of messages are "plainly offensive" and what types of student speech can be punished.

The court's ruling in the current case, like the decisions in the earlier disputes, would not be likely to affect the rights of college students. In middle and high schools, where nearly all of the students are minors and administrators adopt a parent-like role, administrators have a stronger legal hand to maintain discipline and set rules for student speech.

In a court brief filed in support of Morse and the Juneau school board, attorneys for the National School Boards Association say that as schools grapple with increased violence and drug use, it's important for administrators to be able to regulate slogans dealing with particularly controversial issues.

"We are counting on this case to give us clarity," says Peggy Cowan, superintendent of the Juneau school district. "It was important (for Morse) to take the sign down. Leaving it up would have communicated that it was OK to promote the use of illegal drugs."

Frederick, who is traveling abroad, says through his attorney that school limits on student speech have gotten out of hand. Now 23, he says that "schools use 'zero tolerance' policies to cloak their abuse of authority and disregard for student rights."

Morse v. Frederick also is drawing attention from school officials because it raises another provocative question: whether a principal can be held personally liable for infringing on student speech rights.

Morse is appealing a federal appeals court's ruling that she is liable for money damages to Frederick because past rulings "clearly established" that she was not entitled to tear down the "Bong Hits" sign.

Principals should be shielded from such financial responsibility, Morse's attorney, Kenneth Starr, argues in court papers. Starr — known to many Americans as the independent prosecutor whose investigation led to the impeachment of President Clinton — calls the appeals court's decision "deeply alarming to school administrators across the country."

Students score court victories

David Hudson, a lawyer at the First Amendment Center at Vanderbilt University in Nashville, says the legal landscape for student speech has changed significantly since the armband case in 1969.

He says some judges have been particularly influenced by Columbine and have cited it "explicitly in their opinions" supporting school officials, while others have more broadly interpreted student rights under the 1969 ruling.

In recent years, students who claimed their speech rights were violated by school policies have won some court decisions. Among them:

•In Vermont, middle school student Zachary Guiles was suspended in 2003 for wearing a T-shirt to school that derided President Bush as the "Chicken-Hawk-In-Chief." Guiles, now a junior at the Interlochen arts boarding school in Michigan, says he wore the shirt to school because he wanted his classmates to question the Iraq war.

After he was suspended, Guiles — with help from the Vermont chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union — took the school system to court. A trial court agreed with school officials, saying the T-shirt — which portrayed Bush as a chicken with a martini in one wing and a cocaine straw in the other — was "plainly offensive" under the Supreme Court's standards.

Guiles took the case to an appeals court, which said that "without question," the shirt "uses harsh rhetoric and imagery to express disagreement with the president's policies and to impugn his character." However, the appeals court said, "because Guiles' T-shirt did not cause any disruption, censorship was unwarranted."

Guiles says that when he wore the shirt, "there wasn't much of a backlash at the school. The kids weren't really pro-Bush as much as they were apathetic."

DOJ_NMG_0138295

•In 2002, Alan Newsom, a 12-year-old middle school student in Albemarle County, Va., was reprimanded by a vice principal after wearing a National Rifle Association T-shirt that depicted three silhouettes of men with firearms. Newsom had attended an NRA camp to improve his shooting skills, says his father, Fred Newsom.

After being confronted by the vice principal, Alan turned the shirt inside out. Later, with the help of NRA lawyers, Newsom and his family successfully sued to change the school's dress code, which had prohibited "messages on clothing, jewelry and personal belongings that relate to … weapons."

Newsom claimed the policy was discriminatory and violated his First Amendment rights. The case was dismissed by a trial court, but a U.S. appeals court sided with Newsom, saying the policy was too vaguely worded and could include clothing with slogans that were not disruptive in schools.

Going to court "was a difficult thing for the family," Fred Newsom says. "But if you can't stand up for the Constitution, what can you stand up for?"

When the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ruled in favor of Frederick last year in the Juneau case, it cited the Newsom decision, among others. It said that "our sister circuits have similarly held that student speech that is neither plainly offensive nor school-sponsored can be prohibited only where the school district demonstrated a risk of substantial disruption."

Frederick says the words on his "Bong Hits" sign were merely nonsense, meant to attract TV cameras. In siding with him, the appeals court said that even if the message was pro-drugs, officials should not have censored such "non-disruptive" speech.

A complicating factor in the case — one that has made judges sympathetic to Frederick's case to this point — is that the incident occurred across the street from Juneau-Douglas High School, rather than on its grounds.

School officials say that shouldn't matter because the torch parade, a prelude to the Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, was co-sponsored by the school. They note that the school's pep band played as the torch passed, its cheerleaders were in uniform to cheer the parade, and teachers supervised the event.

Morse says in court papers that if she had not taken down the banner, it would have amounted to the school district approving of its message. That, she says, would have been "inconsistent with the district's responsibility to teach students the boundaries of socially appropriate behavior."

Questions of defiance

Frederick says his actions were about free speech. "I was just trying to assert my right," he says through his attorney, Douglas Mertz. Mertz says that in an earlier incident at the school, an assistant principal threatened to suspend Frederick because he did not stand during the Pledge of Allegiance.

Superintendent Cowan says the school has no record of such an incident. Starr's brief on behalf of the school system says that a school official had observed that Frederick had "a history of defiant behavior."

In his court filing, Mertz tells the justices, "There is no dispute that schools have an important message to deliver regarding the perils of drug abuse. But the First Amendment recognizes a critical distinction between delivering that message to students and imposing an enforced orthodoxy that tramples on free speech."

Mertz says that in displaying the sign, Frederick was not trying to promote illegal behavior. The attorney also notes that in Alaska and elsewhere, marijuana laws have been a subject of political debate.

Starr counters that the appeals court that ruled in Frederick's favor substituted "its own unforgivingly libertarian world view" for school officials' efforts to "encourage a drug-free student lifestyle." Starr says Frederick's message was far beyond what the Supreme Court sought to protect in the 1969 ruling.

Cowan says the district encourages students to speak out on controversial issues. "We do not restrict serious speech," Cowan says. She called Frederick's sign "nonsensical promotion of drugs," rather than part of a serious discussion or debate.

"Up to this point, we thought that a principal enforcing an anti-drug policy was safe to do so," she says. "Now school administrators are walking on eggshells."

'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' Repeal Eyed (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138296

Democratic Rep. Martin T. Meehan yesterday said he will introduce legislation repealing the military's "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy that allows homosexuals to serve in the armed forces.

Mr. Meehan said public opinion has changed since the policy began 14 years ago under the Clinton administration, and that allowing homosexuals to openly serve will help the military retain specialized members, including linguists fluent in Arabic.

A 2005 Government Accountability Office report says more than 10,000 members of the armed services, including 750 service members with specialties "critical" to the war on terror, have been discharged since the policy was implemented.

"It will still be an uphill climb," said Mr. Meehan of Massachusetts. "But the November election can only mean good things for my bill."

The bill, "Military Readiness Enhancement Act," has 109 co-sponsors, including three Republicans. Nonetheless, it faces opposition from many lawmakers, including House Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat.

"It's not going anywhere," said Elaine Donnelly, president of the Center for Military Readiness, a group that opposes allowing homosexuals to serve in the military.

"Even the Democrats I've talked to don't want to touch this bill. It's very straight-forward, people who are homosexual are not compatible with the military's standards of service."

During the 1992 presidential campaign, Bill Clinton promised to change military policy by allowing homosexuals to openly serve. However, he reversed course after facing strong bipartisan opposition.

The policy says: "Sexual orientation will not be a bar to service unless manifested by homosexual conduct. The military will discharge members who engage in homosexual conduct. ..."

Tony Snow, White House spokesman, said the President Bush supports the military policy.

"We will see what happens if Congress comes up with something," Mr. Snow said.

Marine Staff Sgt. Eric Alva, the first solider injured during the Iraq war, joined Mr. Meehan during his Capitol Hill press conference yesterday and announced he is homosexual. He said he is leaving the Marines after 13 years to work for the Human Rights Campaign, a lobbying organization that supports gay rights.

"I'm an American who fought for his country and for the rights of all Americans, not just some of them," Sgt. Alva said.

Public and military opposition to homosexuals openly serving in the military has decreased in recent years.

A December 2006 Zogby International poll found that 73 percent of military service members were "comfortable" serving with homosexuals.

"I hope we get beyond this foolish policy, and one that I think is cruel," said Rep. Christopher Shays, one of the three House Republicans who has co-sponsored Mr. Meehan's bill.

"The military isn't saying gays can't serve, they're saying they can't tell," he said. "So, military commanders know there are gays in the military."

Same Town, Different Communities (WP)

By Lonnae O'neal Parker

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Ask older residents of historic North Brentwood their recollections of the town, and they go into a reverie about kids playing house-to-house and about how the town was self-contained with businesses and shops. Mostly, it was black, and the generations who had lived there gave the place its essence.

But "change comes," said Eleanor Traynham, 71, who was born and raised in the town, in Prince George's County, and returned in 1992. And "you have to be able to adapt to change."

On a late afternoon, children run across the lawns of modest three-bedroom homes, young mothers carry groceries, and fathers in coveralls arrive home from work. These families are Latino. A few yards away, much older residents are checking mail or working on their cars or greeting each other with late-day banter. They are black.

In a town changing without overt rancor, they are neighbors without the neighborliness, separate groups leading lives that don't touch, even though their property lines do. It's a new challenge for this historic place -- re-creating community.

It's a challenge that plays out against a backdrop of seismic demographic shifts. In 2003, Latinos overtook African Americans as the nation's most populous minority. Fueled by a boom in construction and low-wage service jobs, the Washington region had the ninth-largest Latino population gain in the country from 2000 to 2004.

In Prince George's, most of the Latino population, which doubled from 1990 to 2000, is concentrated inside the Beltway in the northwestern part of the county. As more Latinos graduate to homeownership, the relative affordability of housing in communities there has accelerated the pace of change.

In North Brentwood, population nearly 500, off Rhode Island Avenue just outside the District line, these shifts play out door-to-door. Since 2000, the historically black town has become 25 percent Hispanic.

Some black residents are concerned about what these changes mean for their community, even as they worry about seeming intolerant. Newer Hispanic residents say they get along with everyone, and if there is subtle awkwardness to their brief hello-goodbye exchanges with black neighbors, they're too busy working and raising their families to notice.

Originally settled by black Civil War troops, North Brentwood became the first incorporated black town in Prince George's -- and one of the first in the state -- in 1924, a thriving hamlet of single-family homes and businesses.

It had a tavern with a dance floor where such stars as Pearl Bailey performed. In 2003, the town was put on the National Register of Historic Places. Today, along leafy streets, small cottages border towering home construction and wide new additions.

One recent late afternoon, Santos Benitez, 27, a construction worker, was caring for his four children, ranging from 3 months to 10 years old, while his wife worked. The Salvadoran immigrant moved from a house in Northeast Washington two months ago. "This house is a lot bigger," said Diego Benitez, 10, who was skating in the driveway with his brothers Jonathan, 6, and Brian, 7. Santos Benitez said his neighbors didn't talk much, except when one came over to complain about his dog.

Hiawatha Crank, 55, a plumber and diesel mechanic originally from South Carolina who moved to North Brentwood in 1980, said the community feel reminded him of home. He noticed the first Latino family five years ago. "Man, it seemed like after that happened, the sky broke loose, and they came from everywhere," he said.

His Latino neighbors seem all right and don't bother his family, he said. Still, he said that a spike in the price of homes, which now sell from $200,000 to $400,000, is putting Brentwood out of reach for many working-class blacks. Crank attributes the price spike to the Latino influx, even though property values across the county have risen sharply in the past five years.

He pointed out single-family homes he said housed multiple Latino families. Recent data for the number of residents per household were not available for North Brentwood. Nationally in 2005, Hispanics composed about 11 percent of U.S. households but made up more than 50 percent of households deemed crowded (more than one person per room), according to the Census Bureau's American Housing Survey.

Nearby, Crank's buddy Charles Cuffie, 62, a retired bus driver, voiced a commonly held suspicion among black residents that Latinos sometimes pretend not to speak English to avoid conversation.

"Things change," said Crank's daughter, Tammi Crank, 20, a security officer with the federal Department of Homeland Security. "I just never thought it would happen in my neighborhood."

The influx is driven by housing prices that are cheaper than in Fairfax and Montgomery counties and real estate agents who steer Latinos into certain neighborhoods, said Audrey Singer, an immigration fellow at the Brookings Institution.

Decades ago, the county was roiled as it shifted from majority-white to majority-black. Peter Shapiro, a former Town Council member and County Council chairman, who is white, has seen friction between blacks and Latinos in other Prince George's neighborhoods. Perhaps because of its strong sense of identity, Shapiro said, North Brentwood seems determined not to repeat those mistakes.

Lillian K. Beverly, 77, who has lived in North Brentwood most of her life and been mayor since 1995, said she had fielded complaints about Latino residents parking on lawns or growing corn in their front yards -- relatively small problems that have been fixed. She knows that some residents feel wistful for bygone days but asked, "How can we as black folks always complain about being discriminated against if we're going to do the same?" She said the North Brentwood Memorial Garden and the planned Prince George's African American Museum and Cultural Center in North Brentwood will ensure that their legacy survives, even if their numbers continue to dwindle.

William A. Campos (D-Hyattsville), 32, who moved with his family from El Salvador to Hyattsville when he was 9 and represents North Brentwood on the County Council, said: "We're still learning one another in this area. It will take some time."

Campos said Latino residents don't always recognize that parking on the grass doesn't play well with neighbors. "The norm in a residential area here is not the norm for what we were doing back home," he said.

He said the notion of Latinos feigning ignorance of English was often a misunderstanding. Newcomers often pick up only a few words at a time, Campos said. "Why would you purposely not speak or want to understand the world that you live in? Sometimes you don't have that ability," he said.

Campos agreed that Latinos often pool resources. "It becomes very natural to help each other sustain the house and at the same time be with the family," he said. It's an arrangement that he said some African Americans have told him they recognize from their own family histories.

Traynham, the North Brentwood resident, who is black, concurred. "Basically they are only doing the same thing African Americans did years ago. When African Americans migrated from the South, they always had a place where family members could come and stay," she said.

ValentÃ-n PeÃ±a, originally from El Salvador, said, speaking in Spanish, that blacks often wave, but neither group ever starts a conversation.

PeÃ±a said he understood that black residents might feel threatened, but his nephew, who wouldn't give his name, disagreed, in English. "I listen to Martin [Luther King]; he had a dream."

When Ever Diaz opened his auto repair shop in 1990, he spoke English, introduced himself to residents and attended community functions. It's a model for other newcomers, he said. "I didn't quit, and I didn't get angry," he said.

On a cold afternoon, Diaz introduced himself to Ramondo Lara, 38, a maintenance engineer who is married with two young sons and moved to North Brentwood three years ago. "Everybody says, 'Hi. How are you? I am fine,' " Lara said in halting English. Lara and Diaz joked that they should open a Salvadoran embassy. People have to get used to Latinos being here, Diaz said.

"Like everyone else, they are just looking to move up," he said.

Slavery Is Not Dead. It's Not Even Past. (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

The Rev. Al Sharpton seemed subdued, quiet, reflective — which was unusual.

Just when we thought the news couldn't get any weirder, we learned this week, via The Daily News, that Mr. Sharpton's great-grandfather was a slave who was owned by relatives of Senator Strom Thurmond, the longtime archsegregationist who ran for president as a Dixiecrat in 1948.

"There's not enough troops in the Army," Mr. Thurmond told a screaming crowd during that campaign, "to force the Southern people to break down segregation and admit the nigra race into our theaters, into our swimming pools, into our schools and into our homes."

Mr. Sharpton seemed a little shaken by the revelation. "You're always kind of thinking that your ancestors were slaves," he said. "But this was my grandfather's father. I knew my grandfather. It's eerie when it becomes so personal."

The days of slavery are closer than we tend to think, and they were crueler than we tend to realize. Mr. Sharpton's great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton, was sent with his wife and two children from South Carolina to Florida so a woman named Julia Thurmond Sharpton could send them out as laborers to pay off debts left by her late husband.

Julia Sharpton was a first cousin, twice removed, of Strom Thurmond.

"They were sent there solely for that reason," Mr. Sharpton said. "To make money to pay her debt. It was just so clear that they were nothing but property. The complete dehumanization — I don't think I fully understood it until this hit home."

There's a great deal that Americans don't fully understand about slavery. It's such an uncomfortable subject that the temptation is to relegate it to the distant past and move on. But the long tentacles of that evil institution are still with us. Slavery was the foundation of the thriving consumer society that we have today and the wellspring of the racism that still poisons so many white attitudes and black lives.

The sheer size of the phenomenon of slavery, which was woven into the very being of the early Americas, is not well known today. The historian David Brion Davis, in his book "Inhuman Bondage," tells us:

"By 1820 nearly 8.7 million slaves had departed from Africa for the New World, as opposed to only 2.6 million whites, many of them convicts or indentured servants, who had left Europe. Thus by 1820 African slaves constituted almost 77 percent of the enormous population that had sailed toward the Americas, and from 1760 to 1820 this emigrating flow included 5.6 African slaves for every European."

For most of the time between the Revolutionary War and the Civil War, the United States was governed by presidents who owned slaves.

One of the points Mr. Davis stressed was that the commodities produced in such tremendous volume by slaves — sugar, tobacco, coffee, chocolate, cotton — were crucial to the formation of the world's first global mass market.

"From the very beginnings," wrote Mr. Davis, "America was part black, and indebted to the appalling sacrifices of millions of individual blacks who cleared the forests and tilled the soil. Yet even the ardent opponents of slaveholding could seldom if ever acknowledge this basic fact."

Instead of reaping rewards for this seminal role in the creation of a rich and powerful nation, blacks have been relentlessly vilified by a profoundly racist society and frozen out of most of the nation's bounty. Consigned to the bottom of the caste heap after emancipation, and denied some of the most basic human rights, blacks became the convenient depository of whatever blame and negative stereotypes whites chose to cast their way.

The abject state ruthlessly imposed upon blacks for so long became, perversely, proof of their inferiority. Blacks gave whites of all classes someone to look down upon.

Slavery, like the past, as Faulkner reminded us, is not dead. It's not even past. It's not something that you can wish away.

The other night Reverend Sharpton flew into Miami to attend a conference. At the airport someone asked for his autograph.

"It was the first time in my life that I thought about why my name is Sharpton," he said. "I mean this whole thing is as personal as why your name is what it is. You're named after someone who owned your great-grandparents."

My Link To Strom Thurmond (LAT)

By Al Sharpton Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

LAST WEEK, I received the shock of my life. I found out that my family was enslaved by the family of the leading segregationist of our time, the late Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina. I don't know whether Thurmond himself was my blood relative; there has been no DNA testing yet. What I do know now is the horrific details of how my great-grandfather and family were slaves, directly owned and leased out like chattel animals. This revelation about my ancestors has made slavery real to me. It is no longer an abstract horror. It is my family history — and the Thurmonds'.

Sen. Thurmond's hatred for blacks was so strong that, in 1948, he walked out of the Democratic National Convention and ran for president on a segregationist ticket. Words cannot fully describe the feelings I had when I learned the awful truth. Not only am I the descendant of slaves, but my family had to endure the particular agony of being slaves to the Thurmonds, the symbol of everything about America that I have fought to change. I felt humiliated and prideful; reflective and angry; oppressed and uplifted. I thought about what it must have been like to be a slave, and then what my great-grandfather would have thought about me and about my strengths, my weaknesses. Am I doing enough in my life to make him proud? It also made me reach out to my father, someone I have not really spoken to often because he left my family when I was just 10 years old.

My great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton Sr., and his family were owned by a white woman named Julia Ann Thurmond shortly before the Civil War. They lived in, of all places, Liberty, Fla. Before that, they were the property of the white slave owner Alexander Sharpton of South Carolina. Sharpton's son, Jefferson, had married Miss Thurmond, and died in debt, so Sharpton sent my great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton, and his family to Liberty in 1861 to work off the debts. Julia Thurmond Sharpton inherited my great-grandfather. Julia Thurmond's grandfather was also Strom Thurmond's great-grandfather.

When Coleman Sharpton finally shook off the chains of slavery, he became a turpentine dipper — work so awful that, when you finished a day's work, you had to wash yourself in gasoline to get the stickiness off your body. But the grim reality of my ancestry, and the ancestry of millions of African Americans, is that I am sure even the torturous job of turpentine dipping gave my great-grandfather joy because he was finally free and recognized as a man, no longer the property of someone else.

Every day from now on, when I write my name, I will think about how I got that name. I will think about how Al Sharpton, the white slave owner, sent my family to Strom Thurmond's relatives to work off Thurmond debts. America's shame is that I am the heir of those who were property to the Thurmond family.

In the end, it is irrelevant whether Strom Thurmond and I are related by blood. Of course, so many African Americans have had to deal with the knowledge that they are the relatives of the whites who enslaved them. Still, I want to know the truth.

Obviously, the temptation here is to fall into the caldron of anger that swirls when you visualize your flesh and blood, most assuredly proud and strong, waking up every day enslaved. You have to hope they realized that they suffered so that one day their descendants could live the life that was stolen from them.

But rage will do no good for Coleman Sharpton's descendants or the Thurmond descendants. My family and the Thurmond family must rise above the ugly, shameful past that binds us, just as America must come out of denial and seek to repair the damage that slavery has done and to eliminate the bigotry that still lingers.

The news of my own past was brought to me unsolicited. But I hope all African Americans will seek their family history so we can dignify the memories of our forefathers and change the America of the future. And, if we can take that step, certainly all Americans, black and white, can join us.

ANTITRUST:

Sirius CEO Vows Postmerger Price Cuts (WSJ)

By Corey Boles

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.'s chief executive, Mel Karmazin, told lawmakers the company would cut consumer prices if federal authorities approve its merger with XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc.

Mr. Karmazin tried to allay concerns that subscribers' costs would rise after the $11.4 billion merger of the two struggling satellite-radio operators, telling the House Judiciary Committee's antitrust task force the merger would lead to a decline in prices. For basic monthly service, subscribers to both radio operations pay $12.95 a month. "The idea of raising prices to compete with free radio is bizarre and doesn't work," he said. "We are committed to not raising prices and, in fact, are committed to lowering prices."

Rep. John Conyers (D., Mich.), chairman of both the Judiciary Committee and the task force, was skeptical. "We don't have too good a record of satellite companies keeping their promises," Mr. Conyers said. "'Trust me' isn't going to work here, not just today, but in the longer-term examinations you will be going through."

Democratic Rep. Rick Boucher of Virginia said the merger should get a green light as long as the companies agree to a series of conditions and to freeze prices.

The conditions he suggested were outlined by Gigi Sohn, president of Public Knowledge, a public-interest group with a focus on communications. In her testimony before the task force, Ms. Sohn said the companies would have to allow consumers to subscribe on a channel-by-channel basis or tiered programming. She added they should agree to make 5% of capacity available to noncommercial, educational purposes and freeze prices for three years once the merger is approved.

"I would think that if those conditions are reached, the merger should be allowed to proceed," said Mr. Boucher, who sits on both the antitrust task force and the Commerce Committee's telecommunications panel.

Mr. Karmazin ruled out channel-by-channel subscriptions, saying the companies' technology wouldn't allow it, and said he would be reluctant to offer tiers of channels at reduced rates, as it would likely mean a "loss of revenue." Nor would he be pinned down on how long a merged company would cut or freeze rates. He suggested the maximum would be four years.

DOJ_NMG_0138301

In response to questioning from the ranking Republican member of the task force, Rep. Steve Chabot of Ohio, Mr. Karmazin said Sirius and XM weren't making a "failing company argument" and said the merger between the two companies wasn't necessary. He emphasized that it would be in the best interests of consumers for the merger to be allowed.

Skeptics Question XM-Sirius Merger Plan (WP)

By Charles Babington, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The nation's two satellite-radio companies promised yesterday to refrain from raising prices, for a time at least, if they are allowed to merge. But some lawmakers and consumer groups appeared dubious.

Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, told the House Judiciary Committee's antitrust task force that consumers would benefit if the government allowed his company to merge with rival XM Satellite Radio Holdings. "We are committed to not raising prices, and we are committed to lowering prices," said Karmazin, who would be chief executive of the new company.

The panel's chairman, Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), responded: "How do we enforce promises? . . . 'Trust me' isn't going to work here."

Karmazin said Sirius and XM might accept conditions if the Federal Communications Commission and Justice Department were to approve the merger. But he declined to say how long they might agree to cap subscription prices, now set at $12.95 a month by both companies. XM and Sirius have said a merged company would offer various levels of content, presumably at varying prices, but they have declined to provide details.

Owners of free, over-the-air radio stations strongly oppose the merger, and the president of their association sharply challenged Karmazin at the hearing. The government cannot trust XM's and Sirius's promises, "given their long track record of breaking FCC rules," including causing signal interference with local radio stations, said David K. Rehr, president of the National Association of Broadcasters.

Sirius CEO Says He'd OK Price Caps (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, March 1, 2007

To win approval of their blockbuster merger, the nation's two satellite radio companies would accept government-mandated conditions guaranteeing consumers lower prices and more channels, the head of Sirius Satellite Radio told lawmakers Wednesday.

"We will give people more choice than they had before and lower prices and less confusion," Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin told the House Judiciary Committee's new antitrust task force.

The hearing served up the first public airing of the proposed link-up between Sirius and XM Satellite Radio since it was announced last week. Wednesday's debate underscored the complexities of the merger, with divisions within the ranks of public-interest advocates and each political party on whether consumers would be helped or hurt.

Critics such as the National Association of Broadcasters say the merger, which requires approval from the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission, would forge a monopoly satellite radio provider that would raise prices and limit choice. Karmazin says that would never happen because satellite radio competes with traditional radio, Internet radio, iPods, music on cellphones and digital radio.

Noting that there are some 10 million subscribers to both services, Karmazin said, "Why would people who don't subscribe at $12.95 subscribe at $14.95?"

The companies, which each charge about $13 a month for more than 100 channels, have lost billions of dollars between them while competing to sign up high-priced talent such as Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey. By combining, Karmazin said, customers could get both Major League Baseball and the NFL, for instance, on the same radio service. And the new giant could use cost savings to cut prices.

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., committee chairman, was skeptical. " 'Trust me' isn't going to work here."

"I'm prepared to work with Congress, work with regulators to do what you need to do to have something beyond 'Trust me,' " Karmazin said.

He would not commit to a term for any conditions, except to say "between two weeks and four years."

Consumer advocates were split. Mark Cooper of the Consumer Federation of America argued that traditional radio, the Internet and other services don't compete directly with satellite radio, which is nationwide and ad-free. Any conditions would be "short-term," he said. "Competition is the consumer's best friend."

But Gigi Sohn of Public Knowledge said that by scrapping duplicate channels, a merged company could air more niche channels, though she called for strict conditions.

Some typically merger-wary Democrats supported the deal while some Republicans were skeptical. " Stop throwing around the word 'monopoly,' " said Rep. Anthony Weiner, D-N.Y. "The competition they have is with radio stations charging zero dollars for the same or a similar product."

Radio Merger Gets Hill Scrutiny (WT)

By Kara Rowland, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Federal lawmakers, kicking off their probe of the proposed $13 billion merger of rivals XM Satellite Radio Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc., yesterday quizzed both Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin and one of the deal's most vocal opponents.

"We've come to this hearing with an open mind, but we also recognize that the companies have the obligation to convince Congress, regulators and most importantly, the American people that this combination will improve the competitive playing field and benefit consumers," said House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat.

The proposed XM-Sirius marriage faces regulatory scrutiny from both the Justice Department and the Federal Communications Commission. Yesterday's hearing was held before a new Judiciary Committee Antitrust Task Force established earlier this week to look at the deal and other antitrust issues.

Mr. Karmazin made the case for merging the two companies, arguing that times have changed since the competitors received their licenses from the FCC in 1997.

"Consumers will get more choice, lower prices and the ability to have less confusion and more content," he said.

Mr. Karmazin said a combined entity would be open to government-imposed conditions, including an agreement not to raise subscription prices for a certain period of time.

"If in order to get the deal done we have to make a concession, we're prepared to make a concession," he said.

But David Rehr, president of the National Association of Broadcasters and an outspoken critic of the deal, said the merger would create a "government-sanctioned monopoly."

"Two companies that have a pattern and practice of violating their FCC licenses cannot be trusted with monopoly power," said Mr. Rehr, whose organization represents traditional AM/FM radio stations.

The hearing, like the regulatory reviews to come, largely turned on which services compete with District-based XM and Sirius of New York.

Supporters of the deal define the market widely to include traditional terrestrial radio, IPods, high-definition radio, Internet radio and cell phones that stream music.

Opponents say satellite radio is unique, and that the two companies price their services based on competition with each other.

"Right now, we don't have all the facts necessary to determine the legality of the merger," said antitrust analyst Charles Biggio, the only person to testify who did not take a position on the deal.

"My recommendation is that no firm conclusions be formed about this merger until the agencies have done their review."

Most members of the antitrust panel said they were approaching the merger with an open mind. However, proponents of the deal found allies in Rep. Rick Boucher, Virginia Democrat, who supports its approval, and Rep. Anthony Weiner, New York Democrat, who said to describe the merger as giving rise to a monopoly has "no foundation in the realities of the world today."

"Sometimes mergers serve to help an industry and help choice move forward," Mr. Weiner said.

The hearing also featured testimony from the Consumer Federation of America, which opposes the deal, and the digital rights group Public Knowledge, which supports it with conditions.

The XM-Sirius deal will be the subject of a congressional hearing next week before the House Energy and Commerce telecommunications and the Internet subcommittee.

The companies, which announced their deal last week, expect it to be approved by the end of the year.

Sirius CEO Argues For Radio Merger (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Despite vowing not to raise their prices, the nation's only two satellite radio providers found their proposed merger to be a tough sell Wednesday on Capitol Hill.

"You've got some high hurdles to overcome, don't you think?" House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) told Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.

Karmazin, who would run the new company if federal regulators approve Sirius' proposed merger with XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc., tried to overcome those hurdles by promising not to hike for an unspecified period the $12.95 monthly subscription rate that both companies charge.

The reason for the concession is simple, Karmazin said, and is the heart of the case Sirius and XM are trying to make: They now compete with a host of technologies that don't charge a cent — including broadcast radio, iPods and music that streams over the Internet.

"The idea of raising prices to compete with free is bizarre," Karmazin said. But he didn't say how long prices would remain unchanged.

Price is a major concern for several members of the committee's antitrust task force. Congress doesn't have to approve the deal, but its views could influence officials at the Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission, which must bless the merger.

"Why would we eliminate one of the two competitors here?" said Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte (R-Va.). "I believe prices are going up if you are the only one."

His fears were echoed by Mark Cooper, director of research at the Consumer Federation of America.

"Competition is the consumer's best friend," Cooper told the committee, warning that "a tsunami of mergers will ripple through the digital space" if regulators agree to the market definition urged by Sirius and XM.

Conyers also questioned what effect the potential deal might have on future mergers.

But some lawmakers agreed with Karmazin that the marketplace had changed and indicated they would support the merger with certain conditions, such as requiring a lower-priced option for a limited number of channels.

"Music is music, and it really doesn't matter much the source of it," said Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.)

Karmazin said the merger would give listeners more choices because they would have access to both systems' exclusive programs, such as National Football League and Major League Baseball broadcasts, and current subscribers would not have to purchase new radios.

But David Rehr, chief executive and president of the National Assn. of Broadcasters, told the committee the deal would create a "government-sanctioned monopoly" and also would violate an FCC rule prohibiting a merger, instituted in 1997 to promote competition.

The FCC can change the rule, though Chairman Kevin J. Martin said last week that Sirius and XM faced a "high" hurdle.

Sirius Chief Talks Of Ways To Get XM Deal Approved (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — Facing skeptical lawmakers, Mel Karmazin, the architect of a proposed merger of the nation's two satellite radio companies, announced at a hearing in Congress on Wednesday that the companies would agree to government-imposed price controls and other unspecified measures to gain regulatory approval for the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0138304

Appearing before an antitrust task force of the House Judiciary Committee, Mr. Karmazin, the chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, repeatedly and angrily contested charges by opponents, including the major trade group for broadcasters, that merging his company with XM Satellite Radio Holdings would simply transform a duopoly into a monopoly.

"There is no monopoly or duopoly," he said. "That's the most bizarre thing I have ever heard."

He maintained that the relevant market for the services offered by the two satellite radio companies includes all terrestrial broadcasters, Internet radio and other popular listening devices, including iPods and other portable music players.

With so much competition from other sources, he said, satellite radio lacks the sway of a dominant industry power.

But as he tried to sell the proposed deal to Washington, he also acknowledged the major challenges he faced in persuading policy makers that it would not be anticompetitive. He made it clear that he was willing to embark on the same kind of deal- making with the regulators that has been a hallmark of his career as a broadcast executive.

"We're prepared to make concessions, and we're willing to work with the F.C.C. on doing it," he said, speaking about the discussions the two companies will have with regulators at the Justice Department's antitrust division and the Federal Communications Commission.

When a Republican lawmaker, Representative Ric Keller of Florida, pressed Mr. Karmazin over whether the company would agree to price controls, Mr. Karmazin said yes, adding, "We believe we need to show you this is in the public interest and price is important."

"We should be held accountable for everything we say," he told another Republican lawmaker, Representative J. Randy Forbes of Virginia, in response to a question about how to enforce the commitments Mr. Karmazin was making for more programming and better services at lower prices.

"I'll leave it to the regulators," he added. "This isn't about 'Trust me.' We should be able to be accountable."

But toward the end of the hearing, when a Democratic lawmaker, Representative Sheila Jackson-Lee of Texas, complained that there was too much concentration in the broadcasting industry and a lack of adequate diversity in both programming and ownership, Mr. Karmazin appeared to hedge about making any further commitments.

"I don't want to make promises to suggest I'll do anything to get the merger done," he said. "You can be damned if you do, and damned if you don't."

The specific commitments that Mr. Karmazin sought to make did not assuage some of the proposed merger's more vociferous critics.

Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., the Wisconsin Republican who until this year had headed the Judiciary Committee, said Mr. Karmazin's proposal reminded him of "an old regulated gas company" or some other highly regulated utility with rates set by the government.

"I don't think that's the policy we want to promote," Mr. Sensenbrenner said.

"What you said is so far from the truth," Mr. Karmazin replied.

"But you are a monopoly," Mr. Sensenbrenner said.

"We are absolutely not a monopoly," Mr. Karmazin responded.

The generally hostile reception to Mr. Karmazin reflected the fact that the political forces all seem to be leaning in one direction regarding the proposed merger. A powerful alliance of broadcasters and consumer groups has challenged the deal as a violation of antitrust laws and contrary to the "public interest" standards applied by regulators when they consider whether to approve radio mergers.

The National Association of Broadcasters, with powerful members in every Congressional district, has waged a political and public relations campaign attacking the deal.

By contrast, the two satellite networks have no significant industry allies on their side. They were warmly embraced at the hearing by only one Democratic lawmaker, Representative Anthony Weiner of New York.

Sirius and XM point to the opposition from broadcasters as proof that the deal would make satellite radio still more competitive with the rest of the radio industry.

The unanswered question after the hearing is what resonance the Congressional reaction would have with lawyers at the Justice Department and policy makers at the F.C.C.

DOJ_NMG_0138305

Government officials are not expected to reach their conclusions about the deal for many months, although Kevin J. Martin, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, has expressed skepticism. A commission rule forbidding the merger of the satellite companies would have to be waived for the deal to be completed.

At the Justice Department, XM and Sirius have more reason to be optimistic, in large part because the Bush administration has been more permissive on antitrust issues than any administration in modern times.

The consumer groups and broadcasters — political opponents on other issues — have struck a fragile alliance as they have gone about challenging the satellite radio deal.

On Wednesday, one consumer group, Public Knowledge, called for the regulators to heavily condition the deal with price controls and free airwaves for alternative voices before approving it.

The group also said that broadcasters opposing the deal on antitrust grounds were hypocritical because they were simultaneously trying to ease rules that have prevented more consolidation in their industry.

XM Merger Won't Hurt Consumers, Sirius Says (DOWJ)

Dow Jones Newswires, March 1, 2007

Deal would be monopoly sanctioned by the state, opposition group says

A merger between Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. wouldn't lead to less choice or higher costs for listeners, the chief executive of Sirius told Congress yesterday.

In his written testimony submitted to the Antitrust Task Force, a body made up of House Judiciary Committee members, Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin pledged that consumers would not lose out as a result of the $13 billion merger.

"We operate in an intensely competitive environment that will continue to intensify post-merger — and continue to provide an inherent check on programming as well as pricing," said Karmazin's statement.

In his opening remarks, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the head of the task force, said that though he is approaching the matter with an open mind, the burden of proof lies with the companies to convince Congress of the merits of the deal.

He said that the "critical threshold" is whether the market that the two satellite companies compete in is "all forms of digital and retail music and radio, or simply satellite radio."

Conyers' statement went on to say that from one perspective, the merger "can be said to turn a duopoly into a monopoly."

When satellite radio was licensed 19 years ago, Sirius and XM were granted the only two licenses. In exchange, Federal Communications Commission rules stated that the two wouldn't be allowed to merge in the future.

Sirius and XM have argued that in the ensuing 10 years, the market has changed substantially and they are no longer just competing against each other.

The Department of Justice's antitrust task force would have to approve the merger and FCC rules would have to be changed to allow the deal before it could get final approval.

Karmazin was appearing before the first hearing of the task force with David Rehr, the chief executive of the National Association of Broadcasters, and representatives of consumer groups.

The NAB, which represents mainly smaller radio and television broadcasters across the U.S., fiercely opposes the deal.

"The proposed merger must be rejected," said Rehr in his opening statement. "Public policy should never allow one entity to acquire state-sanctioned, monopoly control over the 25 megahertz of spectrum allocated to satellite-radio service."

Taking a somewhat less strident view was Gigi B. Sohn, the president of public-interest group Public Knowledge.

In her opening statement, she said that the merger should be given the green light only if it meets three conditions.

It must make available pricing choices such as channel-by-channel subscriptions or tiered programming; it must hand over 5 percent of its capacity to noncommercial educational programming; and it should agree to not raise prices for three years after the merger is granted approval.

House Panel Grills Sirius Chief On XM Merger (CNET)

Politicians say they want to keep an open mind but indicate the deal may have high hurdles to leap.

WASHINGTON--Sirius Satellite Radio CEO Mel Karmazin on Wednesday defended the proposed union of his company with XM Satellite Radio before a panel of politicians with varying degrees of concern about the deal's potential impact on consumers.

Appearing at the first hearing convened here by the House Judiciary Committee Antitrust Task Force, Karmazin said a combination of the sole two satellite radio players would lower, or at least cap, its prices and provide more programming choices.

For example, one network carries Major League Baseball games, and the other carries the National Football League games, but neither carries both. Sports fans would no longer have to pay to subscribe to both services or buy two different radio receivers if the entities merged, he said. Karmazin also pledged that existing radio receivers for each service would continue to work after the melding of the companies.

"We are absolutely convinced that this merger is going to be in the consumer's best interest," said the Sirius chief and former Viacom president.

Attitudes toward the proposed deal, worth about $13 billion, did not appear to be split along party lines among members of the newly created House task force, which has 10 Democrats and nine Republicans. Many opened their questioning on Wednesday with vows to keep an "open mind" about the deal but went on to question the deal's necessity and its benefits to consumers.

Task Force Chairman John Conyers (D-Mich.) pressed Karmazin to explain how he planned to persuade federal regulators that the companies will follow through on their promises.

"'Trust me' isn't going to work here, not just today, but in the longer-term examinations that you will be going through," Conyers said. "You've got some high hurdles to overcome, don't you think?"

One hurdle already lies in the licenses granted to the companies by the Federal Communications Commission. In hopes of ensuring competition, the FCC stipulated at the time that there had to continue to be more than one licensee in the satellite radio sphere. XM and Sirius would have to persuade the regulators to waive that decision.

Citing the FCC's policy decision, Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), the former chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, challenged XM and Sirius executives' repeated assertions that the merged entity would not constitute a monopoly.

"What you appear to be advocating is to make your merged company somewhat akin to an old regulated gas company, and I don't see where the consumer ends up benefiting in that," Sensenbrenner said.

He also questioned how the XM-Sirius plan was any different than a proposed merger between EchoStar Communications' Dish Network and Hughes Electronics' DirectTV that the FCC blocked on the grounds that it amounted to a "regulated monopoly."

Karmazin said his companies' situation was different because the satellite TV business competes with cable and not with free services like terrestrial and Internet radio. Throughout the hearing, he repeatedly challenged any suggestion that the merged companies would have incentive to raise their prices by saying, "We compete with free."

One key question in assessing the deal's impact lies in defining the satellite radio's competitors. If satellite radio is viewed as an entirely separate market, then the proposed deal would seem to amount to a situation in which a monopoly is created--at least until the next satellite player emerges. By contrast, if regulators decide it should be considered part of a broader market that includes all forms of digital and retail music, such as Internet-based and terrestrial radio, then the competitive implications would change drastically.

Sirius and XM argue the union of their two companies will not amount to a monopoly, as critics have suggested. They maintain the deal will instead allow them to compete more effectively with Internet-based and traditional broadcast radio. According to analysts' estimates, the combination could save the companies $300 million or more each year, Karmazin said.

But opponents like the National Association of Broadcasters maintain the situation is no different from the satellite TV merger situation and would create a "government-sanctioned monopoly." Speaking alongside Karmazin and representatives from consumer advocacy groups, NAB CEO David Rehr told the task force that such an arrangement would violate federal rules and would "undermine audio content competition, not enhance it."

Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.) took issue with that characterization of the proposed deal. He said it was clear that satellite and traditional radio operators offered similar and competing services and that NAB's fight against the deal only reinforced that traditional radio operators are concerned about new competition.

The term monopoly "might serve to send shivers into the spine of regulators, but it doesn't have much effect if it has no foundation in the realities of the world today," he said.

Consumer groups' perceptions have been mixed. Mark Cooper, director of research for the Consumer Federation of America, voiced strident opposition to the deal, saying the groups he represented "remain unconvinced by the excuses we have heard to justify this merger." He said he was convinced only "head-to-head competition" would lower prices for consumers in the long run.

Gigi Sohn, president of the advocacy group Public Knowledge, told the panel that the merger could lead to consumer benefits if certain conditions are imposed. She suggested requiring the company to make a la carte or tiered programming available, agreeing not to raise prices for three years after the merger is approved, and making 5 percent of its capacity available to independently controlled, non-commercial educational and informational programming.

Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.) endorsed Sohn's recommendations. "This merger is very much in the public interest and should be approved with those conditions," he said.

The FCC and the U.S. Department of Justice share the ultimate responsibility of to deciding whether the deal should go through and what restrictions must be placed upon it. It's unclear how the congressional task force will fit in, although Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas) said he hoped the agencies will consider its findings when making their assessments.

Smith, the top-ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, also urged his colleagues not to "prejudge" the proposed merger. "We are at the beginning of a very long process," he said.

Sirius's Karmazin Agrees To Price Caps In XM Buy (Update3) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley And Christopher Stern

Bloomberg, March 1, 2007

Feb. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. Chief Executive Officer Mel Karmazin told skeptical lawmakers he would agree to freeze prices to gain approval of the proposed $4.51 billion purchase of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc.

Karmazin, testifying today at a House Judiciary Committee hearing, pledged to offer choices for consumers to lower their bills and agreed to price caps for an undetermined period.

``We are willing to talk to people about it," Karmazin said. ``If the idea of the merger is conditioned on certain restrictions, we would be open to the conditions."

Karmazin and XM Chairman Gary Parsons are trying to convince U.S. regulators that joining the only satellite radio services won't harm consumers. He drew doubts from legislators including committee Chairman Michigan Democrat John Conyers, who pointed out that past promises, such as making radios that work with both services, haven't been fulfilled.

```Trust me' isn't going to work here," Conyers, 77, said to Karmazin, who is 63. ``You've got some high hurdles to overcome, don't you think?"

The companies contend there is more competition for listeners now than when the original satellite licenses were granted, from devices such as Apple Inc.'s iPod, terrestrial radio and new high-definition stations.

``We are going to have to convince them that it is not anticompetitive," Karmazin said, referring to Justice Department and U.S. Federal Communications Commission regulators. He was speaking on behalf of XM as well as Sirius.

Broadcaster Opposition

Shares of Washington-based XM are trading 17 percent below the offer value of $16.82 in Sirius stock, an indication investors are unsure the deal will be completed. Under the agreement announced Feb. 19, each XM share would be exchanged for 4.6 shares of New York-based Sirius.

XM shares gained 4 cents to $14.36 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market trading. Sirius was unchanged at $3.65.

```

The proposal is opposed by the Washington-based National Association of Broadcasters, the industry group for free AM-FM radio.

XM and Sirius are a duopoly seeking to become a ``government-sanctioned monopoly," NAB President and Chief Executive Officer David Rehr testified today.

``They want the ability to set subscription prices for national satellite radio service without constraint from a competing service," Rehr said. ``They want to eliminate the need to compete with another national service provider to acquire programming."

`Monopoly' Debate

Rehr drew his own critics, including Democrats Anthony Weiner from New York and Rick Boucher from Virginia.

``I would like the panel to oblige me by stop throwing around the word monopoly," Weiner said.

Boucher agreed with XM and Sirius's contention that the companies compete in a broad audio entertainment market that includes broadcast radio.

``The very presence of Mr. Rehr here happens to confirm the argument that the relevant market is all of radio," Boucher said.

Lawmakers and regulators have promised to look closely at the deal because of concerns that it would create a satellite radio monopoly. House Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell, a Democrat from Michigan, said yesterday that he planned his own inquiry in to the deal. The Senate Judiciary Committee's Antitrust Subcommittee also may to hold a hearing.

The ``critical issue is whether the relevant market is all forms of digital music or simply satellite radio," Conyers said in an opening statement. ``If we were to define the market as broadly as merger supporters advocate, what kind of precedent are we setting?"

Congress's Role

Congress doesn't have the power to block the deal, which will be formally reviewed by the Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission.

The companies don't need the merger to survive, Karmazin said. ``We aren't making a failing company argument," he said. Such an argument can be used to defend government charges a combination is anticompetitive.

The purchase would bring consumers lower prices and ``less confusion" amid an expansion of content, Karmazin said. He said the companies hope that ``based on the efficiencies of the merger, we could lower prices."

Critics have seized on XM and Sirius's failure to follow through on past commitments.

Conyers, who said he came to the meeting with an open mind, said the companies hadn't offered consumers radios that work with both services as they had promised, which makes it harder to switch providers. He also brought up the companies' run-ins with the FCC over receiver interference with traditional radio and with terrestrial repeaters that don't comply with designs.

To allow a satellite monopoly ``is antithetical to the antitrust laws, perhaps the worst offense against the basic principle that competition is the consumer's best friend," said Mark Cooper, director of research for the Consumer Federation of America, as part of his testimony. He said the companies could get more business by lowering prices.

Satellite Radio Merger To Create A Monopoly? (POL)

By By: Andrew Glass

Politico, March 1, 2007

If federal regulators allow the nation's two satellite radio services to merge, they will not raise prices and even try to lower them.

That pledge came Wednesday from Sirius Satellite Radio chief executive officer Mel Karmazin during a series of often sharp exchanges with members of Congress. Karmazin, the former chief of Viacom, testified for nearly two-and-a-half hours before the newly formed Antitrust Task Force of the House Judiciary Committee.

An overflow crowd of industry executives, lawyers and lobbyists packed the hearing room in the House Rayburn Office Building as Karmazin, one of five witnesses, debated the merits of letting his money-losing company combine with XM Radio in a deal that has been valued at $13 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0138309

Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) opened the hearing by raising concerns over what kind of precedent the government would be setting if it defined the market for satellite radio as all sources of music entertainment. However, Conyers added, “we came here with an open mind.”

Nonetheless, “`Trust me' isn't going to work here," the 77-year-old Conyers said to Karmazin, who is 63. ``You've got some high hurdles to overcome, don't you think?"

``We are going to have to convince them (the regulators) that it is not anti-competitive," Karmazin responded. While XM Chairman Gary Parsons was in the hearing room, Karmazin said he was speaking on behalf of both companies.

The two firms contend there is more competition for listeners now than when the original satellite licenses were granted. Whether or not the merger goes through, he added, satellite radio, with its 14 million customers, will continue to compete with an increasing array of audio outlets, including AM, FM and multi-channel HD radio, the Internet and a host of download-based music players, such as Apple’s iPod.

Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Tex.), the ranking member on the full committee, noted that "we are at the beginning of a long process," a point echoed by Karmazin during his own remarks.

“We are absolutely not a monopoly,” Karmazin said heatedly at one point. “We are absolutely convinced this merger will be in the best interest of consumers,” he maintained. “This merger will give consumers more choice at a lower price and more importantly, less confusion.”

Some of the most pointed exchanges occurred not with the members but at the long witness table between Karmazin and Mark Cooper, research director of the Consumer Federation of America, an advocacy group. Cooper held that, “The argument that consumers will be better off with a benevolent monopolist than competition is absurd. Cost savings will not be passed to consumers. It is competition that is the driver of innovation in this economy, and competition is the best form of protection for consumers."

Karmazin said his people had told him not to get excited and to keep his hands folded at the table. But Cooper, he felt, had gone too far. The monopoly charge, he said, “is the most bizarre thing I’ve ever heard… We are not looking to bankrupt our companies. We are not doing anything that stupid. And we’ll give back some of that saving (to our customers)”

Karmazin also “guaranteed” that current receivers would remain operable after a merger because each service had spare channels in the spectrum allocated to them by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) a decade ago. He stopped short, however, of guaranteeing for how long the merged company would forbear raising prices, suggesting they would look to the commission and to the antitrust division of the Justice Department for guidance on that score.

Currently, the two firms currently both charge a monthly fee of $12.95 for their nationwide packages of music, talk, and sports programming than span more than 100 channels.

Karmazin also said he was not asking for a bailout on the basis of a “failed company argument,” despite combined losses exceeding $7 billion. Life, he added, would go on for Sirius and XM if the government turned them down.

During the hearing, David Rehr, president of the National Association of Broadcasters, referred to the possibility of a combined Sirius and XM several times as a "government-sanctioned monopoly." The radio satellite firms have long had a testy relationship with the NAB over such issues as whether they could offer their customers local real-time traffic and weather information. (The FCC had ruled that they could so long as that information remained universally accessible.)

Charles Biggio, a partner in antitrust and trade regulation with law firm Wilson Sonsini Goodrich and Rosati, said the amalgamation could be deemed legal under the antitrust laws, even if it controls 100 percent of the satellite market, as long as there is no anti-competitive effect. But he added it remained to be seen whether this is the case.

Gigi Sohn, president and co-founder of Public Knowledge, a Washington D.C.-based advocacy group, said that competition between XM and Sirius has left both companies financially drained and that a merger could benefit consumers.

Sirius CEO Makes Pledges to Congress on Service, Prices

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A merger between Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. wouldn't lead to less choice or higher costs for listeners, the chief executive of Sirius told Congress Wednesday.

In his written testimony submitted to the Antitrust Task Force, a body comprised of House Judiciary Committee members, Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin pledged that consumers would not lose out as a result of the $13 billion merger.

"We operate in an intensely competitive environment that will continue to intensify post-merger -- and continue to provide an inherent check on programming as well as pricing," said Karmazin's statement.

In his opening remarks, Judiciary Committee Chairman and head of the task force, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., said that while he was approaching the matter with an open mind, the burden of proof lay with the companies to convince Congress of the merits of the deal.

He said the "critical threshold" was whether the market that the two satellite companies compete in is "all forms of digital and retail music and radio, or simply satellite radio."

Conyers' statement went on to say that from one perspective, the merger "can be said to turn a duopoly into a monopoly."

When satellite radio was licensed a decade ago, Sirius and XM were granted the only two licenses. In exchange, Federal Communications Commission rules stated that the two wouldn't be allowed to merge in the future.

Sirius and XM have argued that in the ensuing 10 years, the market has changed substantially and they are no longer just competing against each other.

The Department of Justice's antitrust task force would have to approve the merger and FCC rules would have to be changed to allow the deal before it could receive final approval.

Karmazin was appearing before the inaugural hearing of the task force alongside David Rehr, chief executive of the National Association of Broadcasters, and representatives of consumer groups.

The NAB, which represents mainly smaller radio and television broadcasters across the U.S., is a fierce opponent of the deal.

"The proposed merger must be rejected," said Rehr in his opening statement. "Public policy should never allow one entity to acquire state-sanctioned, monopoly control over the 25 megahertz of spectrum allocated to satellite radio service."

Taking a somewhat less strident view was Gigi B. Sohn, president of public interest group Public Knowledge.

In her opening statement, she said that the merger should be given the green light only if it met three conditions.

It must make available pricing choices such as channel-by-channel subscriptions or tiered programming; it must hand over 5 percent of its capacity to noncommercial educational programming; and it should agree to not raise prices for three years after the merger was granted approval.

Corporate Lawyers Urge Clarity In Antitrust Law (LAW)

Legal Times, March 1, 2007

Bundled products, sales of services are the focus

Top lawyers for General Electric Co. and Eastman Kodak Co. told federal regulators last month that companies need more clarity in antitrust laws when it comes to the sale of products bundled in a discounted package deal, and to the sale of services and parts for a product.

"Companies are concerned that the rules aren't clear," Ronald Stern, vice president and senior counsel for antitrust at General Electric, said in an interview after the hearing.

Testifying in Chicago at a panel organized by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division, the attorneys said regulators should help companies better understand when they might be stepping over the antitrust line in the two areas.

Previous court rulings have left the law ambiguous on when corporate behavior may violate Section 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act and make companies vulnerable to lawsuits by competitors, the lawyers said.

AMICUS ENCOURAGED

They encouraged the agencies to file amicus briefs in court cases or to issue additional guidelines to make the law clearer.

DOJ_NMG_0138311

"These two areas are a clear problem for companies like Kodak," Patrick Sheller, the chief compliance officer at Eastman Kodak, said in an interview after the hearing.

David Balto, a former Federal Trade Commission policy director and a lawyer in Washington, agreed that amicus briefs could shed light on how companies are expected to follow the law, especially because most antitrust decisions occur in lower courts.

BUNDLING CONFUSION

The price-bundling issue has come up in the courts more frequently than the aftermarket issue and therefore has created greater potential for liability, said Herbert Hovenkamp, an antitrust professor at University of Iowa College of Law.

"The courts have been all over the place on bundling," Hovenkamp said.

Sheller told the panel that the line between the legal "bundling" of products and the illegal "tying" of products has been blurred.

In bundling, a seller will offer a discounted price on the sale of two different products together, while in tying the seller requires the purchase of one product in order to get another product.

Much of the confusion stems from the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals' 2003 decision in LePage's v. 3M, nos. 00-1368, 00-1473, in which 3M Co. was found to have violated Section 2 by bundling its transparent tape with other products.

The decision "didn't leave a clear standard," Sheller said. "Plaintiffs lawyers will try to take advantage of it."

The key questions are: What legal test is there for determining when bundled pricing violates antitrust law? And in which market situations would it apply?, Stern said.

He suggested to the panel that perhaps bundling shouldn't be considered problematic in markets where sellers engage in competitive bidding or negotiations.

Lawmakers Take Aim At Gas Price Gouging (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 1, 2007

Although gasoline prices have dropped sharply from last summer, 79 lawmakers sought to send a message Wednesday, introducing a bill that would impose stiff penalties on oil and gas companies for price gouging.

With prices at the pump rebounding in recent weeks, Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said he's worried "this summer prices may once again exceed $3 a gallon."

The bill introduced by Stupak and 78 other members of the House would establish the first federal law against price gouging by oil and gas companies, imposing criminal penalties and fines of up to $150 million for corporations and $2 million on individuals.

The House passed a similar bill last year, but it died in the Senate.

The Federal Trade Commission would be given authority to investigate price gouging in the sale of crude oil, home heating oil, propane and natural gas.

"The FTC has never brought a gas price gouging case to court," said Stupak.

In fact, the agency has no authority to do so since there is no federal energy price gouging law. FTC investigations into crude oil or gasoline pricing have focused on whether companies have colluded in violation of antitrust laws.

Last year, FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said a federal law against oil company price gouging would be difficult to enforce and could hurt consumers by causing fuel shortages.

She said price gouging is difficult to define and courts have refused to address the question of what is a "reasonable" price in a free market. She maintained it may be difficult to determine what price hikes are legitimate.

Twenty-nine states have price gouging statutes, but they vary widely and some go into effect only in an emergency.

Retail gasoline prices have increased 13 cents a gallon on average nationwide in the past two weeks as the price of crude oil also has been rising. The oil industry has repeatedly disputed allegations of price gouging, saying prices at the pump reflect supply and demand, and mostly the cost of crude oil.

Genworth Financial Unit Gets 2 Subpoenas (MRKTWTCH)

DOJ_NMG_0138312

By Antonie Boessenkool

Market Watch, March 1, 2007

Genworth Financial Inc. disclosed Wednesday that a subsidiary received two subpoenas in November related to probes into the sale of guaranteed investment contracts to municipalities.

The subpoenas, a grand jury subpoena from the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Justice Department and a subpoena from the Securities and Exchange Commission, require the unit to turn over information related to investigations into alleged bid-rigging involving the sale of the investment contracts, according to Genworth's annual report filed with the SEC.

Genworth said it doesn't issue these contracts to municipalities. But the insurance company said that from January 2004 to December 2006, the subsidiary provided management and administrative services to a third party that does issue the contracts to municipalities.

Genworth said it plans to cooperate fully with the investigations.

Terex Gets Subpoenas From Justice Department On Equipment Pricing (MRKTWTCH)

By Patricia Kowsmann

Market Watch, March 1, 2007

Terex Corp. disclosed Wednesday that it received subpoenas from the U.S. Department of Justice over some equipment pricing.

In its annual report filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Westport, Conn., the manufacturer said the subpoenas relate to the DOJ's investigation into pricing practices in the rock crushing and screening equipment industry.

Terex said it cooperating fully with the investigation. It didn't provide further information.

Shares of the company closed Wednesday at $65.88, up 78 cents.

Marks & Spencer's Rose Is Considering Sainsbury Bid (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Neil Craven And Angharad Couch

Bloomberg, March 1, 2007

Feb. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Marks & Spencer Group Plc Chief Executive Officer Stuart Rose said he's considering bidding for J Sainsbury Plc, Britain's third-biggest supermarket chain.

Rose, who runs the U.K.'s largest clothing retailer, said he was speaking to customers about an offer for Sainsbury, which has a market value of 8.8 billion pounds ($17 billion). ``You do get quite an interesting response," he said in a presentation to a London conference held by Retail Week magazine today.

His remarks follow three weeks of speculation that Marks may seek to buy Sainsbury to create a retailer with more than 1,000 outlets. An offer may spark a bidding war with CVC Capital Partners Ltd., Blackstone Group LP and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., which said Feb. 2 they were considering an offer for Sainsbury in what would be Europe's biggest buyout.

``Assets like this don't come on the market very often," Rose said today. ``The company is effectively in play. Your shareholders would think you were an idiot if you didn't consider it. Watch this space."

Marks said in an e-mailed statement following Rose's remarks that its board had considered bidding for Sainsbury and didn't intend to make an offer ``at this time." The retailer said it reserved the right to announce a bid or possible bid within the next six months if Sainsbury's board recommends an offer or if a ``firm" approach by the CVC group or another suitor is made.

Property Partner

Sainsbury shares have surged 15 percent since the private- equity companies said they were interested in the retailer. Spokeswoman Pip Wood declined to comment to Bloomberg today.

For a transaction to work, Marks would need a partner to buy Sainsbury's property, enabling the company to acquire the operating grocery business relatively cheaply, Numis Securities' Steve Davies has said. Marks might achieve 300 million pounds of cost savings from a deal, according to Davies, who estimates Sainsbury's property is worth 7.5 billion pounds.

Sainsbury Chief Executive Officer Justin King has cut prices and added fresh food to halt three years of declining profit and stem a loss of market share to larger rival Tesco Plc, which has more than 3,000 U.K. outlets.

DOJ_NMG_0138313

London-based Marks & Spencer is 18 months into a recovery that followed two years of declining same-store sales. Rose has also expanded his company's range of fresh food, as well as commissioned renovated stores and revamped women's fashions.

`Glass of Wine'

``Stuart Rose has got to think where the next leg of his growth is going to come from," Chris Gower, an analyst at Man Securities in London, said today. ``It's a good strategic fit. They have a fairly similar customer base as Sainsbury, and a fairly strong brand in the middle market."

Marks & Spencer would also have to overcome hurdles from antitrust regulators if it were to buy Sainsbury, analysts including Gower have said. William Morrison Supermarkets Plc, which bought Safeway Plc in 2004 to become Britain's fourth-largest food retailer, was forced by regulators to sell stores.

``It's one thing talking about something over a glass of wine," Rose said today of a possible bid. ``It's another thing going down that road."

Combination Risks

Some analysts have said a combination between the two brands could be risky. The different product offerings and images may alienate customers, Deutsche Bank AG's James Collins said in a Feb. 22 report to investors. Sainsbury offers a full food range at competitive prices, while Marks's food is limited and highly priced, he said.

``Marks & Spencer shoppers might feel their brand would be cheapened," he wrote. ``Sainsbury shoppers would be quick to accuse it of becoming too expensive whenever it pushed through any price rises."

Marks & Spencer, which owns more than 400 stores across the U.K., has added stand-alone food outlets known as Simply Food and delicatessen bars and cafes in other stores. Food makes up about 50 percent of the company's total sales.

Marks controls 11 percent of the U.K. clothing market, with Wal-Mart Stores Inc.'s Asda in second place at 8.2 percent, followed by Tesco at 8.1 percent, according to Taylor Nelson Sofres Plc. Sainsbury's share is about 1 percent.

A takeover of Sainsbury by private equity companies would probably top the 11.8 billion-euro acquisition of Danish phone company TDC A/S in November 2005, currently the biggest European private-equity purchase. It would also be the first buyout of a company in Britain's benchmark FTSE-100 index.

Marks & Spencer held internal talks about a possible bid for Sainsbury, London's Times newspaper reported Feb. 7, citing unidentified people within the retailer. The Sunday Telegraph newspaper said Feb. 18 Marks had discussed jointly bidding with funds backed by the Persian Gulf state of Qatar.

Marks shares fell less than 0.1 percent to 675 pence today, giving the company a value of 11.5 billion pounds. Sainsbury shares fell 6.25 pence, or 1.2 percent, to 511.25 pence.

A&P Parent Negotiates To Buy Pathmark (MRKTWTCH)

By Angela Moore, Marketwatch

Market Watch, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK (MarketWatch) -- Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. said it is negotiating to acquire smaller rival Pathmark Stores Inc., as A&P looks to expand its footprint in the competitive supermarket industry.

Under the terms of the proposed deal, announced Tuesday, Pathmark shareholders would receive $12.50 a share in cash and stock.

Shares of both companies fell in midday trading Wednesday, after moving sharply higher ahead of the announcement. Pathmark shares were down 2% at $11.71, while A&P saw its shares drop 3.4% to $32.03.

The Montvale, N.J., company , which operates A&P, Waldbaum's and Food Emporium, said no final agreement has been reached. The sale would require shareholder and regulatory approvals, including federal and state antitrust clearances.

"We have long held that consolidation in the market was necessary and that Pathmark and A&P made the most logical choice for a combination," Bear Stearns analyst Westcott Rochette wrote in a note to clients, after raising the year-end price target on A&P to $40.

DOJ_NMG_0138314

Based on the number of shares outstanding when Pathmark reported its third-quarter results, the deal is valued at about $651 million.

Goldman Sachs analyst John Heinbockel said the proposed deal makes sense, but warned against too much optimism.

"We continue to believe that the combination, while likely to unlock significant cost take-out synergies, carries certain risks," Heinbockel said. "These would include systems conversions, banner changes, and the execution of a much-needed, stepped-up capital program."

News of the negotiations comes as grocery stores are struggling to compete with high-end specialty operators, including Whole Foods Markets Inc. , Trader Joe's and Wegman's, as well as discount giants such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. Last week, Wild Oats Markets Inc. agreed to be acquired by larger rival Whole Foods. See archived story.

The grocery store category is also highly competitive, and rivals such as Safeway Inc. and Kroger Co.have been remodeling and updating stores.

Pathmark, Carteret, N.J., operates 141 supermarkets, mostly in the New York, New Jersey and Philadelphia metropolitan areas. A&P operates 410 stores in nine states.

Ron Burkle's investment vehicle, Yucaipa Cos., holds a large stake in Pathmark, as well as an 18% stake in Wild Oats. Before the Whole Foods and Wild Oats deal was announced last week, there had been market talk that Pathmark and Wild Oats might merge.

Oracle Deal For Hyperion Is Expected (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Michael J. De La Merced

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

Oracle is near a deal to acquire Hyperion Solutions, which makes software that allows corporations to analyze and track their performance, for more than $3.1 billion, according to people briefed on the deal.

The acquisition is expected to be announced as early as today, these people said.

The deal would be the latest trophy in a lengthy string of acquisitions by Oracle, the database software giant that has been struggling to grow from within.

In December, Oracle posted strong earnings growth for its second fiscal quarter, but its growth in license sales disappointed investors. The company said at the time that it had failed to close some crucial licensing deals during the quarter. License sales rose 28 percent in the quarter, but that was down from 80 percent growth in the previous quarter.

Exact terms of the deal could not be learned last night.

Shares of Hyperion slipped 25 cents yesterday in regular trading, to $42.84, giving it a market value of about $2.5 billion. Oracle shares closed at $16.43, up 14 cents. Representatives for Oracle, which is based in Redwood City, Calif., and Hyperion, with headquarters in Santa Clara, Calif., could not be reached for comment.

Oracle has long been known as one of the most aggressive acquirers of technology companies.

Led by Lawrence J. Ellison, who sees acquisitions as a tool for growth, the company has at times seemed on the verge of gobbling nearly every rival in the business software market. In the last three years, Oracle spent more than $20 billion on acquisitions, including buying two of its most formidable competitors, PeopleSoft and Siebel.

PeopleSoft, the company Oracle fought over for nearly two years, was its most notable deal.

In December 2004, after a battle for control that grew nasty, Oracle finally acquired PeopleSoft for about $10.3 billion, becoming the second-largest maker of business-management software.

The day after completing the deal, Oracle fired four top officers of PeopleSoft.

Since that deal, Oracle’s appetite has been unsatiated. In 2005, the company bought a stake in I-flex Solutions, a maker of financial software based in Mumbai, India, for a reported $909 million.

Within the last year, Oracle has struck a series of deals, including a $5.9 billion acquisition of Siebel Systems and a $440 million purchase of Stellent last year.

Hyperion would be one of the last pieces to complete Oracle’s strategy. Founded in 1981 as IMRS, Hyperion has grown into one of the biggest makers of business analysis software through its Hyperion System 9 suite.

DOJ_NMG_0138315

For the 2006 fiscal year, the company reported $765 million in revenue.

Hyperion itself has grown through a series of deals, notably a 1998 merger with Arbor Software that brought the popular Essbase database software program into its fold.

Hyperion has long been speculated about as a merger partner with Business Objects, another business analysis software maker, according to analysts.

Indeed, the two companies held talks this year, but those negotiations collapsed over price and other issues, people briefed on them said.

Oracle has talked to half a dozen companies recently about acquiring them, according to people familiar with those talks. Hyperion has long been on that list.

Last year, The Mercury News in San Jose ranked Hyperion's executive chairman, Jeffrey R. Rodek, as No. 49 among the highest-paid executives in Silicon Valley.

Mr. Rodek, who became chairman and chief executive in 1999 and executive chairman in 2004, received $11.01 million in compensation in 2005, including salary and stock options.

Record Labels Go After USC Downloaders (LAT)

By Dawn C. Chmielewski And Jim Puzzanghera, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

If they don't quit illegally downloading music, some USC students may end up having to fight on … in court.

The record industry's main trade group said Wednesday that it was mailing letters to 20 of the school's students whom it had identified as bootleggers.

The letters warn that an expensive lesson awaits if the students don't stop the practice. Settle, the dispatches say, or be sued.

The mailings are part of a stepped-up legal fight by the Recording Industry Assn. of America against music downloading amid indications of a dramatic increase in the number of songs exchanged illegally via the Internet.

The association said that overall it was sending 400 warning letters to students at 13 universities and that it expected to sue several thousand students.

"We'd rather not be doing these lawsuits … but the fact remains that the college environment is one that has rampant piracy," said association Chairman Mitch Bainwol.

Omar Riza, 21, a USC student from Aliso Viejo, said a friend of his was one of more than two dozen USC students sued by the trade group in 2005 for using file-sharing site i2hub. The industry demanded $21,000 in compensation for the downloaded songs, but later reduced that amount to $3,000, Riza said.

"This is an intellectual property issue," Riza said. "This isn't a crime of murder."

But others, such as Christina Carey, 19, believe that the industry has the right to go after students who illegally download.

"They're getting robbed," said Carey.

She said she never illegally downloaded music, but acknowledged there was a thin line between sharing and pirating. Carey makes CDs for friends, she said, but some of them won't accept copies of CDs even as gifts.

The mailings, which the industry calls "pre-litigation settlement letters," are being sent to each student's school. They warn that a suit might be filed against one of the school's students or employees and asks that the letter be immediately forwarded.

The student or employee then can settle for a smaller payment than the industry would seek in a lawsuit. The association says it will continue sending out 400 letters a month to universities where illegal downloading occurs on the schools' computer systems.

"We heard often from those who were caught in a lawsuit they wanted a way to settle earlier and wanted a way to avoid having anything part of a record in federal court," said Steven Marks, the industry group's general counsel.

The settlements would require the person to agree not to illegally download music in the future and pay an undisclosed amount that is "substantially less than people are paying now," Marks said.

DOJ_NMG_0138316

USC received an e-mail Wednesday from the the trade group about the notices but hasn't received any yet, university counsel Kelly Bendell said.

In the past the industry would issue a subpoena to USC seeking to learn the name of the person corresponding with the numeric Internet address of a suspected downloader, Bendell said. The school would notify the student that it had received a subpoena, and alert the student that he or she could file a motion seeking to quash it. Otherwise, the school would disclose the person's name.

Now, it appears that the industry wants the school to notify the student that it would like to negotiate a settlement before a suit is filed, Bendell said.

"I don't know yet how we'll handle that," said Bendell. "Most likely, we would go ahead and notify the student. Obviously, we would not turn over their names without receiving a subpoena."

Other universities getting the letters include Arizona State, Syracuse, Nebraska, Tennessee, Texas and Massachusetts.

Students Face RIAA Lawsuits (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

LOS ANGELES -- The recording industry's trade group said Wednesday it will give hundreds of college students suspected of illegally sharing music online a chance to reach settlements before being sued for copyright infringement.

The move comes as the industry seeks to stamp out what it is says is rampant music piracy on campuses.

The Recording Industry Association of America said it was sending letters offering discounted settlements to 400 computer users at 13 universities. The group intends to send hundreds of such pre-litigation letters to university computer users every month.

"The theft of music remains unacceptably high and undermines the industry's ability to invest in new music," said Mitch Bainwol, chairman and CEO of the association. "This is especially the case on college campuses."

The letters targeted students at Arizona State University, Marshall University, North Carolina State University, North Dakota State University, Northern Illinois University, Ohio University, Syracuse University, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, University of Nebraska, Lincoln, University of South Florida, University of Southern California, University of Tennessee, Knoxville, and University of Texas, Austin.

Privately Held New York, Boston Power Producers Merge (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Jim Polson

Bloomberg, March 1, 2007

Feb. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Astoria Generating Co. and EBG Holdings, closely held owners of power plants in New York City and Boston, said they will merge in a move designed to capitalize on rising regional power demand and limited supply.

The newly formed entity, U.S. Power Generating Co., will be run from New York by Astoria Chief Executive Officer Jacob Worenklein, the companies said today. Hedge funds that own EBG will get 54 percent of the closely held company. Astoria owners, including Madison Dearborn Partners LP and the Hunt Oil family, will get 46 percent. Other details of the agreement weren't disclosed.

The combined value of the plants held by the two companies may be worth $4.25 billion to $5 billion, analysts said. Combined output will be about 5,000 megawatts.

``You've got two great, growing and constrained metropolitan areas, so they are both very attractive generation markets," said Barry Sullivan, vice chairman of New York-based K Road Power, which has run the Boston plants since Dec. 31, 2005. ``This gives a bigger platform to operate both sets of assets and others we'd hope that will become available over time."

Astoria Generating's three plants supply 20 percent of New York City's power supply and EBG's five plants meet half the electricity needs of Boston, the companies said. U.S. Power Generating expects to benefit from tariffs regulators plan to impose on power customers to encourage costly construction of plants and power lines as both metropolitan areas grow. Power demand in New York and Boston probably will rise 2 percent a year, Sullivan said.

Regional Demand Growth

DOJ_NMG_0138317

Rising electricity demand and planned plant retirements may leave the New York City area short of generating capacity needed to meet demand on the hottest days as early as next year, the New York Independent System Operator, which runs the state's power grid, said in August.

The deal may be worth $4.25 billion to $4.5 billion based on recent power plant sales, said Steve Thumb, principal at Energy Ventures Analysis Inc. in Arlington, Virginia, a consultant to companies that buy and sell power plants.

U.S. Power valued the deal at $5 billion, or $1,000 a kilowatt of capacity. That would be among the highest prices paid for gas-fueled plants with contracts that lock in fuel costs and power sales, said Jeff Bodington, Chief Executive Officer at Bodington & Co., a San Francisco-based investment bank that specializes in power-plant deals.

Contract details on the plants will not be released, Sullivan said.

Little Golden Apples

``There's an argument to put these in the top half by value because they are little golden apples," Thumb said. ``You have a pretty good market up there because they use the damn plants unlike other areas where they were overbuilt. And those cities are so landlocked those plants will be there forever. They're not going to be replaced by the next new technology."

The combination needs approval of EBG shareholders, the New York Public Service Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and federal antitrust approval, Sullivan said. The deal is expected to close by midyear, Sullivan said.

Credit Suisse Group advised Astoria and Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. advised EBG.

Days After TXU Deal

The merger comes two days after TXU Corp., the largest electricity supplier in Texas, agreed to be purchased by a private investor group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Texas Pacific Group for $45 billion, a record leveraged buyout.

Astoria owns Astoria Generation Station, Gowanus Gas Turbine Facility and Narrows Gas Turbine Facility, divested by utility owner Consolidated Edison Inc. under a state law opening power markets to competition and purchased from Reliant Energy Inc. in 2005.

EBG owns Boston-area plants that Chicago-based Exelon Corp. handed over to banks in 2004 after problems with their completion and financing. Sithe Energies Inc. had begun the projects before it was purchased, by Exelon.

``Hedge funds began to take pieces of the equity and we ultimately made a deal to buy a minority piece and the management, Sullivan said.

EBG has 75 shareholders, and 15 of those would control 75 percent of the company, he said. He declined to name EGB's owners.

Antitrust Probe For ECB Settlement Platform (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

A controversial plan by the European Central Bank to set up and operate a new system for settling share and bond trades in the European Union will come under close scrutiny by the region's top antitrust watchdog.

In an unusual move that adds to the uncertainty surrounding the new regime, the European Commission told EU finance ministers this month that the central bank was not exempt from antitrust laws.

It also told them that the Commission's competition department would carefully examine the so-called Target 2 Securities system - a process that could delay the introduction of the new platform.

Though the Commission does not have concrete concerns at this stage, a probe would most likely focus on whether the ECB system constituted a restrictive business practice or an abuse of monopoly power in violation of EU antitrust rules.

"Economic activities are subject to competition law irrespective of whether they are undertaken by private companies or by public authorities and other institutions," the spokesman for Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, said. "We have informed the financial services committee [the body that prepares meetings of EU finance ministers] that the ECB is not exempt from competition rules."

He added: "The ECB proposal has not been finalised, and we would not necessarily find the system incompatible with EU competition rules. It could turn out to be pro-competitive. But we would want to examine it carefully."

DOJ_NMG_0138318

The Frankfurt-based central bank is already facing criticism for its proposal to set up and operate a system that would compete directly with private-sector settlement providers such as Euroclear and Clearstream.

The ECB's regime is intended to provide a central platform for settling trades in Euro-denominated securities. The bank argues that it would be cheaper and easier to use than the patchwork of different national settlement systems.

But in a move that highlighted growing concern about the project's implications for Europe's capital market, EU finance ministers on Wednesday called on the bank to provide more information on the expected costs and benefits of the project.

Though the ECB does not need the governments' approval to move ahead with Target 2 Securities, it confirmed on Wednesday that it would conduct further work on the scheme and report back to ministers. The bank had originally hoped to reach a final decision on the system next month - a target date it has now abandoned.

Ms Kroes' intention to examine the regime's compatibility with antitrust rules may turn out to sit uncomfortably with the Commission's general support for a more integrated clearing and settlement regime in the EU. Brussels last year published a report that identified the high cost of cross-border clearing and settlement as a crucial obstacle for the creation of more integrated European capital market.

Stock exchanges and settlement providers reacted by agreeing to make their regimes work together more smoothly and to "unbundle" clearing and settlement services from other activities such as trading.

EU Clears BAWAG Sale To Cerberus Group (AP)

EU Clears Sale of Austria's Troubled BAWAG Bank to Cerberus-Led Group

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- EU regulators on Wednesday cleared the sale of Austria's BAWAG, the troubled bank linked to collapsed commodities broker Refco, to a consortium headed by private equity fund Cerberus Capital Management.

The European Commission automatically cleared the deal after identifying no antitrust problems and receiving no complaints from rivals within a deadline of 25 working days.

Cerberus and others agreed in December to pay 3.2 billion euros ($4.23 billion) for the bank, Austria's fifth largest.

The bank's current owner, trade union federation OeGB, will get 2.6 billion euros ($3.44 billion) of that with the rest serving as an injection of capital for BAWAG P.S.K.

The consortium -- which includes Wuestenrot, the Austrian branch of Assicurazioni Generali SpA, Oesterreichische Post and a small group of industrialists linked to Hannes Androsch, a former Austrian finance minister -- plans to expand the bank throughout Europe.

BAWAG, formally known as the Bank Fuer Arbeit und Wirtschaft AG, lost more than a billion dollars in soured currency speculation deals in the Caribbean and has been under investigation for loaning Phillip Bennet, the former CEO of Refco Inc., several hundred million dollars just before the brokerage filed for bankruptcy protection last year.

It agreed in June to pay at least 530 million euros ($675 million) to avoid prosecution and to settle bankruptcy claims after admitting its role in Refco's collapse.

In October, the Vienna public prosecutor's office said it had filed charges against nine people connected to BAWAG, including Helmut Elsner and Johann Zwettler, both former heads of the bank, as well as investment banker Wolfgang Floettl and Robert Reiter, a former auditor.

Broadcom V. Qualcomm Battles Wage On (OCR)

By John Gittelsohn, The Orange County Register

Orange County (CA) Register, March 1, 2007

The semiconductor giants settled four patent disputes out of court last week, but are far from resolving other property battles, attorneys for both companies said in interviews with the Orange County Register on Tuesday.

Broadcom Corp. and Qualcomm Inc. settled four patent disputes out of court last week, but the Southern California semiconductor giants are far from resolving their antitrust and intellectual property battles, attorneys for both companies said in interviews with the Orange County Register on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0138319

"That was just a piecemeal separate peace," said Lou Lupin, executive vice president and general counsel for Qualcomm, the San Diego telecom chipmaker.

Broadcom and Qualcomm still have five outstanding patent infringement cases and three antitrust actions in U.S. federal courts, the European Community and South Korea. One of the next cases is scheduled for opening arguments in federal court in Santa Ana in May.

In addition, Broadcom still has 12 patent disputes against Qualcomm, and Qualcomm still has six against Broadcom, said David Rosmann, Broadcom's vice president for intellectual property litigation. "It's just a paring down," he said.

Irvine-based Broadcom launched the legal war in 2005 amid frustration over negotiating licensing agreements for technology in 3G or WCDMA mobile phones, a new generation of phones that perform multiple tasks such as transmitting high speed video. Qualcomm pioneered the technology that became the industry standard.

In its antitrust cases, Broadcom argues that Qualcomm wants to monopolize the next generation of mobile phones by charging excessive royalties. Broadcom's attorneys say Qualcomm employed the same tactic to control more than 90 percent of the chips in the current generation of mobile phones used by such companies as AT&T, Sprint and Verizon.

"Broadcom didn't like the way (the royalty negotiation) was going so it instituted litigation and Qualcomm responded with litigation of its own," Lupin said.

In its patent-infringement cases, Broadcom argues that Qualcomm has refused to pay for using its technology. In its countersuits, Qualcomm contends that Broadcom is trying to enter a field plowed by Qualcomm without paying a fair price.

Rosmann noted that Broadcom prevailed over Qualcomm in a U.S. International Trade Commission patent infringement ruling and a patent infringement case in U.S. District Court in San Diego.

"We're 2-0," he said.

Qualcomm has set aside $200 million for all of its litigation in 2007. Broadcom's attorneys declined to specify the cost of litigation. Qualcomm also hired former U.S. attorney Carol Lam to head up its litigation process against Broadcom and cell phone maker Nokia, which has also filed separate antitrust claims against Qualcomm.

"The litigation is all about posturing for market position," Lupin said. "I would not characterize it as par for the course. We have 140 to 150 licensing agreements, almost all without litigation. This is the exception – a rare exception – to the rule."

Mark Nelson, a Washington, D.C., attorney who represents Broadcom in its antitrust cases, said a lot of companies do business with Qualcomm because they have no choice.

"It's not surprising companies feel compelled to deal with a monopolist, he said. "It doesn't mean they're satisfied."

By challenging Qualcomm, Broadcom's attorneys said, other companies – and consumers – will have more choice in their future phones.

Why Big Isn't Bad (WSJ)

By Cécile Philippe

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The world's No. 1 chipmaker, Intel, has been the target of a series of antitrust probes and lawsuits around the globe. Among them is a five-year investigation by the European Commission that has included raids on the company's European offices and may yet lead to formal legal proceedings. Japan's Fair Trade Commission has already condemned Intel for "unfair" practices and urged it to change its ways. Authorities in South Korea and the U.S. are also probing the California-based company.

The concomitant nature of these cases owes nothing to serendipity. They were all triggered following antitrust complaints filed by Intel's arch-rival, Advanced Micro Devices Inc. AMD alleges that Intel's practice of inviting its major customers to sign exclusive contracts in exchange for significant rebates and discounts is anticompetitive. In the European Commission, AMD has an audience that has been sympathetic to such accusations before, as in the cases of the pharmaceutical firm Hoffmann-Roche in 1979 or the tire manufacturer Michelin in 2003.

These commercial tactics are actually common practice. Intel's case, however, is allegedly different in that the firm enjoys a "dominant position" in the market for microprocessors, with 80% of sales by unit volume. It is because of this "dominant" status that competition regulators might regard Intel's practices with suspicion and ordain that it end them.

The legal premise is that a company with such a large market share can use its size to put competitors out of business, perhaps by lowering its prices to a point at which they cannot compete, and then foist higher prices upon helpless customers. The soundness of this theory is debatable even on philosophical grounds -- if the new monopolist suddenly raises prices, why would its old competitors not get back into the game? -- but there is empirical evidence that Intel's practices have not made it immune to competition.

Sure, Intel has gained ground in Japan thanks in part to the discount and rebate practices in began there in 2002. Its market share there rose to 89% in 2004 from 76% a year earlier. World-wide, though, Intel is losing ground to AMD, whose market share grew to 25.3% at the end of 2006, compared with 23.3% in 2005. The company announced that it would have to reduce its global staff by 10,000 workers by the middle of this year.

In any case, there's an inherent contradiction in this "big is bad" application of competition law. Firms are allowed to use certain practices in order to grow their business and reach the top of their industry. But then, suddenly, these practices become illegal once their goal has been achieved. How can this be right? From an economic point of view, the intensity of competition should not be measured by market share alone. The most important thing is to see that entry into the market remains free -- that is, that regulatory measures do not impede companies from joining the fray.

Intel has chosen to engage in drastic price cuts in order to win more business, and in some cases it has conditioned these price cuts on exclusivity agreements. However, it's important to note that a customer won't agree to such arrangements unless it sees a benefit for itself as well as Intel. The purchasing firm's decision is partly a function of competing offers, but in the end it will opt for those products that it expects to be attractive to its own consumers. This is certainly the reason why, despite Intel's offers and market dominance, the world's leading PC distributor, Dell, recently ended a 7-year-old exclusive contract with Intel, deciding instead to to distribute AMD's opteron chip. Moreover, server makers Hewlett-Packard, Sun and IBM, among others, increasingly are rolling out new products with AMD, not Intel, inside. At the end of the day, the success of Intel or AMD depends on their ability to meet the needs and expectations of their customers, whether they favor innovative products or cheaper products.

The market for microprocessors is regarded as one of the most dynamic in the economy. For several decades, it has been characterized by dazzling innovations and no less spectacular price cuts. Today's chips can process up to 50 billion instructions per second; just a decade ago, they could handle only 500. (The evolution for the number of transistors inside has been similar.) All this has occurred even though there are only two major players on the stage today.

In weighing Intel's business model and practices, it is vital that regulators leave room for the free play of competition and, even more important, let the market judge the management decisions of the different players in a given industry. There is no guarantee that Intel's strategy will prove to be the best one, especially if AMD or other firms provide better value to consumers. What is anticompetitive is the worrying trend of companies' asking regulators to level the playing field, rather than trying to win in the marketplace.

Lawsuit Aims To Block 2nd Marina At Lake Pleasant (AZREP)

By Scott Wong, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, March 1, 2007

The owner of the lone marina at Lake Pleasant sued two high-ranking federal officials in U.S. District Court Tuesday in an effort to halt construction of a new marina at the far north Peoria lake.

Paradise Valley businessman David Maule-Ffinch and his Pensus Group filed suit against Robert W. Johnson, commissioner of the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation, and Dirk Kempthorne, secretary of the U.S. Department of the Interior.

DOJ_NMG_0138321

The lawsuit came on the same day the $20 million marina cleared its largest bureaucratic hurdle. Reclamation officials on Tuesday said they determined Scorpion Bay Marina & Yacht Harbor would have no significant impact on the environment and that the agency would not undertake a complete environmental review of the project.

advertisement

In his 13-page suit, Maule-Ffinch claimed that Reclamation — the arm of the Interior Department that owns Lake Pleasant and other waterways — broke federal law when it failed to require that Maricopa County conduct a competitive bidding process for the construction and management of the new marina.

A provision in a 2002 request for proposal banned Pensus and other potential bidders that had any business interests next to or around Lake Pleasant Regional Park, which the county manages.

"The Bureau of Reclamation has an independent duty to make sure a federal asset is given out to a profit-making organization who has complied with all of the rules," Andrew Federhar, an attorney for Maule-Ffinch and Pensus, said Wednesday. "We don't believe (Reclamation) ensured this federal asset is being appropriately used."

Maule-Ffinch filed a similar suit last April in Maricopa County Superior Court against the county and Lake Pleasant Marina Partners, a limited liability group of investors in the project. The court decided not to hear the case; neither did the state appellate court upon appeal.

Bruce Ellis, who heads the Reclamation division that issued a draft environmental review of Scorpion Bay, said he had no comment about the federal suit. A spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice said the agency has not been served and would not have any comment until it reviews the matter.

The planned Scorpion Bay Marina would be constructed on about 164 acres of land on the western shore of Lake Pleasant Regional Park. It would feature 800 wet slips, parking for 800 vehicles, a boating supply store, and a boat launch ramp, among other amenities.

Coal-fired Power Plant Gets Go-ahead (AAS)

By Asher Price, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin American-Statesman, March 1, 2007

Federal judge OKs a settlement between government and companies for generator at Rockdale smelter.

A long-challenged Central Texas coal-fired power plant appeared to get a green light for construction from a federal judge Tuesday.

The plant had been held up by legal challenges from environmental groups and, for a period, the federal Department of Justice.

But in November, the federal government offered a settlement that would allow Alcoa Inc. and TXU Corp. to use an old permit at the site instead of having to apply for a new, stricter permit.

The settlement offer, approved by U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks in Austin late Tuesday, eases a deal between the aluminum giant and the state's largest energy company for control of the plant, which powers an aluminum smelting operation in Rockdale, about 60 miles northeast of Austin.

The plant's new unit, known as Sandow 5, is one of three coal-fired units TXU proposes to build. Plans for eight other units were withdrawn after the company was approached in a $45 billion buyout deal last week.

The unit, slated to come online in 2009, will have 581 megawatts of capacity, or enough to power 300,000 homes.

TXU said it will start construction immediately. Once the new unit is operational, the plant will employ about 1,370 people, the company said.

Citizens and environmental groups accused Alcoa in a lawsuit of illegally releasing more than 1 million tons of air pollution from the plant during a 17-year period.

As part of the settlement reached in 2003, Alcoa was required to pay a $1.5 million fine, spend $2.5 million on environmental mitigation projects in Central Texas and replace its three coal-powered generating units at the plant with a single cleaner-burning, coal-powered unit by 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0138322

But Alcoa was unable to find a partner to build the generator until TXU stepped forward last year.

To sweeten the deal for TXU, Alcoa has tried to loosen the emissions controls in the 2003 settlement and continued operating the plant under the company's existing air permit.

Environmentalists had argued that because the new plant won't be complete by the 2007 deadline, the judge should require a stricter air permit.

Under the new settlement, Alcoa will pay the U.S. government $859,000 in penalties from the 2003 settlement, and Alcoa and TXU Sandow are supposed to cut emission rates for nitrogen oxide by 20 percent from the rate called for in the 2003 settlement.

The judge found arguments by the citizens groups that the order would relax pollution controls to be "simply incorrect."

At least one group involved in the case said it was thinking of appealing the judgment.

Judge OKs Settlement For Central Texas Coal Plant (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, March 1, 2007

AUSTIN — A federal judge has approved a settlement between Alcoa, TXU and the U.S. Department of Justice that would allow TXU to build a new coal-fired power plant in Central Texas.

A spokeswoman said TXU will start construction as soon as possible on the plant at Alcoa's aluminum smelter in Rockdale, about 60 miles northeast of Austin. The new unit, known as Sandow 5, will replace three old coal-fired generators.

The Justice Department had joined environmental and citizen groups in challenging plans for the new plant. But the government came to terms with Alcoa and TXU in November, and on Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks approved the settlement.

The Rockdale plant is one of three Texas coal-fired units proposed by TXU. Private equity firms working to buy TXU said earlier this week that they would scrap plans for eight other proposed coal plants.

Opponents of the Rockdale plant had sued Alcoa alleging the company released illegal amounts of air pollution from the plant during a 17-year period.

Alcoa reached a settlement with the groups in 2003 that required Alcoa to pay fines, spend millions on environmental cleanup and replace its three coal units with a single cleaner unit by 2007.

Alcoa had trouble finding a partner to build the new generator. To help attract TXU, Alcoa has tried to loosen the emissions controls in the 2003 settlement and continued operating the plant under the company's existing air permit.

Environmentalists argued that the judge should require a stricter air permit because the plant won't be built by 2007.

Under the settlement, Alcoa won't have to apply for a new permit. But it must pay the U.S. government $859,000 in penalties from the 2003 settlement, and Alcoa and TXU are supposed to cut emission rates for nitrogen oxide by 20 percent from the rate called for in the 2003 settlement.

Jim Marston, regional director of plaintiff Environmental Defense, said he's had talks with the firms buying TXU about limiting sulfur dioxide emissions from the Sandow unit.

Marston said the groups have not decided whether to appeal the judge's ruling.

Group Should Return $25 Million, U.S. Audit Says (BLOOM)

By Neil Roland

Bloomberg, February 28, 2007

Feb. 28 (Bloomberg) -- An environmental group that sponsored national clean-water events with the Smithsonian Institution before shutting down over accounting irregularities should return $25 million in government grant funds, a U.S. audit said.

The nonprofit America's Clean Water Foundation, formed in 1989 with a board headed by then-Senators Edmund Muskie and Howard Baker, overstated costs on U.S. Environmental Protection Agency grants and failed to keep appropriate records, an audit by the EPA's inspector general said.

``This was a highly visible group with lax internal controls," EPA Grants Administrator Richard Kuhlman said in an interview today. ``There aren't many groups like this that go under, and this amount is by far the most we've considered trying to recover since I've been here."

The Washington-based foundation got three EPA grants for a total of $25.2 million since 1998, with most of the money for on-site environmental reviews of pork farms, the audit said.

Auditors recommended trying to recover the money unless the group reconstructed its accounting records. The foundation closed its doors last July when the EPA shut off funds because of the accounting problems.

``The vast majority of the money went to proper projects with a lot of environmental benefit," Kuhlman said. ``But it's difficult for us to provide funds to them when there are so many questions about how they're handling funds."

Closed Doors

The foundation failed for years to detect an employee's $500,000 embezzlement of its funds, Kuhlman said. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has been investigating the crime, he said. FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman declined to comment.

It also failed to document its expenses, didn't have its books audited for three years, and awarded all its contracts without competition among potential bidders, the audit said.

``The foundation did not comply with the financial and program management standards and the procurement standards promulgated" in federal regulations, according to the report made available Feb. 23.

America's Clean Water Foundation also violated conflict-of- interest rules by awarding a $50,000 contract without competition to the vice president of the board, the 32-page audit said.

The board member, Charles Grizzle, a Washington lobbyist who also was a fund-raiser for President George W. Bush's 2004 presidential campaign, said he didn't influence the award and recused himself from discussions of it. The contract was to set up a program for states to audit hog farms.

Books Not Audited

``I should have said, `You all find someone else to put this program together,'" Grizzle said in an interview today. ``Where it looks inappropriate, and I regret that, is that I don't recall filing a formal letter of recusal."

A lawyer for the group, Christopher Rissetto of the Reed Smith law firm in Washington, said he wouldn't discuss the audit findings because the EPA hasn't made a final decision on what to do about the recommendations.

``It's obvious we have different views," he said in an interview today. ``The public record is full of the foundation's fine" work.

Rissetto also declined to comment about the performance of the group's former president and executive director, Roberta H. Savage, who made $149,000 a year, according to filings with the Internal Revenue Service.

`Positive or Negative'

``I'm not going to say anything positive or negative about Roberta," he said. Savage couldn't be reached for comment and Rissetto declined to provide her phone number or address.

The EPA has until June to decide whether to pursue any of the funds, Kuhlman said. The agency is likely to forward the issue to the U.S. Department of the Treasury, which will decide whether to pursue retrieval of the $25.2 million or write it off. One question that Treasury officials might have to address is from whom it would seek to collect the money, he said.

Since 2003, when Kuhlman began his job, the largest previous amount of grant money that the EPA has tried to recover for rule violations was about $1 million, he said. Auditors recommended that the EPA try to recover all $25.2 million awarded by the agency.

EPA told the group last year that it wouldn't get any more money until it documented its expenses, Kuhlman said. When America's Clean Water Foundation didn't provide documentation, the agency halted funding, and the group shut down.

95 Percent of Revenue

The grants accounted for 95 percent of the group's revenue, Kuhlman said.

America's Clean Water Foundation, which had revenue of $6.9 million in 2003, according to filings with the IRS, sponsored national commemorations of the 20th and 30th anniversaries of the 1972 Clean Water Act.

It also joined with the Smithsonian to celebrate annual National Water Monitoring Days, which got about 75,000 Americans to test their local water in 2002 and participate in other programs, according to a U.S. State Department announcement the next year.

Savage later got the United Nations to join in celebrating a World Water Monitoring Day, which drew people from 35 countries in 2004, according to an EPA announcement. Then-EPA Administrator Mike Leavitt helped celebrate the event by speaking at a Smithsonian facility in the Washington area.

DOE Sets Ethanol-Fuel Effort (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Department of Energy has kicked off a technological horse race to see which among six companies can produce a transportation fuel that is an alternative to corn-based ethanol, in commercial quantities, at a cost of around $1 a gallon.

Companies successful in producing low-cost ethanol could have first crack at a new fuel market that offers a domestic alternative to gasoline. Until then, the agency says it will pony up as much as $385 million to help the competitors, but how much each company gets will be negotiated later, based on their progress.

"This effort is a big deal," said Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, who estimated that the companies will commit a total of at least $1.2 billion to their ventures.

Since Congress has been slow in appropriating the agency's budget, an additional prize, promised by a $2 billion loan-guarantee program, has yet to be established. Most of the six companies, which will make ethanol from materials such as wood chips, orange peels, corn stalks and municipal garbage, have also applied to participate in that effort.

Congress approved aiding makers of so-called cellulosic ethanol in the Energy Policy Act of 2005. Cellulosic ethanol is made by extracting and distilling sugars from the woody fibers of plants, rather than from corn kernels, which makes the process much more difficult. President Bush has since made the program part of his goal to introduce 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels into the transportation sector to lessen U.S. dependence on imported oil.

Currently the U.S. produces about six billion gallons of ethanol. Mr. Bodman estimated that corn-based production could increase to 12 to 15 billion gallons, but farm experts worry that soaring demand for corn by ethanol refineries will push food and meat prices up to politically unacceptable levels.

DOE scientists and officials will determine who gets what portion of the funding. One competitor is the agency's National Renewable Energy Laboratory. It is teamed up with Broin Cos., of Sioux Falls, S.D., which plans to use enzymes to make ethanol out of corncobs and corn stalks at a plant near Emmetsburg, Iowa. Another partner in the venture is DuPont Co.

The other selected companies are:

-- Abengoa Bioenergy, a St. Louis, Mo., affiliate of Abengoa SA, a Spanish conglomerate that is the leading ethanol producer in Europe. The company has selected a Colwich, Kan., site for a plant that would use enzymes to make ethanol from corn stalks and wheat straw.

-- Alico Inc., a producer of citrus products and minerals. It plans to build a facility near its headquarters at LaBelle, Fla., which will use heat and chemicals to produce ethanol from orange peels and wood wastes.

-- BlueFire Ethanol Inc., an Irvine, Calif., company that is teamed with Waste Management Inc., to make ethanol out of selected garbage from municipal landfills, using sulfuric acid and steam. The company's first facility will be at a landfill in Corona, Calif.

-- Iogen Biorefinery Partners LLC, an Arlington, Va., affiliate of Ottawa-based Iogen Corp. It is teamed with Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Royal Dutch Shell PLC to use an enzyme-based process to make ethanol from wheat and barley straw and other farm wastes at a site near Shelley, Idaho.

-- Range Fuels Inc., Broomfield, Colo., which has picked a site near Soperton, Ga., for a facility that will use heat and steam to make ethanol out of various forest wastes.

6 Get Grants From U.S. To Support Bio-Refineries (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0138325

By Alexei Barrionuevo

New York Times, March 1, 2007

Seeking to encourage motor fuel production from materials that are cheaper and more abundant than corn, the Energy Department said yesterday that it would provide up to $385 million in six bio-refinery projects that would produce cellulosic ethanol, a type of ethanol that can be made from nonfood crops and agricultural waste.

The awards, to be made over four years, are called for under the 2005 Energy Policy Act. They will advance President Bush's goals of making the cost of cellulosic ethanol competitive with gasoline by 2012 and of reducing America's gasoline consumption by 20 percent in 10 years, Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman said at a news conference in Washington.

Dozens of ethanol refineries that use corn are planned for construction over the next two years. But Mr. Bodman acknowledged yesterday that corn alone would not be enough to achieve the ambitious goal of taming what Mr. Bush has called America's "oil addiction."

Because of constraints on farmland and the need for corn in the food supply, corn-based ethanol can produce only up to 15 billion gallons of ethanol, less than half of the 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels the president set as a goal by 2017 in his State of the Union speech in January.

"Corn-based ethanol is already playing a key part in reducing our dependence on fossil fuels and mitigating the growth of greenhouse gases, but we cannot increase our use of corn grain indefinitely," Mr. Bodman said.

Ethanol made from corn has a small effect on greenhouse gases, but ethanol from cellulose cuts those gases sharply.

But cellulosic ethanol is still twice as expensive as corn-based ethanol, which has relied for many years on a 51-cent-a-gallon subsidy to be competitive with gasoline. For that reason, no company has yet to construct a commercial-scale cellulosic plant.

Mike Muston, executive vice president of Broin Companies, which won one of the awards, said Broin could produce cellulosic ethanol for $2.25 to $2.50 a gallon and expected to cut those costs to under $2 a gallon when it started its plant around 2010. Mr. Bodman said the long-range goal was to get costs down to $1 a gallon, which he said would put cellulosic ethanol in position to compete with "any technology in the world."

Yesterday's grants will help accelerate the nascent cellulosic industry, Mr. Muston said, allowing Broin, which is based in Sioux Falls, S.D., and its partner, DuPont, to push up construction on an expansion to its Emmetsburg, Iowa, plant by two to three years.

Lawrence J. Goldstein, an energy consultant and critic of corn-based ethanol, said the administration had no choice but to push hard to commercialize cellulosic ethanol. "They are throwing money where they ought to be throwing it because they know they can't get within shouting distance of their goal without a major, quick breakthrough in cellulosic," said Mr. Goldstein, a board member at the Energy Policy Research Foundation.

The awards will finance up to 40 percent of the projects, which are expected to total more than $1.2 billion. The projects, which are scattered from Florida to Kansas to California, aim to produce more than 120 million gallons of cellulosic ethanol a year.

The winning companies, in addition to Broin, are a Spanish company, Abengoa Bioenergy; Alico Inc., of LaBelle, Fla.; BlueFire Ethanol, based in Irvine, Calif.; the logen Corporation, of Canada; and Range Fuels, of Broomfield, Colo. Range Fuels is partly financed by Khosla Ventures, the Silicon Valley venture capital firm run by Vinod Khosla, an influential voice on ethanol in Washington.

The plants would use low-value materials like switch grass, wheat straw and wood chips.

Even with the new push by the Energy Department, Mr. Bodman said ethanol's future was not assured.

"We are unclear whether ethanol will be the winner," he said yesterday, referring to the search for a renewable energy source to replace petroleum. Bio-butanol, a crop-based fuel that is to be commercialized later this year by DuPont and the oil giant BP, "is an inherently better fuel," he said, because, unlike ethanol, it has as much energy for each gallon as gasoline does.

Bust Nets Drugs, $45 Million From Cartel (AP)

AP, March 1, 2007

SAN DIEGO — Dozens of people accused of working for a Mexican drug cartel were arrested Wednesday in a multistate bust that has netted more than $45 million in cash and tons of cocaine, heroin and marijuana, federal officials said.

At least some of the drugs were carried over the U.S.-Mexico border on a bridge made from sandbags partially submerged in the Colorado River outside of Yuma, Ariz., authorities said. All the narcotics were sneaked into the country through the porous Southwest border exploited by cartel kingpin Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum, they said.

The 20-month sting, code-named "Operation Imperial Emperor," so far has swept up 402 of the cartel's suspected lieutenants and foot soldiers, including 66 on Wednesday who were arrested in California, Arizona and Illinois.

"Today's operation is a serious blow to one of the largest and most significant trafficking organizations," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a news conference in San Diego.

Cazares-Gastellum, also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar, was indicted in the sting but remains in Mexico and was not arrested, officials said.

Authorities said the cartel employed U.S. citizens and Mexican nationals, who distributed the drugs in 23 states. They will face either federal or state charges.

Among the cache collected by the Drug Enforcement Administration were 27,229 pounds of marijuana; 9,512 pounds of cocaine; 705 pounds of methamphetamine; 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine, or "ice"; 11 pounds of heroin; $6.1 million in property and assets; and an estimated 100 weapons and 94 vehicles.

Authorities said the cartel shipped or drove metric tons of the drugs from Colombia and Venezuela to Mexico. From there, they were taken over the southwest border and broken down in Los Angeles, San Diego and other cities before being distributed nationwide.

The drugs were distributed in Nevada, Arizona, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Colorado, Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, Kentucky, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maryland, Texas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Illinois, Kansas, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, Washington and Oregon.

Multiagency Probe Nets Over 400 In Mexican Drug Ring (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

A long-term federal investigation into a Mexican drug-trafficking organization and its U.S.-based distribution cells has resulted in more than 400 arrests nationwide, including 66 who were taken into custody yesterday in California, Arizona, New York and Illinois.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said the multiagency probe known as "Operation Imperial Emperor" targeted the Mexico-based Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug cartel, which has been responsible for supplying multiton quantities of cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana monthly throughout the United States.

Mr. Gonzales said during a press conference in San Diego to announce the operation that the gang laundered millions of dollars of illicit profits.

"Today's actions deal a significant blow to the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug-trafficking organization," Mr. Gonzales said. "These arrests demonstrate what can be achieved when domestic and international law-enforcement partners team up against a common foe."

The 20-month probe, led by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, has netted $45.2 million in U.S. currency, 27,229 pounds of marijuana, 9,512 pounds of cocaine, 705 pounds of methamphetamine, 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine and 11 pounds of heroin, said DEA spokesman Rusty Payne.

The investigation also accounted for $6.1 million in property and assets, as well as 100 weapons and 94 vehicles, Mr. Payne said.

Federal or state charges were unsealed against 139 defendants in California, Arizona, Illinois and New York. With the 66 arrests yesterday, the total number of arrests during the course of the investigation rose to 400.

According to court papers, the Cazares-Gastellum organization contracted the transportation of narcotics to the United States by land, air and sea and metric-ton shipments were transported out of Colombia and Venezuela, through Central America to Mexico, by tractor-trailer, noncommercial vehicles and aircraft.

Once in Mexico, the papers said, the narcotics were transported into the United States through various points of entry on the Southwest border and broken down in Los Angeles and San Diego for later shipment across the country.

"The Cazares-Gastellum drug empire that rose to such heights of power in only two years, fell today at the hands of DEA and our partners," said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy. "This sprawling drug domain, headquartered in Mexico, penetrated deep into all corners of this country."

DEA Busts Ring Accused Of Sending Tons Of Drugs To USA (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, March 1, 2007

Federal agents arrested 66 people Wednesday in a multi-city sweep of an alleged drug ring that is accused of bringing five tons of cocaine a month into the USA, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced.

The Drug Enforcement Administration said leaders of the Cazares drug operation, headquartered in Mexico, have been indicted on charges of laundering money and trafficking in massive amounts of cocaine, marijuana and methamphetamine from Colombia, Venezuela and Mexico.

The drugs were sneaked into the USA via the southwest border with Mexico, the DEA said. The latest arrests bring to 402 the number of people charged in connection with the drug ring, the agency said.

The DEA said its nearly two-year investigation has resulted in the seizure of $45 million and thousands of pounds of marijuana and cocaine and hundreds of pounds of methamphetamine. Wednesday's arrests occurred in cities in California as well as Phoenix and Chicago.

The investigation began in 2005 when federal agents in Imperial County, Calif., stopped a pickup packed with marijuana, the DEA said. The find led federal agents to Victor Cazares-Gastellum, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said.

Cazares and his operatives moved cocaine from Venezuela and Colombia through Central America and into Mexicali, court papers said. Traffickers drove the cocaine and other drugs over the border in tractor-trailers outfitted with secret compartments, according to the court papers.

The drugs were stashed in houses in California until they could be repackaged and moved to distributors throughout the country, court papers said.

Cazares controlled regional and street-level trafficking cells in Alabama, Arkansas, Arizona, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Missouri, Nevada, New York, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Texas and Washington, the DEA said.

"Not only are they moving large amounts of cocaine, but also methamphetamine," Robertson said. "We've been seeing meth sources changing from local labs to Mexican superlabs."

Cazares remains in Mexico and has not been arrested, Robertson said. U.S. authorities will ask Mexican officials to execute a provisional arrest warrant, he said.

U.S. Seizes 18 Tons Of Drugs, Arrests 400 In Sweep (Update1) (BLOOM)

Justice Department Announces $45 Million Multi-Ton Drug Bust Targeting Mexican Organization (FOX)

By Liza Porteus

Fox News, March 1, 2007

Feb. 28: DEA workers display roughly $3.5 million in money grabbed during the Justice Department's drug bust.

The Justice Department on Wednesday announced the largest drug bust in 10 years as it rounded up more than 400 members of a Mexico-based cartel distributing tons of cocaine, marijuana and methamphetamines in the United States.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the roundup Wednesday during a press conference in San Diego.

DOJ_NMG_0138329

"Operation Imperial Emperor" targeted the Mexico-based Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum, a.k.a. "Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar," drug trafficking organization, which Justice says has been responsible for supplying multi-ton quantities of cocaine, as well as large amounts of methamphetamine and marijuana, monthly to distribution cells throughout the United States.

The organization has also laundered millions of dollars generated from this illegal activity, according to the Justice Department.

"Today's actions deal a significant blow to the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, whose members are accused of importing and distributing multi-ton quantities of cocaine and other illicit drugs to communities across the country on a monthly basis," Gonzales said. "These arrests demonstrate what can be achieved when domestic and international law enforcement partners team up against a common foe."

Federal or state charges were unsealed Wednesday morning against 139 defendants in California, Arizona, Illinois and New York.

The 20-month investigation led by the Drug Enforcement Administration and aided by more than 100 federal, state, local and foreign law enforcement agencies, has so far resulted in the seizure of approximately $45.2 million, 27,229 pounds of marijuana, 9,512 pounds of cocaine, 705 pounds of methamphetamine, 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine or "ice," and 11 pounds of heroin.

The investigation has also netted $6.1 million in property and assets, as well as roughly 100 weapons and 94 vehicles. The drug ring is based in Sinaloa, Mexico.

"What's key about this organization is they obviously were dealing in all types of drugs, which means their customers, their victims, were throughout the whole spectrum of U.S. society — rich, poor, old, young, the methamphetamine especially and what we've seen here is a new trend in past couple of years," Justice special agent-in-charge Steven Robertson told FOXNews.com. "This organization had cells, which are little distribution sub-groups based throughout the U.S."

Robertson, who said the bust is the largest in about a decade in terms of amount of drugs and assets seized, as well as number of arrests, said law enforcement is seeing a disturbing new trend in the world of narcotics.

In the past, meth was cooked in small toxic labs here in the United States, "where literally you could cook it on a hotplate in your apartment," Robertson said.

Some of the products being used to make meth — like ephedrine and pseudoephedrine products found in cold medicines — are normally ground up and put through a filtering and cooking process.

But The Combat Meth Act restricted the number of tablets a person can buy in one day, thus resulting in some regular cold medications to now be behind the counter at your local pharmacy.

The amount one person can buy is now limited to 3.6 grams, which is 146 30-milligram tablets during a 30-day period.

It's because of that restriction that makes making meth harder here in the United States, so, Mexican drug rings have seized that opportunity.

"Mexican drug trafficking organizations have realized 'ok, there's a new need,'" Robertson said.

So, drug cartels are cooking meth in what are called 'super labs' outside of the country, then smuggling the drugs into the United States through regular smuggling routes along the southern border.

"This organization branched out and was in fact moving significant amounts of meth, in addition to cocaine and marijuana," Robertson said.

According to court papers unsealed Wednesday, the Mexico-based organization contracted the transportation of drugs to the United States by land, air and sea. Metric ton shipments were transported out of Colombia and Venezuela, through Central America to Mexico, by tractor trailer, non-commercial vehicles, and aircraft.

Once in Mexico, the narcotics were transported into the United States through various border entries in the Southwest.

After arriving in the United States, the drug shipments would be broken down further in cities like Los Angeles and San Diego for further distribution in Nevada, Arizona, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Colorado, Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, Kentucky, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maryland, Texas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Illinois, Kansas, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, Washington and Oregon.

Feds Announce Drug-cartel Bust, Seize 18 Tons Of Drugs (SDUT)

By By Angelica Martinez, Union-tribune Breaking News Team

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 28, 2007

SAN DIEGO – Federal authorities Wednesday arrested dozens of individuals across the country suspected of bringing 18 tons of illegal drugs into the United States, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said in an afternoon news conference here.

Members of the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking ring were awakened in the early morning hours by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies who served simultaneous arrest warrants as part of a 20-month-long investigation into the ring's operations, Gonzales and other federal officials said.

Gonzales said the Mexico-based organization acquired drugs from Colombia and Venezuela to Central America, then smuggled them into the United States from Mexico. Once in the U.S., the drugs were broken down into smaller shipments in such cities as Los Angeles and San Diego and disseminated to distribution cells in various states.

The ring supplied cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana monthly to its distributors by air, land and sea. Officials said it also laundered millions of dollars profited from the drug trafficking.

“The war on drugs is an ongoing challenge not just for the United States but for our neighbors and the rest of the hemisphere as well,” Gonzales said. He added that “the drug smugglers we are fighting have no respect for national borders.”

Advertisement The investigation resulted in the federal indictment of 19 individuals in federal court in San Diego. Those indicted include Mexican nationals and others with residences in Calexico and El Centro, officials said.

So far, nine of the 19 indicted defendants have been arrested. Gonzales said the head of the cartel was not among those arrested.

According to the indictments unsealed Wednesday, Cazares-Gastellum, who competed with the Arellano Felix cartel, was the head of the drug trafficking organization.

Defendants Jose Oscar Del Castillo-Gallardo, Carlos Cuevas Jr. and Sergio Kaiser-Chavez are accused of heading the transportation operations of cocaine between Mexico and the United States.

Other defendants are charged with conspiring to import and distribute the drugs.

Through the course of the investigation, officials made more than 400 arrests across the country – including the 66 people arrested Wednesday morning in California, Arizona, New York and Illinois, Gonzales said.

Authorities said they also seized

More than $45 million in U.S. currency;

9,400 pounds of cocaine;

8 pounds of heroin;

226 pounds of pure methamphetamine, also known as “ice,”;

27,218 pounds marijuana ;

465 marijuana plants;

$5.3 million in non-cash assets, primarily real property;

61 vehicles;

83 firearms.

More than 100 agencies and foreign law enforcement officials participated in the investigation, called “Operation Imperial Emperor.”

Obscure Mexican Cartel Busted Up (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138331

A little-known Mexican drug trafficking organization, which operated without the notoriety of more violent rivals like the Arellano Félix gang, was taken down yesterday during a multistate bust announced in San Diego by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Investigators discovered the Cazares Gastellum cartel about two years ago in the border towns of the Imperial Valley. It was first thought to be a small operation but turned out to be a massive ring that moved a large portion of the U.S. cocaine supply from South America to a distribution center in San Diego to at least 23 states, officials said.

Sixty-six people were arrested in a predawn sting yesterday in San Diego, Calexico, El Centro, Brawley and elsewhere in California, Arizona and Illinois.

The 22-month sting, code-named "Operation Imperial Emperor," has netted 402 people suspected of working for the cartel, more than $45 million in cash and tons of cocaine, heroin and marijuana, said Gonzales, flanked by recently installed interim San Diego U.S. Attorney Karen Hewitt.

"Today's operation is a serious blow to one of the largest and most significant trafficking organizations," Gonzales said. "These arrests demonstrate what can be achieved when domestic and international law enforcement partners team up against a common foe."

Victor Emilio Cazares Gastellum, the alleged kingpin of the family-run cartel, was indicted by a San Diego grand jury Feb. 23 along with 18 of his suspected lieutenants and foot soldiers on drug, conspiracy and money laundering charges. Cazares remains in Mexico and has not been arrested; U.S. officials said they will immediately seek extradition of Cazares and others.

"The Cazares Gastellum drug empire that rose to such heights of power in only two years, fell today," said Karen P. Tandy, head of the Drug Enforcement Administration, the lead agency in the investigation. "This sprawling drug domain, headquartered in Mexico, penetrated deep into all corners of this country. Today we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure ... and tossed it into the dustbin of history."

Cazares' top lieutenant and son-in-law, Jose Oscar Del Castillo Gallardo, from Sinaloa, was arrested Jan. 20 during a ski trip to Big Bear Lake, said San Diego prosecutor Michael Kaplan.

Castillo acted as a liaison between his father-in-law, the drug supplier and the head of the transportation arm, Carlos Cuevas Jr., of Calexico, who also was arrested Jan. 20, Kaplan said. Both were indicted in San Diego as well.

Officials said the group is an Arellano Félix rival that is aligned with traffickers Ismael "El Mayo" Zambada and Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman.

Guzman, based in Sinaloa, is alleged to be the country's most powerful drug leader. He escaped from a maximum-security prison in 2001 and is at large.

In San Diego – the base of the drug distribution network – five suspected Cazares cartel members were arrested yesterday in Otay Mesa and Paradise Hills at homes and a business, and agents seized three guns and five vehicles, said DEA Special Agent Dan Simmons. Fourteen others were taken into custody in the Imperial Valley, with $50,000 and 17 vehicles seized, Simmons said.

According to the indictment, Cazares' organization shipped tons of drugs from Colombia and Venezuela through Central America to Mexico. The narcotics were then smuggled across the Southwestern border.

The organization shared the hallmarks of other large cartels – operating as a corporation, using subcontractors to move the drugs via land, air and sea. They often hid drugs in sophisticated compartments in Chevrolet Avalanche pickups or tractor-trailers and drove them through border crossings in Calexico, Kaplan said.

But the group was unique for taking circuitous routes through the backcountry to move drugs, officials said. They crossed the border through the Imperial Sand Dunes, a popular spot with off-roaders, Kaplan said.

In one instance, traffickers carried drugs over the U.S.-Mexico border on a bridge created with sandbags submerged in the Colorado River outside Yuma, Ariz.

The group also behaved more like a business with cells that carried out specific tasks and were insulated from the other cells in case they were discovered. For instance, one lieutenant ran the transportation aspects, another the distribution.

It's difficult to say how long the cartel has operated, or when it began to dominate the trafficking market, Kaplan said.

DOJ_NMG_0138332

"They're definitely a very sophisticated trafficking organization that moved overwhelmingly significant quantities of narcotics," he said. "It's not like they suddenly emerged yesterday. They've probably been around for a while, just undetected."

Kaplan said no evidence exists that the Cazares cartel used the violent methods of other groups. "But I'm not telling you it doesn't occur."

The investigation was so complex, with so many targets and so many agencies involved across the country, that it was coordinated by DEA headquarters in Washington, D.C. More than 100 federal, state and local law enforcement agencies participated in the sweep.

"This case went from a very small case to an enormous case with national implications," said Simmons of the San Diego DEA office. "A very small office in the Imperial Valley made a heck of a case with DEA."

9 Arrested In Drug Bust (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, February 28, 2007

Nine suspects from Northern California -- including Pinole, Hayward and Fairfield -- have been arrested in connection with an international drug trafficking and money-laundering ring, Drug Enforcement Administration officials said today.

The investigation -- spearheaded by the DEA's Oakland office and dubbed "Operation Imperial Emperor" -- targeted drug distribution cells and money-laundering networks of an organization led by Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar of Mexico, the DEA said.

Agents seized $1 million, 25 kilograms of cocaine, 21 pounds of "ice" methamphetamine, a ballistic vest, several assault weapons and four vehicles, including a Hummer and a Cadillac Escalade, authorities said.

The drugs had a street value of about $2.5 million, and Bay Area drug cells distributed as far as Atlanta, the DEA said.

The case began in February 2006 when DEA agents identified a number of Bay Area residents as having ties to an international ring, authorities said. Investigators kept track of suspects through electronic surveillance.

Investigators served search warrants in Tracy, King City, Modesto, Fairfield, Pinole, Hayward and San Leandro.

The Northern California suspects were identified as Edi Camacho, 33, his brother Juan Camacho, 35, their cousin, Misael Camacho, 31, all of Tracy; Aurielo Beltran-Leon, 33, of King City; his brother, Rene Beltran-Leon, 33, of Modesto; Veider Miguel Rodriguez, 40, of Hayward; Luis Manuel Sanchez-Aceves, 26, of Pinole; Cristobal Navarro, 42, of Fairfield; and Jesus Fernando Vega, 34, of Bakersfield.

Juan Camacho, Vega and Rodriquez already were in custody on unrelated drug charges.

Across the nation, 400 suspects were arrested as part of the investigation, including 66 people who were taken into custody today in California, Arizona and Illinois.

Investigators said the Cazares-Salazar organization contracted the transportation of drugs to the United States by land, air and sea.

The drugs were taken from Colombia and Venezuela and through Central America to Mexico. From there, the drugs were transported into the United States through various ports of entry on the Southwest border, authorities said.

Nationwide Drug Cartel Arrests Include Pinole Man (CCT)

By Scott Marshall

Contra Costa Times, February 28, 2007

PINOLE - A Pinole man was among dozens arrested in a nationwide investigation of a Mexico-based drug cartel in which more than $45 million worth cocaine, methamphetamine, heroin, and marijuana were seized, federal authorities announced today.

Luis Manuel Sanchez-Aceves, 26, of Pinole, was among nine people arrested statewide, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

In the California phase of the investigation, agents seized $1 million in cash; 25 kilograms, or 55 pounds, of cocaine; 21 pounds of "ice" methamphetamine; assault weapons; and four vehicles, including a Hummer and a Cadillac Escalade. The street value of the drugs was $2.5 million.

The 20-month investigation, code-named "Operation Imperial Emperor," has led to 402 arrests of the cartel's alleged lieutenants and foot soldiers, including 66 who were arrested today in California, Arizona, New York and Illinois.

The drugs were shipped or driven from Colombia to Venezuela and then to Mexico for distribution in 23 states.

Yuma Raids Target Mexico Drug Ring, Yield 7 Arrests, $12 Mil In Narcotics (AR)

The Arizona Republic, March 1, 2007

Seven drug-smuggling suspects were arrested and about $12 million worth of narcotics was seized in Arizona as part of a nationwide crackdown aimed at a Mexican smuggling cartel that crisscrossed the sand dunes near Yuma and built a submerged bridge across the Colorado River to avoid law enforcement.

Ramona Sanchez, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman in Phoenix, said seizures in the Yuma area included 28,000 pounds of marijuana, 93 pounds of cocaine, 4 pounds of methamphetamine and about 2 pounds of heroin.

"We got that much dope off the streets, and more importantly we disrupted the organization," Sanchez added. "They're out that much money, and it really does cripple them."

The enforcement in Arizona was tied to a nationwide campaign known as Operation Imperial Emperor, directed against a cartel headed by Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum, identified by the Justice Department as an international drug kingpin.

All told, there have been more than 400 arrests, including 66 that occurred Wednesday in four states.

In Yuma County, authorities launched a pair of investigations beginning in December 2005. One of those, dubbed Operation Cut Throat, targeted a cell that used motorcycles and dune buggies to cross the border through the Imperial Dunes area, mixing in with recreational riders.

The other sting, Operation River Warriors, focused on a group that built sandbag bridges beneath the surface of the Colorado River so that off-road vehicles could cross.

Investigators merged the probes after discovering they were dealing with a single cartel that also moved giant marijuana loads through border checkpoints in vehicles with hidden compartments.

Sanchez said the list of Arizona suspects includes two leaders of the River Warriors group who remain at large: Macedonio "Lolo" Guerrero, 33, and Francisco "Flaco" Olivarez Arvizu, age unknown. Both men have criminal histories, and are believed to be in Mexico.

Forty investigators took part in Wednesday's raids in the Yuma area.

When it was over, Timothy J. Landrum, the DEA's special agent in charge, said, "Arizona citizens are now safer as this organization lies in a shambles."

According to the Justice Department, the national crackdown netted $45 million in cash, 18 tons of narcotics and $6 million in assets. Indictments were unsealed in Arizona, California and Illinois. Defendants are charged with conspiracy, drug trafficking and other crimes.

In court papers, the Justice Department said Cazares-Gastellum's organization transported drugs from Colombia and Venezuela through Central America to Mexico by land, air and sea. The narcotics were then funneled into the United States, mostly via the Yuma area, before reaching transnational shipment points in Phoenix and Los Angeles.

More than 100 federal, state, local and foreign investigators took part in the task force. While the government has conducted successful drug-war crackdowns in the past, federal authorities were almost giddy about the success of Operation Imperial Emperor. In the words of DEA administrator Karen Tandy, "We ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure . . . and tossed it into the dustbin of history."

Seven Arrested Here In Nationwide Drug-smuggling Crackdown (YSUN)

By Jeffret Gautreaux

Yuma Sun, March 1, 2007

Seven people in the Yuma area were arrested Wednesday as part of what the federal government called the nationwide dismantling of an enormous Mexican narcotics operation.

Sixty-six people across the country were arrested Wednesday in the culmination of a 20-month investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and other law enforcement, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Forty agents executed eight search warrants at residences in Yuma, Somerton and San Luis, Ariz., arresting five people on federal charges and two on state charges. The seven men operated in two separate distribution cells here for the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Liz Barrick.

Both cells smuggled large amounts of cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana into the United States during the past 14 months and likely longer, said Barrick. "The seizures alone indicate that they moved enormous quantities."

Barrick said many of the large drug seizures made by the Border Patrol were Cazares-Gastellum shipments. In most cases, the drugs would be brought into Yuma and kept at stash houses before being moved on to Phoenix or Los Angeles for further transport across the country.

The unique environmental conditions of the Imperial Sand Dunes and the Colorado River allowed the cells to successfully smuggle drugs by using 4-by-4 vehicles, sandbag bridges and hired lookouts, Barrick said. The ring also paid people to carry drugs through local ports of entry.

Barrick said since law enforcement has identified the techniques the cells used, their efforts in the future should be hampered. She said the arrests Wednesday certainly will curtail its operations. "There was no indication that they knew this takedown was coming," she said.

Those arrested and indicted on federal charges were Arnulfo Romero-Caro, 26; Ramces Urias-Valenzuela, 27; Aureliano Armando Martinez, 28; Isaac Ramirez-Valenzuela, 28; and Joise Guadalupe Ayala, 23. Fabriel Luna and Luis Mayorquin were arrested on state warrants.

Barrick said they will be taken to Phoenix to be arraigned on drug conspiracy charges in federal court.

The DEA was proclaiming victory over the drug ring after Wednesday's operation, known as Operation Imperial Emperor.

"The Cazares-Gastellum drug empire that rose to such heights of power in only two years fell today at the hands of DEA and our partners," said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy in a news release.

As part of the operation Wednesday in Yuma, agents seized five cellular phones, six vehicles, more than $8,000 in cash and money orders, various documents and small amounts of marijuana and cocaine.

During the full 14-month investigation in Arizona, authorities seized more than 28,000 pounds of marijuana, 93 pounds of cocaine, four pounds of methamphetamine, and more than two pounds of heroin, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Investigators searched for but did not find Macedonio Guerrero, 33, and Francisco Olivarez Arvizu, who have oustanding federal warrants. They are believed to be hiding in Mexico, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Agencies involved in the operation included Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Arizona Department of Public Safety, U.S. Border Patrol, Federal Bureau of Investigation, U.S. Attorney's Office, Yuma County Attorney's Office, Yuma Police Department, Yuma County Sheriff's Office and La Paz County Sheriff's Office.

Drug Ring Busted: 'Operation Imperial Emperor' Seizes Cash, Drugs (ABC)

ABC News, February 28, 2007

It was quite a haul: $45.2 million in cash, 27,229 pounds of marijuana, 9,512 pounds of cocaine, 705 pounds of methamphetamine, 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine, also known as "ice," and 11 pounds of heroin — that's what the government said it seized during a nearly two-year investigation into a massive drug operation based in the southwestern United States.

In addition to the drugs, the government said it confiscated $6.1 million in property and assets, approximately 100 weapons, and 94 vehicles during the investigation.

The Department of Justice investigation, headed by the Drug Enforcement Agency in cooperation with more than 100 local, state, federal and foreign law enforcement agencies, conducted Operation Imperial Emperor, which resulted in more than 400 arrests nationwide, including the 66 made today.

An indictment unsealed today charges that Victor Cazares-Gastellum, believed to be on the run in Mexico as "the head of a large-scale distribution organization [Cazares Organization] that sends metric ton quantities of cocaine from Mexico into the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0138335

A grand jury also handed down indictments to alleged members of the Cazares Organization, to drivers, lookouts, recruiters and those who loaded the vehicles on conspiracy charges relating to importing and distributing the drugs, as well as money laundering.

Investigators claim the smugglers stashed drugs and money in hidden compartments in cars and trucks, as well as in toys and musical instruments. In an aggressive move, the smugglers built a bridge made of sand bags across the Colorado River near Yuma, Ariz., which allowed them to simply drive across the waterway.

Authorities say the drugs, after being transported to the United States by land, air and sea, were distributed to at least 23 states after they were processed by the drug ring in California.

DEA administrator Karen P. Tandy said the Cazares Organization rose to power quickly, but by attacking the agency where it hurt the most, the government was able to cripple the cartel.

"This sprawling drug domain, headquartered in Mexico, penetrated deep into all corners of this country," said Tandy. "Today we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure from its commanders and transportation coordinators to its local distribution cells across the country, stripped it of $45 million in cash, and tossed it into the dustbin of history."

Feds Arrest Hundreds, Seize Cash, Drugs In Raid (NBCSD)

NBC SanDiego.com, February 28, 2007

SAN DIEGO -- Federal agents have broken up a suspected Mexican drug cartel, resulting in the seizure of tens of millions of dollars in cash, thousands of pounds of drugs and hundreds of arrests, the U.S. attorney general announced Wednesday

Federal agents have broken up a suspected Mexican drug cartel, resulting in the seizure or tens of millions of dollars in cash, thousands of pounds of drugs and hundreds of arrests, the U.S. attorney general announced Wednesday.

At a news conference in San Diego, Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez said the multistate bust netted more than $45 million worth of cocaine, heroin, marijuana and methamphetamine.

The 20-month sting, code-named "Operation Imperial Emperor," began in June 2005 by targeting a cocaine distribution network based in San Diego and Imperial county, Gonzalez said.

Feds targeted the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, a rival to the Arellano Felix Cartel.

Cazares-Gastellum, also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar, was indicted in the sting but not arrested, officials said.

The bust swept up 402 of the cartel's alleged lieutenants and foot soldiers, including 66 on Wednesday who were arrested in California, Arizona and Illinois. Agents targeted two houses in El Centro and raided homes in El Centro and Calexico.

The DEA believes most of the drugs were smuggled across the border from Mexicali using vehicles with hidden compartments as opposed to drug tunnels.

Officials said the drugs were broken into smaller shipments in San Diego and Los Angeles, where they were then transported across the country.

At least some of the drugs were carried over the U.S.-Mexico border on a bridge made from sandbags partially submerged in the Colorado River outside of Yuma, Ariz., authorities said.

The totals of drugs seized in the bust include 27,000 pounds of marijuana, 95,000 pounds of cocaine, more than 700 pounds of meth, 227 pounds of ice or pure meth, 11 pounds of heroin, and $6.1 million in property and assets.

Feds Arrest 66 In Connection With Mexican Drug Cartel (KPBS)

KPBS, February 28, 2007

Federal authorities arrested 66 people in California and other states Wednesday in connection with a Mexican drug smuggling cartel. Law enforcement authorities say the alleged cartel leader remains at large. KPBS Reporter Amy Isackson has the story.

Federal court documents say the cocaine smuggling cartel rose to power in Mexico during the last two years. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who was in San Diego, says the Cazares Cartel transported tons of cocaine from Columbia and Venezuela through Mexico, and then across the border to California. He says the group then broke the shipments down into more manageable loads for distribution to 23 U.S. states. Gonzales believes the leader, Victor Emilio Cazares, is still in Mexico.

Gonzales: We're hopeful that there will be an arrest in the future and when that occurs, we of course will be seeking an extradition from the Mexican authorities.

Gonzales says they seized $45 million, 27,000 pounds of marijuana and more than 9,000 pounds of cocaine. He says the Cazares Cartel competed with the Arellano-Felix cartel. Four hundred people have been arrested in connection with the Cazares organization during the 20-month-long investigation.

US Announces Major Drug Arrests (BBC)

BBC News, March 1, 2007

The authorities in the United States say they have arrested more than 400 people and seized 18 tonnes of drugs.

The operation targeted a major Mexican drugs trafficking network.

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the arrests had been carried out over a 20-month period throughout the country, in Operation Imperial Emperor.

He said the network had been successfully dismantled and added that the success of the operation showed what co-operation could achieve.

Mr Gonzales said the ring - allegedly run by Victor Emilio Cazares Gastellum - distributed cocaine, marijuana and other drugs throughout the United States.

Mexico has been fighting drugs-related violence

Speaking in San Diego, he said that the US authorities had made 66 arrests in recent days across four states.

The US authorities say that some of the drugs were transported into the US across a bridge made of sandbags, partly submerged in the Colorado River near Yuma, Arizona.

As well the drugs Operation Imperial Emperor seized $6.1m in property and assets, about 100 weapons and 94 vehicles.

The news comes as the United Nations reported that Mexican cartels now dominate drugs trafficking in the US.

Last year, Mexico saw more than 2,000 people die in violence relating to drugs cartels. Some of the victims were tortured or beheaded.

Arrests Reflect A New Focus On Fighting Steroid Sales (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore, Serge F. Kovaleski And Duff Wilson

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

ALBANY, Feb. 28 — The arrests of four people in Florida on Tuesday and the indictments of at least six doctors around the country linked to a pharmacy in Orlando, Fla., present striking evidence that authorities in several states have opened a new front in the war against illegal online sales of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs.

Albany County prosecutors, working with federal investigators and Florida officials, have linked 11 doctors to the pharmacy. Six face felony charges that they wrote prescriptions to patients they had never met.

The pharmacy, Signature Pharmacy, has dispensed thousands of prescriptions in recent years and has sold tens of millions of dollars' worth of controlled substances nationwide, including at least $10 million in New York State, the authorities said.

Signature sold a variety of medications and supplements, some of them prescribed or provided legally, according to the officials. They described the typical Signature customer as a well-off man in early middle age, but confirmed that the clientele included people whom the Albany County district attorney described only as "celebrities."

It remains unclear who those people were or what they bought, although The Times Union of Albany has reported that professional athletes were among the customers of Signature and at least one other online pharmacy that is under investigation.

Law enforcement officials said that investigators were still sorting through thousands of prescription orders for customers in Albany County and elsewhere, part of a vast haul of evidence taken Tuesday during the raids at two Signature offices in Florida and during the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0138337

The Albany County district attorney, P. David Soares, emphasized in a news conference on Tuesday that his investigation would focus on doctors and pharmacists — the suppliers and distributors for the illegal drug network — rather than on buyers.

"A business like this doesn't work unless you have other participants, including doctors, who have parted company with their oath," Mr. Soares said.

One of the doctors indicted, Anna Maria Santi, 68, of Queens, lost her medical license eight years ago after a string of offenses, including drinking while practicing and giving anesthesia to a patient who died during a procedure. But she continued providing prescriptions to Signature and other Internet pharmacies for years, under variations of her name and those of at least one other doctor, before her arraignment in Albany in February, the authorities said.

The names of the other doctors are in sealed indictments and have not been made public. But a law enforcement official with knowledge of the investigation said the remaining doctors — who live in New York and other states — would be arrested in the coming days, along with pharmacists and other people connected to the ring. The goal, the official said, is to shut down the entire drug network connected to Signature.

Meanwhile, two officials of a Mobile, Ala.-based pharmacy services firm have been indicted by an Albany County grand jury, according to one of the law enforcement officials with knowledge of the investigation. It was unclear on Wednesday whether those officials or the company were linked to Signature.

Travis T. Tygart, general counsel for the United States Anti-Doping Agency, described the investigation and arrests as "the logical next step in getting at these drugs."

"It is a natural outgrowth of BALCO and stiffer sentencing guidelines involving the illegal distribution of these performance-enhancing drugs," Mr. Tygart said, referring to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative case, in which six people were convicted of helping distribute anabolic steroids to athletes.

A track coach, Trevor Graham, and an Olympic cyclist, Tammy Thomas, have been charged with making false statements, and a grand jury is continuing to investigate whether the baseball player Barry Bonds committed perjury.

Mr. Tygart added, "Many people have seen these as professional athlete drugs, but they are also middle America, white-collar, feel-good and get-buff drugs."

The arrests in Florida, which involved at least 20 branch offices of state, local and federal law enforcement agencies, were only one prong of a series of overlapping investigations into the underworld of Internet drug sales. Law enforcement officials described the investigations as cooperative, with different agencies keeping in regular contact and assisting each other as local investigations sprouted leads in other states.

In 2005, in the largest steroid enforcement action in United States history, charges were filed against 23 people and eight Mexican manufacturers and veterinary companies that federal prosecutors said were responsible for 80 percent of the steroids illegally used in the United States.

Since then, the authorities say, more illegal performance drugs have been coming to the United States from China and Eastern Europe. More are finding their way to users through pharmacies, often operating on the Internet, and through doctors who find ways to write prescriptions to skirt the law.

Anabolic steroids are illegal for any human use. While human growth hormone is legal for only a handful of medical uses, violations of the law have rarely been punished.

Mr. Soares's investigation into Internet drug sales began two years ago in Albany County, but quickly became linked to inquiries in other states.

In November 2005, law enforcement officials from several states, including New York and Florida, and federal authorities held a pivotal meeting to discuss ways to better coordinate the investigations into illegal online sales of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs.

In Rhode Island, for instance, a task force within the Food and Drug Administration's office of criminal investigations began an examination in August 2005 into whether two New York doctors and the owner of a pharmaceutical company in New Jersey had illegally prescribed anabolic steroids and human growth hormones. A significant percentage of the business's customers were in Rhode Island.

Soon after the November meeting, a knowledgeable law enforcement official said, the Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, a multi-agency task force in Florida made up of federal, state and local authorities, was assigned to help the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the state in their inquiry into Signature Pharmacy in Orlando. About six months later, Florida investigators and law enforcement from New York State learned that they were all investigating Signature and linked up.

"The M.B.I. and a group of agents from the D.E.A. were conducting a separate investigation into the online sales of steroids and human growth hormones, and at some point the investigators crossed paths with their New York counterparts," Lt. Carl Metzger of the Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation's Orlando office said in a telephone interview Wednesday.

More than half a year after that, New York law enforcement authorities and investigators with the Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation carried out Tuesday's raid on Signature, along with the D.E.A. and representatives of the New York Bureau of Narcotics, among others.

Mr. Metzger and other law enforcement officials said that the arrests were led by New York investigators because Mr. Soares's investigation was more advanced than local inquiries, and because New York, unlike most states, punishes illegal prescription sales as felonies.

"New York was in a position to make the arrests since they were a little further along and more advanced in their investigation, and we were in a position to issue the search warrants," Mr. Metzger said.

Ms. Santi was also indicted in February in Rhode Island on charges of illegal drug distribution, health care fraud and money laundering, along with Daniel McGlone, 54, of North Brunswick, N.J. Victor Mariani, a New York doctor, is named in the indictment but is charged separately with participating in the same conspiracy. The three are accused of running a scheme to illegally prescribe anabolic steroids and human growth hormones.

Steroids' Reach Grows (ALBANYTU)

By Pete Iorizzo, Staff Writer

Albany Times Union, February 28, 2007

Link to athletes not a surprise

Clarification: An earlier version of this story incorrectly reported several athletes were linked to Signature Pharmacy in Orlando. In fact, the names of former professional boxer and heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield, Los Angeles Angels center fielder Gary Matthews Jr., and retired baseball star Jose Canseco, an admitted steroid user, were allegedly included on customer lists for Applied Pharmacy Services in Mobile, Ala., whose two owners have been indicted by an Albany County grand jury.

Tuesday's raid of an Orlando, Fla., pharmacy accused of trafficking performance-enhancing drugs over the Internet may prove to be one of the most significant steroids busts in history, a leading expert said.

Sources said the investigation, led by Albany County District Attorney David Soares' office, revealed that Signature Pharmacy customers included several former and current professional athletes.

Among those linked to the company were former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley and a team doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers.

In a related case in Mobile, Ala., two owners of Applied Pharmacy Services have been indicted by an Albany County grand jury. Their customer list allegedly includes former professional boxer and heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield, Los Angeles Angels center fielder Gary Matthews Jr., and retired baseball star Jose Canseco, an admitted steroid user.

More names of professional athletes, college athletes and even high school coaches may surface as the investigation continues.

"This has the potential to be a huge story," said Gary Wadler, a physician and member of the World Anti-Doping Agency's prohibited list and methods committee. "The question is, will it result in actions that try to deal with this problem?"

Steroids long has been a salient issue in sports, from stories in the 1950s about weightlifters using testosterone to the 2005 congressional hearings about performance-enhancing drugs in baseball. But rare is the instance when so many high-profile athletes across different sports are connected to an accused steroids provider.

DOJ_NMG_0138339

Representatives for the athletes alleged to be customers of the pharmacy said they only learned about the investigation Tuesday.

Tim Mead, the Angels' vice president for communications, said he informed Matthews Jr. about the Times Union report before a spring training game Tuesday.

"There's nothing much to say," Mead said. "A name is mentioned. It's sketchy at best. Certainly as we acquire more information, we'll look into it."

Matthews Jr., a 32-year-old veteran, signed a $50 million contract with the Angels this past off-season. He enjoyed a career year in 2006, batting .313 and hitting 19 home runs for the Texas Rangers.

The agents for Matthews Jr. and Grimsley declined comment, as did a spokesman for Major League Baseball.

Representatives from the Steelers, as well as the doctor, repeatedly declined comment when contacted over the past two weeks.

NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said, "We just became aware of this, and we will look into it."

A spokesman for Holyfield said when the former heavyweight champion was asked about Signature Pharmacy, Holyfield said he never heard of the company.

Holyfield, 44, is slated to fight Vinny Maddalone on March 17 in Corpus Christi, Texas.

Wadler, an associate professor at the New York University School of Medicine and lead author of the book "Drugs and the Athlete," said he wasn't taken aback by the revelations. He said because of poor testing standards in professional sports, athletes only tend to be caught when their names surface in connection with trafficking stings.

"Does this surprise me? No," Wadler said. "It's almost an inevitability."

Links between steroids and sports can be traced to the world's first organized competitions, when ancient Greek wrestlers ate meat for weeks to build muscle. By the 1950s, athletes experimented with testosterone. And during the 1980s, a black market for performance-enhancing drugs ballooned, leading to some of the first anti-doping policies in professional and Olympic sports.

Today, both the NFL and MLB test for some performance-enhancing drugs and outline penalties for those caught doping. But even with stricter rules and more public awareness, questions shroud some of the sports world's predominant figures.

Wadler said he believes more athletes than the public might guess use performance-enhancing drugs.

"I'm very sad to say, none of this surprises me anymore," he said.

Steroid Raids Net 4 In Orlando (OS)

Orlando Sentinel, February 28, 2007

The four people arrested as part of a raid on two Orlando pharmacies face a court appearance on Thursday morning, officials said today.

Authorities raided the pharmacies Tuesday and arrested the four as part of a nationwide probe into the illegal distribution of steroids. A hearing is scheduled for 9 a.m.

The case, being led by a prosecutor in New York, involves doctors, pharmacists and business owners who have been, or will be, arrested in Florida, New York and Texas. Sealed indictments charge them with various felonies on suspicion of unlawfully distributing steroids and other drugs, according to Albany County District Attorney David Soares.

At a brief news conference Tuesday evening, Soares repeatedly refused to say whether professional athletes were involved as consumers of the drugs.

Ultimately, he conceded: "There are celebrities involved in this case. They are not our priority." Arrested in Orlando were Naomi Loomis, 33, of Windermere, founder and chief executive officer of Signature Compounding Pharmacy; her husband, Robert "Stan" Loomis, 55, chief operating officer; Kenneth "Mike" Loomis, 59, of Orlando, head compounding pharmacist and Stan Loomis' brother; and Kirk Calvert, 37, of Winter Park, director of business development for the pharmacy. All four were charged with 20 identical felony counts, including insurance fraud and criminal diversion of prescription medications. They are being held without bail at the Orange County Jail.

Soares said the Orlando raids were part of a two-year probe of drug trafficking over the Web.

DOJ_NMG_0138340

Here's how it worked: Customers would search the Internet for Web sites that would put them in touch with doctors who prescribed drugs ranging from oxycodone to anabolic steroids without a doctor's visit. Soares said pharmacies such as Signature helped fill the prescriptions.

The prosecution of a doctor in Albany County who wrote some of the illegal prescriptions helped authorities track illicit prescription and steroid dealing, he said.

"A business like this doesn't work unless you have other participants, including doctors who have parted company with their oath, doctors who will, in fact, prescribe drugs, steroids without ever visiting with a patient. It requires that kind of participation," Soares said.

Soares said court records remain sealed in the case, that it was at a "sensitive stage" and more arrests were expected in Florida and elsewhere. A hearing on extradition is not yet set.

Central Florida's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Internal Revenue Service, New York State Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement and other federal and state health and law-enforcement agencies participated in the daylong search at Signature Compounding Pharmacy. Agents raided the Signature locations at 1200 Kuhl Ave. in Orlando and 2304 Aloma Ave. in Winter Park, seizing drugs and dozens of boxes of documents.

There were no court documents available in New York or Florida on Tuesday to give more insight into the case. But on its Web site Tuesday, the Times Union of Albany, which first reported the story, described the case as one that could expose widespread steroid use by athletes, celebrities and thousands of people across the nation.

The newspaper cited some court records unavailable to other media and had a reporter and photographer in Orlando when the raid took place.

Numerous calls to the Albany County District Attorney's Office were not returned Tuesday.

Florida Chief Assistant Statewide Prosecutor Rick Bogle on Tuesday said his Orlando office along with MBI and other federal agencies were merely "assisting" New York authorities and had not filed any Florida criminal charges against the defendants. Bogle said a local state judge signed the two sealed search warrants that were used to raid Signature locations.

Compounding pharmacies make customized prescription medicines that are not available at traditional drugstores. According to its Web site, which had been taken down by Tuesday, Signature Compounding Pharmacy claimed it is leading the way in the "timeless search for a true fountain of youth."

Stan, Naomi and Mike Loomis are listed as licensed pharmacists on the company Web site. Stan Loomis' biography also states he served as director of pharmacy for the "prestigious" Orlando Regional Healthcare System for some time.

Mike Loomis is described as the "head compounding pharmacist" and "director of laboratory services." The brothers once owned and operated Loomis Drugs, a local drugstore chain that they sold in 1989.

Calvert, according to Signature's Web site, is director of business development.

Stan Loomis talked about the company on an American Academy of Anti-Aging Medicine Web site.

"We focus primarily on age management products and services that relate primarily to hormones for both men and women," he said. "We work with a physician to tailor a dose or specific product for a patient."

Although affidavits in the arrests have not been made public, Signature Pharmacy was mentioned in a federal indictment filed last week in Rhode Island.

The document charges two people with conspiracy, illegal distribution of human-growth hormone and other steroids as well as health-care fraud. It also states Daniel McGlone of American Pharmaceutical Group in New Jersey peddled the drugs to bodybuilders and used Signature to fill prescriptions written by unlicensed or retired physicians.

"McGlone would forward these prescriptions via facsimile or mail to various large compounding pharmacies, including primarily Signature Pharmacy . . . to deliver human growth hormone, anabolic steroids and other prescription medications to customers all over the United States," the indictment reads.

While agents sealed off the building, several unsuspecting customers were turned away as they tried to fill prescriptions.

An Orlando couple, whose premature son was born three weeks ago, said their doctor sent them to Signature on Tuesday.

"We need the prescription and [to] learn how to use it before we can take him home," said Erik Garbus, 29, the father.

Steroids, HGH And Records Seized In Orlando Raid (MCT)

McClatchy Newspapers, February 28, 2007

ORLANDO, Fla. - With BALCO still churning on the West Coast, a new front on the steroid war opened in the East on Tuesday when law-enforcement officers raided two Orlando pharmacies and seized steroids, human growth hormone and records that could connect those drugs to dozens of athletes.

In a raid led by the Albany (N.Y.) County District Attorney's office, officers from several Florida and national agencies arrested four employees of Signature Compounding Pharmacies Tuesday and charged them in an alleged scheme to provide steroids and growth hormone over the Internet.

A source told the Daily News that another pharmacy outside of Florida will be raided in the near future, and that Tuesday's action was related to recent arrests at a Mobile, Ala., pharmacy.

The Albany Times-Union, which broke news of the raids Tuesday, reported that drugs from the Mobile lab were allegedly received by former heavyweight boxing champion Evander Holyfield, Los Angeles Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., former slugger and best-selling author Jose Canseco and former major league pitcher Jason Grimsley, whose home was raided last year by IRS agents.

The paper also said an investigator flew to Pittsburgh last month to ask a Steelers physician why, in 2006, he allegedly used a personal credit card to buy $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone.

"I think this is going to put a significant dent in distribution," Albany DA David Soares said.

When agents raided Signature's primary pharmacy, a three-story building a block from the Orlando Regional Medical Center, at about 9:30 a.m. Tuesday, employees had cards at their desks instructing them to call a number of lawyers in the event of a DEA or FDA raid.

"Apparently they were expecting it," said Lt. Carl Metzger of the Florida Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation. "If they're truly innocent and just going about their business, it's a strange thing to have."

Several raids and arrests were pending, one source close to the investigation said, adding, "This is really the first of two waves."

Clients included MLB and NFL players, as well as bodybuilders and celebrities, the source said.

According to the source, as many as 50 doctors and pharmacists may be indicted by the time the case is complete, but the professional clients who received drugs are not targets, Soares said. Three "distributors" from Sugarland, Tex., were also arrested, he said.

"The involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you at this point that that is not our focus," he said.

Soares would not say how many targets there were in the investigation, but when asked if it could be "scores," he said, "scores is a safe word."

Approached by a Daily News reporter in New York, Holyfield shook his head when asked about the report. Pat English, the attorney for Holyfield's promotion company Main Events, called the accusation "bull----."

"I've known Evander 20-something years. Plain bull----," English said. "And by the way, he's been regularly tested (for steroids) when he fights in Vegas."

Matthews' agent, Scott Leventhal, did not return several calls for comment. Canseco's attorney, Robert Saunooke, said his client obviously has admitted his steroid use, but doubts he ever ordered anything over the Internet.

"My understanding is every time Jose did steroids, he got them through either a teammate or somewhere at the gym or a doctor. All his (prescriptions) he's had in recent years have been through doctors.

"He does take testosterone now because one side effect of taking them so long is that he's got low testosterone levels," Saunooke said. "I would doubt very seriously that Jose bought any prescriptions online. The reason I would doubt that is because he doesn't know how to use a computer. Just getting him to check my E-mails is next to impossible."

At Signature's Orlando location Tuesday, police arrested pharmacy founder Stan Loomis, his wife, pharmacy CEO Naomi Loomis, Loomis' brother, Michael and Kirk Calvert, an officer in the company. The three Loomises are licensed pharmacists.

DOJ_NMG_0138342

Law-enforcement agents spent the day cataloging, packing and loading boxes of files onto a U-Haul truck parked in front of the building. Several large metal filing cabinets were loaded, as well as a computer hard drive that a source described as "crucial" to the investigation.

All four defendants will be arraigned Wednesday while Soares seeks to have them extradited to New York for prosecution on felony charges of criminal diversion of prescription medication and prescriptions, criminal sale of controlled substances and insurance fraud.

Under the alleged scheme, they were part of a system in which clients would log onto a Web site, request drugs, then have their requests forwarded to a physician who would write a prescription for whatever the client wanted.

That prescription was then allegedly filled by Signature or other pharmacies under investigation.

"That's illegal," Soares said.

Soares said the investigation began two years ago, when his officer prosecuted a Rome, N.Y., emergency room physician named David W. Stephenson. Stephenson, who was sent to the Albany County Correctional Facility, received drugs from Signature, Soares said.

A source said that investigators worked closely with the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency over the past two years.

USADA legal director Travis Tygart would not comment on whether his organization was involved, but speaking generally, he said, "We have always known that doctors, coaches and even companies illegally prey on our athletes to use drugs in order to win at all costs."

First BALCO, Now An East Coast Steroid Scandal (AP)

AP, March 1, 2007

The West Coast had BALCO. Now the East Coast could be in the midst of its own steroid scandal.

An illicit steroid distribution network, which may be responsible for Internet sales of performance-enhancing drugs nationwide, has been targeted by an upstate New York prosecutor. Customers reportedly included Los Angeles Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield and former baseball star Jose Canseco.

"We have investigated, and are prosecuting, one of the largest narcotics and steroid distributors in the nation," P. David Soares, district attorney of Albany County, N.Y., said in a statement Wednesday.

His comments came a day after federal and state agents raided two pharmacies in Orlando, Fla. So far, eight people in three states have been arrested, and prosecutors say 24 could face felony charges by the time their investigation is over.

Former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley and a doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers were reportedly linked to Signature Pharmacy in Orlando, according to the Times Union of Albany, which first disclosed the widespread investigation.

The paper also said Matthews, Canseco and Holyfield were allegedly on the customer list of Applied Pharmacy Services in Mobile, Ala., whose two owners have been indicted by an Albany County grand jury.

SI.com, meanwhile, reported that Matthews allegedly was sent Genotropin, a brand of synthetic growth hormone, in August 2004. The drug, which came from Applied Pharmacy, was sent to the address in Mansfield, Texas, of one of Matthews' former minor league teammates, according to the Internet site.

Matthews, speaking to reporters at the Angels' spring training camp in Mesa, Ariz., said he wasn't "in a position to answer any specific questions."

"I do expect it to resolve itself here in the near future. ... Until we get more information, I just can't comment on it," he said.

Canseco's attorney, Robert Saunooke, told The Associated Press he would be surprised if the former slugger had been a client.

"I would find it highly unlikely," he said. "All the steroids that he got were prescribed to him or were from people in the gym. There's never been anything he's gotten online."

A message left with Holyfield was not immediately returned. Grimsley's agent, Joe Bick, declined comment, and his attorney did not return a phone call.

Investigators say they've found evidence that testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs may have been fraudulently prescribed to users who included professional and college athletes.

DOJ_NMG_0138343

"We've known for a long time that coaches, doctors, even companies prey and enable our athletes to use drugs against the rules," Travis Tygart, counsel for the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency, said. "It's these types of national law enforcement efforts that will be most successful in bringing the manufacturers and distributors of these drugs to their knees.

"And that's good for all of sports and our athletes."

Soares has refused to answer most questions about the case, which involves sealed indictments. But he did say his two-year investigation began after an Albany doctor was arrested for allegedly trafficking in narcotics online.

"I understand that the involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you we are not, at this point, we are not concerned with the celebrity factor," Soares said Tuesday in Orlando, where federal and state agents raided two Signature Pharmacy stores and arrested four company officials.

"Our focus here is to shut down distribution channels."

And that's what makes this latest steroid investigation so significant, doping officials said.

BALCO involved some of the biggest names in sports — Barry Bonds, Marion Jones and Jason Giambi — as well as "designer" steroids, performance-enhancing drugs concocted specifically for elite athletes. But its scope largely has been limited to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, those who worked there and those got performance-enhancing drugs from there.

The Albany investigation, though — coupled with federal charges filed last week in a similar probe in Providence, R.I. — is targeting the distribution networks that supply steroids to big-name and no-name users throughout the country. And it's focusing squarely on operations that peddle their illegal wares over the Internet.

According to Albany prosecutors, Signature Pharmacy repeatedly filled prescriptions even though it knew they were not the result of face-to-face meetings between doctor and patient, a violation of New York law.

"Historically, people who abuse these things were fearful of drug testing," said Dr. Gary Wadler, a member of the World Anti-Doping Agency. "Now they've got to be fearful not only of drug testing, they've got to be fearful of law enforcement. ... `Are the persons I'm getting it from under some federal investigation and am I going to get snagged?'

"I'm quite confident that this had nothing to do with the investigation of athletes," Wadler added. "It happened to deal with an investigation of a doctor or pharmacist and, lo and behold, there were people's names. They weren't targets. They're collateral, if you will."

Officials from the Food and Drug Administration questioned the doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers about hormone purchases from the Orlando pharmacy.

The Times Union reported that Dr. Richard Rydze was asked about his purchase last year of about $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone. The purchase was made on Rydze's personal credit card.

"There is no evidence that Dr. Rydze prescribed or provided any hormone treatments to any of our players," Steelers president Art Rooney II said. "Dr. Rydze has assured me that this has never happened and will never happen."

Meanwhile, the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center said it was investigating the purchase made by Rydze, who works there.

"We have initiated an internal review and at this time we have no further factual information or comment," said Susan Manko, a UPMC spokeswoman.

During the raid in Orlando, investigators seized drugs, including anabolic steroids and human growth hormone, said Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation.

Steroid Scandal Shifts To East Coast (AP)

AP, March 1, 2007

Testing for performance-enhancing drugs can only go so far -- and nab so many people. Bring state and federal law-enforcement officials in, and it could change the landscape of the anti-doping fight.

Illicit steroid distribution networks, which may be responsible for Internet sales of performance-enhancing drugs nationwide, have been targeted by prosecutors in upstate New York and Rhode Island. Customers reportedly included Los Angeles Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield and former baseball star Jose Canseco, as well as a doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers.

"We've known for a long time that coaches, doctors, even companies prey and enable our athletes to use drugs against the rules," Travis Tygart, general counsel for the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency, said Wednesday. "It's these types of national law enforcement efforts that will be most successful in bringing the manufacturers and distributors of these drugs to their knees.

"And that's good for all of sports and our athletes."

Testing may expose athletes who cheat, but it does little to punish those who make, market and distribute performance-enhancing substances, let alone stop the flow of drugs. That's why these new investigations have the potential to be so significant.

Instead of the stars and designer drugs in the BALCO scandal, authorities are targeting those who supply steroids to big-name and no-name users alike across the country.

"I understand that the involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you we are not, at this point, we are not concerned with the celebrity factor," said P. David Soares, district attorney of Albany County, N.Y.

"Our focus here is to shut down distribution channels."

Federal and state agents raided two pharmacies in Orlando, Fla., on Tuesday in connection with an investigation by Soares' office. Eight people in three states have been arrested, and prosecutors say 24 could face felony charges by the time their investigation is over.

An Albany County grand jury also has indicted the two owners of a pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., according to the Times Union of Albany, which first disclosed the widespread investigation. An attorney for Applied Pharmacy Services told Mobile's WALA-TV that federal authorities raided the company last August.

And last week, federal prosecutors in Rhode Island announced charges in an alleged scheme to illegally prescribe anabolic steroids and human growth hormone to bodybuilders in several states.

"Historically, people who abuse these things were fearful of drug testing," said Dr. Gary Wadler, a member of the World Anti-Doping Agency. "Now they've got to be fearful not only of drug testing, they've got to be fearful of law enforcement. ... `Are the persons I'm getting it from under some federal investigation and am I going to get snagged?'

"I'm quite confident that this had nothing to do with the investigation of athletes," Wadler added. "It happened to deal with an investigation of a doctor or pharmacist and, lo and behold, there were people's names. They weren't targets. They're collateral, if you will."

Holyfield Allegedly Received Steroids, HGH Via Alias (SI/CNN)

Sports Illustrated/CNN, February 28, 2007

Sports Illustrated reporters Luis Fernando Llosa and L. Jon Wertheim are tracking the investigation of an illegal steroid distribution network that has implicated pro athletes. On Tuesday, they accompanied agents on a coordinated raid of an Orlando compound pharmacy and a Jupiter, Fla., "anti-aging" clinic that investigators allege conspired to fraudulently prescribe steroids, human growth hormone and other performance enhancing drugs over the Internet.

SI.com: In addition to major league outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., another prominent athlete whose name has surfaced in media reports is Evander Holyfield, the four-time heavyweight boxing champ. What do you know about his situation?

Llosa/Wertheim: Ironically, Holyfield's name does not appear in the law enforcement documents we reviewed. However, a patient by the name of "Evan Fields" caught investigators' attention. "Fields" shares the same birth date as Holyfield -- Oct. 19, 1962. The listed address for "Fields" was 794 Evander, Fairfield, Ga. 30213. Holyfield has a very similar address. When we called the phone number that, according to the documents, was associated with the "Fields" prescription, Holyfield answered.

SI.com: Is he tied to raids of compound pharmacies and "anti-aging" clinics as well?

Llosa/Wertheim: This case appears to be a little different. Rather than using the internet and receiving the prescriptions through the mail, "Fields" allegedly picked them up from a private Georgia urologist whose offices were raided as part of this ongoing investigation. But authorities tell us the drugs came from Applied Pharmacy, the Mobile, Ala., compound pharmacy the DEA raided last fall.

SI.com: Do you know which drugs were involved?

Llosa/Wertheim: According the records we reviewed, in June 2004, the individual that authorities believe to be Holyfield picked up three vials of testosterone, two vials of Glukor (a drug believed to be used during and after steroid cycles) and injection supplies. Less than a week later, according to the document, he picked up five vials of Saizen, a brand of human growth hormone (HGH), and related supplies. In Sept. 2004, he returned for a follow-up visit for hypogonadism.

SI.com: Does Holyfield have an explanation?

Llosa/Wertheim: We contacted him today. He denied knowledge and offered to get back to us, which he never did. He did, however, release a statement through Main Events, the boxing promotion company. "I do not use steroids. I have never used steroids. I resent that my name has been linked to known steroid users by sources who refuse to be identified in order to generate publicity for their investigation. I'm disappointed that certain members of the media fell for this ploy and chose to use my name in headlines and publish my photo alongside stories ... about an investigation into a practice that has nothing to do with me or what I stand for."

SI.com: At 44, Holyfield is still fighting. What is boxing's policy with respect to steroids and HGH?

Llosa/Wertheim: Most commissions do ban steroids and HGH. But again -- and we can't stress this enough -- this investigation is about the chain of supply and this network. It's not about which athletes are or aren't using performance-enhancing drugs. The document makes no assertion that Holyfield used the drugs that he is alleged to have received.

Boxing is not like other sports where there is a league and union that agrees on standard policies such as drug testing. In boxing, anti-doping rules can vary by state commission. We spoke with several officials with the Nevada Athletic Commission, and while HGH is on a list of banned substances, boxers are not tested for it. Marc Ratner, the former head of the Nevada commission, also told us that boxers are only tested when they fight -- not out of competition. Still, a number of fighters in recent years, including James Toney and Fernando Vargas, have been sanctioned for using performance-enhancing drugs, serving suspensions of 90 days and nine months, respectively.

SI.com: Has Holyfield's name come up before?

Llosa/Wertheim: He has never tested positive. However Dr. Margaret Goodman, chairman of the medical advisory board of Nevada Athletic Commission, says that as early as 1994, when Holyfield fought Michael Moorer and suffered heart problems, the medical arm of the Commission questioned Holyfield about possible HGH use. "There were questions [because] the abnormalities Evander had with his heart were findings that could have been consistent with growth hormone use. The problem was there was no test and Evander denied any use of growth hormone."

Goodman went on to say that she believes that use of HGH is widespread in the sport. "I think it's readily available and used in boxing," she says. "I think we should have adopted the World Anti-Doping Agency (WADA) standards years ago. Boxing continues to hide its head in the sand that there's a problem with anabolic steroids and drugs like growth hormone -- and also substances like clenbuterol that guys are using in combination with growth hormone and anabolic steroids to give them an unfair advantage."

Abuse Of Prescribed Medicines About To Eclipse That Of Illicit Drugs (PPG)

By Michael A. Fuoco

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 1, 2007

After treating more than 2,000 people for OxyContin addiction since 2000, Dr. Neil A. Capretto, Gateway Rehabilitation Center's medical director, wasn't surprised by the findings of the United Nations-affiliated International Narcotics Control Board that abuse of prescription drugs is about to exceed the use of illicit narcotics worldwide.

"There's just been a growing, nonmedical, addictive use of prescription drugs," he said, particularly opioid drugs like OxyContin, codeine, morphine, Percocet, Vicodin and Dilaudid. Opioids possess some properties characteristic of opiate narcotics like heroin and morphine but are not derived from the opium poppy.

"The good news is we're treating pain better than we did 10 years ago," Dr. Capretto said. "The bad news is there are more people abusing and misusing [prescription drugs]. Unfortunately, from our end, I'm really afraid it's going to get worse before it gets better."

In a report yesterday, the International Narcotics Control Board said abuse of prescription drugs is about to exceed the use of illicit street narcotics worldwide. The shift has spawned a lethal new trade in counterfeit painkillers, sedatives and other medicines potent enough to kill.

Prescription drug abuse already has outstripped traditional illegal drugs like heroin, cocaine and Ecstasy in parts of Europe, Africa and South Asia, the board said in its annual report for 2006.

In the United States alone, abuse of painkillers, stimulants, tranquilizers and other prescription medications has gone beyond "practically all illicit drugs with the exception of cannabis," with users increasingly turning to them first, said the group, based in Vienna, Austria.

Unregulated markets in many countries make it easy for traffickers to peddle a wide variety of counterfeit drugs using courier services, the mail and the Internet.

"Gains over the past years in international drug control may be seriously undermined by this ominous development if it remains unchecked," Narcotics Control Board President Philip O. Emafo said.

The problem is compounded in Western Pennsylvania, Dr. Capretto said, because it is "one of the OxyContin epicenters of the world." The powerful drug is prescribed here more than in other areas because of the region's large elderly population and large number of former industrial workers who suffered work-related injuries.

Since 2000, Gateway has experienced a 600 percent increase in admissions for addictions to opioids, both prescription pills and heroin, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0138347

The prescription and heroin addictions are often linked, Dr. Capretto noted, because abuse of OxyContin has led many addicts to heroin for economic reasons. While an 80-milligram OxyContin pill can sell for up to $80 on the street, a stamp bag of heroin has dropped to $10, even as purity levels have reached 90 percent.

"Someone spending hundreds of dollars a day on OxyContin can buy heroin for one-third, one-fourth that amount now," he said. "You have suburban kids who never thought they'd stick a needle in their arm shooting up.

Richard Goldberg, Allegheny County deputy district attorney in charge of the narcotics unit, agreed that OxyContin users are turning to heroin because dealers of both drugs are reacting to market forces of "supply and demand" in a price war.

Dr. Capretto said he's treated OxyContin abusers who enlisted others to stand outside of doctors' offices to buy partial prescriptions from elderly patients.

"They'd buy half a prescription for $200 and sell it for 10 times that much," he said.

He said he knows of high school students from an upper-middle-class school district who broke into a fellow student's home to steal his father's OxyContin, prescribed for a car accident; of addicts who go to real estate open houses to go through medicine cabinets; and addicts who go from doctor to doctor with fake medical records, knowing just how to act and just what to say.

Mr. Goldberg said prosecutions in Allegheny County involving prescription drugs peaked about two years ago when they made up about 30 percent of nearly 6,000 drug cases. Now, that number has dropped back to the 20 percent range where it was previously, he said.

After an upswing involving OxyContin prosecutions several years ago, the pendulum has swung back to Vicodin, he said.

"Vicodin has been there and will always be there. It's one drug doctors are more comfortable in prescribing," he said.

The number of Americans abusing prescription drugs went from 7.8 million in 1992 to 15.1 million in 2003, nearly doubling, the Narcotics Control Board said. Among their prescription drugs of choice: the painkillers oxycodone, sold under the trade name OxyContin, and hydrocodone, sold as Vicodin and used by 7.4 percent of college students in 2005.

Although the number of U.S. high school and college students abusing illicit drugs declined in 2006 for a fourth consecutive year, "the high and increasing level of abuse of prescription drugs by both adolescents and adults is a serious cause for concern," it said.

Counterfeiters are exploiting intense demand for prescription drugs that can give a "high" comparable to cocaine, heroin or methamphetamine, the watchdog group said.

It singled out Scandinavia, where demand for flunitrazepam -- a sedative sold as Rohypnol and widely known as a "date rape drug" -- increasingly is being met by unauthorized production, and North America, where widespread abuse of prescription drugs, including the narcotic fentanyl -- 80 times as potent as heroin -- has been blamed for a spike in deaths.

"The very high potency of some of the synthetic narcotic drugs available as prescription drugs presents, in fact, a higher overdose risk than the abuse of illicit drugs," Dr. Emafo said.

Prescription Drug Abuse Set To Exceed Use Of Illicit Narcotics Globally (AP)

AP, March 1, 2007

Abuse of prescription drugs is about to exceed the use of illicit street narcotics worldwide â€"Â and the shift has spawned a lethal new trade inÂ counterfeit painkillers,Â sedatives and other medicines potent enough to kill, a global watchdog warned Wednesday.

Already, prescription drug abuse has outstripped traditional illegal drugs such as heroin, cocaine andÂ Ecstasy in parts of Europe, Africa and South Asia,Â the UN-affiliated International Narcotics Control Board said in its annual report for 2006.

In the United States alone, the abuse ofÂ painkillers, stimulants, tranquilizers and otherÂ prescription medications has gone beyond "practically all illicit drugs with the exception of cannabis,"Â with users increasingly turning to them first, theÂ Vienna-based group said.

And unregulated markets in many countries make it easy for traffickers to peddle a wide variety ofÂ counterfeit drugs through courier services, ordinary mail and the internet.

DOJ_NMG_0138348

"Gains over the past years in international drugÂ control may be seriously undermined by this ominousÂ development if it remains unchecked," INCB presidentÂ Philip Emafo said.

Discount medications that seem to be authenticÂ often turn out to be cheap but powerful knockoffs concocted from recipes posted on the web, Emafo added.

"Instead of healing, they can take lives," he said, characterizing the danger as "real and sizable."

Up to 50 per cent of all drugs taken in developing countries are believed to be counterfeit, the boardÂ said, citing estimates from the World HealthÂ Organization.

Buprenorphine, an analgesic, is now the mainÂ injection drug in most of India, and it is also trafficked and abused in tablet form in France, where the INCB estimates 20 to 25 per cent of the drug sold commercially as Subutex is being diverted to theÂ black market. Canadians ditching heroin for prescription narcotics

A study published in November 2006Â in the CanadianÂ Medical Association Journal found that heroin was no longer the opiate of choice among many substance abusers in Canada â€" prescription narcotics such asÂ morphine and OxyContin were taking its place.

Researchers studied street users in seven cities across the country in 2005, and found that heroinÂ remained the No. 1 illicit opiate only in Vancouver and Montreal. In the five other cities â€" Edmonton,Â Toronto, Quebec City, Fredericton and Saint John â€" more often than not, getting high meant taking prescription opioids like Percodan.

When the study was released, lead author BenediktÂ Fischer, an addiction researcher at the University ofÂ Victoria, said the switch to highly addictiveÂ prescription narcotics among street users likelyÂ represents just the tip of the iceberg

HeÂ said he suspected the numbers would be much higher ifÂ the general population was factored in.

The INCB said the number of Americans abusing prescription drugs nearly doubled from 7.8 million in 1992 to 15.1 million in 2003. Among theirÂ prescription drugs of choice: the painkillers oxycodone, sold under the trade name OxyContin, andÂ hydrocodone, sold as Vicodin and used by 7.4 per centÂ of college students in 2005.

Although the number of U.S. high school and college students abusing illicit drugs declined in 2006 for a fourth consecutive year, "the high andÂ increasing level of abuse of prescription drugs byÂ both adolescents and adults is a serious cause for concern," it said.

Counterfeiters are exploiting intense demand forÂ prescription drugs that can give a "high" comparableÂ to cocaine, heroin or methamphetamine, the watchdog group said.

Military, ATF Expand Bomb Training (CHIT)

By Andrew Zajac, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Struggling for more effective responses to the suicide and roadside bombings that have wreaked havoc in Iraq and increasingly in Afghanistan, the Defense Department has beefed up an explosives training program with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Military bomb technicians will receive additional training in countering homemade explosives and in identifying bomb components after a blast, under the expanded program to be run in six sessions annually at the ATF's training center in Ft. A.P. Hill in Virginia.

About 180 technicians from all branches of the armed forces will be trained in a course that has been expanded to one week, according to Steven Beggs, ATF chief of explosives training. Previously, about 90 technicians, mostly from the Army, received three days of training.

Homemade roadside bombs, also called improvised explosive devices, have exacted a devastating toll on American troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. This month the government alleged that sophisticated variants of the devices used in Iraq are being supplied by a branch of Iran's armed forces.

Suicide bombs have been employed against both military forces and civilians.

A suicide bombing Tuesday at the gates of Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan killed at least 23 people, including two Americans. Vice President Dick Cheney was on the base at the time but was unharmed.

DOJ_NMG_0138349

Military bomb technicians traditionally have focused on disarming or detonating a bomb, but increasingly they are trying to use physical evidence, such as a bomb's remains, to trace the weapon to its source.

"What they've been asked more and more to do is collect evidence, or intelligence," which is the ATF's strength, Beggs said.

The goal of the expanded training is to allow bomb technicians to glean whatever information they can about a bomb's components--switches, timers and the nature of the explosive --in less than 30 minutes, Beggs said.

Understanding how a bomb is built can provide clues about who made it and enable the military to take countermeasures.

"It affects the way we build our vehicles, the way we go down the road," Beggs said.

Feds Charge Suspected Bomb-maker Anew (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), February 28, 2007

A Flomaton man whose federal trial on bomb charges ended in a hung jury last month faces new charges under an indictment handed down last week by a grand jury in Mobile.

At the January trial in U.S. District Court in Mobile, jurors could not agree about whether Gregory Wendell Nichols was guilty of possessing a bomb. The new federal indictment accuses him of two bomb-related charges formally known as possession of an unregistered firearm and making a firearm.

Nichols is scheduled to be arraigned on the charges today.

"It is a separate offense to actually make a firearm," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Vicki Davis, who has taken over as lead prosecutor in the case.

During Nichols' trial, senior federal appeals Judge Emmett "Rip" Cox, who presided over the trial, dismissed one of two counts against the defendant -- possession of a firearm in violation of law -- on grounds that it duplicated the other charge, possession of an unregistered firearm.

"They're just retreading the indictment," said Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden, who added that his client intends to plead not guilty. "A count was dismissed. Now, they're trying to add another one."

Agents for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5 after getting a tip. Nichols permitted the agents to search his pickup truck; they reported finding five homemade explosive devices.

Nichols admitted that he made the devices using spent carbon dioxide cartridges from BB guns. He told jurors last month that he packed the cylindrical canisters -- which were about 2 inches long -- with a black powder substitute called Pyrodex. He then sealed it with plumber's tape and electrical tape, and attached a firecracker fuse.

Nichols testified that he made the devices -- which he called "firecrackers" -- to drop into a river to watch the explosions. He said he and his fiancée did this with a batch of devices he had made in June and planned to do it again before ATF agents arrested him.

Prosecutors offered testimony from a ballistics expert who conducted tests he said proved the devices were dangerous. A defense expert witness told jurors that the devices were weak explosives.

Jurors could never agree whether those devices were firecrackers -- and thus legal -- or illegal firearms.

Davis said she has discussed a possible plea deal with defense lawyers, but Madden said he expects the case to go to trial again next month.

"We're going full speed ahead," Madden said. "I'm assuming it will go pretty much the same. But I'll do it better this time. The government doesn't have any more evidence."

Judge Hits Politics In Choice Of Marshals (BOS)

By Sean P. Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, March 1, 2007

A rare rebuke from US bench

DOJ_NMG_0138350

A federal judge in Boston has blasted the US Marshals Service as a "second rate" agency because it is headed by a patronage appointee, and called on Congress to "professionalize" the law enforcement agency.

Judge William G. Young , in an unusual addendum to a ruling in an employment discrimination case last week, went out of his way to criticize the way marshals are appointed throughout the country.

The appointees "are all direct political patronage appointments. These are not executive department policy-making positions; they are vital law enforcement positions," Young wrote.

"Surely here in America direct command of law enforcement officers in harm's way could never be entrusted to political patronage appointees," he wrote. "How smug we are -- and how wrong."

Young's remarks were striking, in part because federal judges work closely with the marshals, who are responsible for securing courthouses, protecting judges, juries, witnesses, and other court officials. They also play a role in capturing fugitives and transporting prisoners.

Young wrote that it was unimaginable that another federal law enforcement agency, such as the FBI or the Drug Enforcement Agency, would put a political appointee in charge of a regional office. He said Congress has professionalized those agencies.

"Until Congress does the same for the Marshals Service, it will always be considered a second rate political agency in the eyes of true professionals," Young wrote.

Traditionally, the marshal's job has gone to a prominent political figure from the same political party of the president in office. The White House has usually allowed local political figures in the 94 marshal districts to reach a consensus on a candidate for the job.

Reed Hillman , last year's unsuccessful Republican candidate for lieutenant governor and a former State Police commander, is expected to be nominated for the presidential appointment.

In a story published Monday, the Globe quoted two unnamed Massachusetts Republican officials who said that the White House has decided to give Hillman the job.

If President Bush nominates him, Hillman may face opposition in the Senate, which must confirm presidential nominations.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy has long advocated for professionalizing the Marshals Service, and last year added a provision to the Patriot Act establishing criteria for marshals, including four years of "command-level law enforcement management duties" and experience in courts or protecting court personnel.

Ask whether Kennedy intended to try to block Hillman's appointment, Melissa Wagoner , Kennedy's spokeswoman, pointed out that the White House has not submitted a nomination to the Senate.

Bush's previous appointee for US marshal in Boston was Anthony Dichio, a former state trooper later dismissed by the president for neglect of duty. Former governor Paul Cellucci, a Republican like Bush, nominated Dichio, who had spent several years at Cellucci's side as part of a State Police detail assigned to drive the governor to appointments and provide security for him.

Bush dismissed Dichio in 2005, after two Globe reporters documented Dichio's lax work habits and use of his government-owned vehicle for personal errands. An investigation by the US Justice Department, prompted by the Globe report, confirmed the newspaper's findings.

Dichio was named to the $130,000-a-year job over objections from the state's two US senators and from nine of its 10 House members, all of them Democrats. Critics said Dicho lacked experience in antiterrorism and management. The Marshals Service in Massachusetts includes a staff of about 120.

Nancy McGillivray, who served as marshal from 1994 to 2002, was an anomaly in the Marshals Service because she rose through the agency's ranks to get the top job. Yesterday, she echoed Young's assessment.

"You don't have the luxury of a learning curve as marshal," McGillivray said yesterday. "It's a demanding, professional law enforcement job."

Young's comments on the Marshals Service came at the end of a ruling in which he denied the claims of a deputy marshal who alleged that Dichio passed her over for a promotion due to gender bias.

DOJ_NMG_0138351

In his ruling, Young wrote that Dichio's actions were a result of personal hostility toward the deputy marshal, not gender discrimination.

Dichio could not be reached for comment last night.

IMMIGRATION:

Report: Man Shot By Agents Smuggled Pot Again (EPT)

El Paso Times, February 28, 2007

Eight months after he was shot in the buttocks by two former El Paso Border Patrol agents, a Mexican drug smuggler delivered $1 million worth of marijuana to a stash house in El Paso County, according to an investigative report by the Drug Enforcement Administration now in possession of a California congressman.

U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., held a news conference in Washington, D.C., today and held a redacted copy of the document up for reporters but did not pass out copies. Rohrabacher said he had been asked by the Justice Department not to do so because the report contained sensitive information.

U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton had repeatedly denied that the smuggler, Osvaldo Aldrete Davila, had been arrested again after he was shot in the buttocks by agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean in February 2005 during a botched smuggling attempt near Fabens. Rohrabacher said it was technically correct because Davila was not arrested but said Sutton was playing with words.

"They call that lying when you're not a lawyer," he said.

Ramos and Compean were convicted last year of violating Davila's civil rights and of tampering with evidence because they did not report the shooting and because Compean picked up his shell casings.

Ramos was sentenced to 11 years in prison and Compean of 12 years in prison. They started serving their time in January and are appealing the conviction. Their cause has been picked up by conservative activists, such as Minutemen groups, and elected officials.

It is not clear what the DEA report will mean for the agents as it is not directly related to the February shooting, but Rohrabacher said he smeared the character of the smuggler as the prosecution's star witness.

Rohrabacher said that prosecutors ignored the DEA report to "promote the false image of the smuggler" during trial. Prosecutors said that Davila was smuggling drugs because he didn't have enough money to renew his commercial driver's license in Mexico.

The second smuggling incident allegedly occurred Oct. 9, 2005, during a sting operation at a stash house where occupants identified Davila as the man who had just driven a load of marijuana to the house. Davila was gone by then but "They used his name, all the way down to his colostomy bag. How many smugglers carry a colostomy bag?" Rohrabacher said.

The bullet that hit Davila in February severed his urethra.

U.S. Attorney's officials issued a written statement, saying "The U.S. Attorney's office cannot comment about matters that are under seal or ongoing investigations. This office will pursue criminal charges where there is prosecutable criminal activity and competent evidence to prove it."

Davila's lawyer, Walter Boyaki, couldn t be reached for comment today. Davila is in Mexico and hasn't been back to El Paso since his court testimony.

Asked whether the publicity around the second incident could jeopardize possible efforts to prosecute Davila for the second offense, Rohrabacher said his focus was on freeing Compean and Ramos.

Davila was offered immunity in exchange for his testimony for the first incident, but not the second.

The DEA report was sealed evidence during the trial, according to trial transcripts in which lawyers refer to the incident as "the October load," and to the witness against Davila as Cipriano Ortiz. The defense's motion to unseal it was denied by a federal judge. But the evidence will be passed, sealed, to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

During the trial, Mary Stillinger, one of Ramos' attorneys, tried to introduce the evidence to the jurors.

DOJ_NMG_0138352

"My opinion is, your honor, that he's trying to portray himself as a very innocent person, and would not have any clue how marijuana is packaged. And I would like to ask, You didn't have any other experience with how marijuana was packaged?" she said according to official transcripts posted at www.usdoj.gov/usao/txw.

Her request was denied and Davila was allowed to plead the Fifth on any questions about his illegal activities before or after the shooting.

Smuggler Given Immunity Is Tied To New Drug Case (FWST)

By Dave Montgomery

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — A Mexican drug smuggler who testified under immunity that he was shot by two now-imprisoned Border Patrol agents was linked to a second drug-smuggling case in Texas that happened nearly eight months after the shooting, according to a Drug Enforcement Administration report.

The disclosure of the report, dated Oct. 25, 2005, sparked new demands for a congressional inquiry into the prosecution of agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Compean.

Each of the agents was sentenced to more than a decade in prison for shooting Mexican national Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila in the buttocks after he abandoned a van loaded with marijuana near Fabens, outside El Paso.

According to the previously sealed DEA report, Aldrete-Davila came to the attention of federal agents after being granted limited immunity to testify as the key witness against the two agents.

The occupant of a "stash house" in Clint, also near El Paso, identified "Osvaldo Davila" as the person who dropped off a 1990 Chevrolet Astro van containing six bundles of marijuana, the report said.

Agents seized 752.8 pounds of marijuana, valued at $602,240, from the van and a storage shed after an informant's tip led them to the house Oct. 23, 2005.

Cipriano Ortiz-Hernandez, who lived in the house, told agents that "Osvaldo Davila" had delivered the van a day earlier.

"Ortiz-Hernandez stated that he did not know that the van contained marijuana," the report said.

Davila was identified in the report as an illegal immigrant "who has a colostomy bag." Aldrete-Davila was forced to wear a colostomy bag after being treated in the United States for the wound inflicted in the shooting.

During his testimony Feb. 22-23, 2006, Aldrete-Davila acknowledged that he had been given limited immunity to testify against the two agents, but the government stressed that the immunity applied to his actions only on the day of the shooting.

He also said he planned to sue the government for $5 million to compensate for his injuries.

The DEA report, which began circulating on Capitol Hill on Wednesday, raised new questions about the government's handling of the case — particularly why Aldrete-Davila remained free after being tied to further trafficking activities.

Conservative lawmakers who have rallied behind the two agents also intensified their criticism of U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton of San Antonio, whose office prosecuted the case.

"We cannot comment about matters that are under seal or ongoing investigations," Sutton's office said in a statement. "This office will pursue criminal charges where there is prosecutable criminal activity and competent evidence to prove it.

"We have clearly stated that the immunity necessarily afforded to Aldrete-Davila in the investigation and trial of Ramos and Compean for the [Feb. 17] incident would not extend to any subsequent or future criminal activity that may be alleged."

The Inland Valley Daily Bulletin in Ontario, Calif., reported this week that DEA investigators believed that they had sufficient evidence to indict Aldrete-Davila in the second case, but their requests to do so were denied by prosecutors.

Rep. Ted Poe, R-Humble, a former district judge and prosecutor, called for a new trial for the two agents since the allegations in the DEA report were kept from jurors in the El Paso trial.

"I want to know why the federal government was so relentless in prosecuting the Border Patrol agents and not prosecuting a drug smuggler," Poe said. "He smuggled drugs on at least two occasions and he's more than just some mule."

More than 30 Republican House members, including Poe, urged House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and three key committee chairmen to open immediate hearings "into all aspects of this case."

DOJ_NMG_0138353

“Numerous and repeated attempts by members of Congress to ascertain the facts of this case with relevant federal agencies have been unsuccessful,” the lawmakers said in a letter released late Wednesday.

Man Shot By Agents Stashed Drugs After He Got Immunity (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

A Mexican national who was shot by U.S. Border Patrol agents after abandoning 743 pounds of marijuana on the Texas border brought a second drug load into the United States while waiting to testify under a grant of immunity against the now-imprisoned agents, according to unreleased federal documents.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) documents, which remain under seal, show that Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila was the focus of a drug investigation into his reported stashing of 750 pounds of marijuana in a van at a house in Clint, Texas, in November 2005 -- nine months after he was shot in the buttocks near Fabens, Texas, while running from Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean.

The agents have since been sentenced to 11 and 12 years, respectively, in prison. Clint is eight miles northwest of Fabens in what law-enforcement authorities describe as a popular drug smuggling corridor.

The DEA's investigative reports, according to law-enforcement authorities and others, said a witness identified Aldrete-Davila as the van's driver, and that the owner of the house, Cipriano Ortiz-Hernandez, picked Aldrete-Davila from a display of several photos.

The authorities also said the reports show that the homeowner's brother, Jose Ortiz, told agents that Aldrete-Davila had brought the marijuana into the country from Juarez, Mexico, and identified him as "the person who was shot by Border Patrol agents."

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican, said the DEA reports show that prosecutors misled the public about their "star witness" in the transport of a second load of drugs, adding that U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton knowingly presented a false picture of the drug smuggler "to justify his ruthless prosecution."

He said that under Mr. Sutton's direction, prosecutors characterized the smuggler as an innocent victim, "which is clearly not the case," and when Mr. Sutton's office was told by the DEA of Aldrete-Davila's involvement in a second offense, "chose to disregard the information."

"Sutton's continuous attempts to paint a benign picture of the drug smuggler is not only disingenuous, but amounts to misleading the jury and the public when questioned about the second offense," he said. "Only an unscrupulous lawyer would believe this is an acceptable tactic."

Shana Jones, spokeswoman for Mr. Sutton, told The Washington Times yesterday that the prosecutor's office could not comment about matters under seal or on ongoing investigations.

"This office will pursue criminal charges where there is prosecutable criminal activity and competent evidence to prove it," Ms. Jones said. "We have clearly stated that the immunity necessarily afforded to Aldrete-Davila in the investigation and trial of Ramos and Compean for the February 17 incident would not extend to any subsequent or future criminal activity that may be alleged.

"It is truly unfortunate that some members of Congress have inaccurately implied that such immunity would be extended beyond the scope of this trial," she said.

Mr. Rohrabacher's spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, confirmed yesterday that her boss had a copy of the reports but said he had no intention of disclosing information from them that could be damaging to an ongoing investigation. She said he sought only to establish Aldrete-Davila's suspected involvement in a second drug-smuggling incident.

Ramos, 37, and Compean, 28, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso, Texas, on charges of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

The conviction came after Aldrete-Davila was located in Mexico by Homeland Security investigators and given immunity by Mr. Sutton's office in exchange for his testimony against the agents. The immunity agreement protected Aldrete-Davila from being charged in this country with drug smuggling.

Aldrete-Davila was shot after he ignored orders by the agents to stop his vehicle. Court records show he jumped from his van and ran south to the Rio Grande, where he was confronted on foot by Compean. Although wounded, Aldrete-Davila crossed the border and escaped in a waiting van.

Both agents testified that they thought Aldrete-Davila had a gun in his hand and feared for their lives when they fired shots at him.

Official: Mexican Drug Runner Shot By Border Agents Smuggled More Drugs Into U.S. (FOX)

Fox News, February 28, 2007

The Mexican drug runner whose testimony sent two Border Patrol agents to prison for shooting him in the buttocks brought drugs into the United States more than once, thereby diminishing his credibility as a witness in the investigation, according to a California congressman.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., presented new evidence in a Capitol Hill press conference Wednesday that revealed what he says was U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton's deliberate attempt to mislead the public about Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila's involvement in the transport of a second load of drugs in October 2005.

Aldrete-Davila testified before a jury that former Border Patrol Agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos shot him in February 2005 as he tried to run away from them near the U.S.-Mexico border in Texas. He was given immunity from prosecution in March 2005 for his cooperation in that investigation and subsequent trial, which culminated last year.

The Mexican was smuggling more than 700 pounds of marijuana into the United States at the time. Compean and Ramos were convicted last year and are serving 11 and 12 years, respectively, in separate federal prisons for the non-fatal shooting.

But the Drug Enforcement Agency found that Aldrete-Davila brought in another vanload of drugs into the United States while he waited to testify against the agents. Some reports say he stashed up to 750 pounds of marijuana at a house in Clint, Texas.

Rohrabacher said Sutton knowingly presented a false picture of the primary witness in the case.

"The U.S. Attorney's Office presented to the jury and presented to the public as if this guy Davila was a benign, hapless Mexican man who had just been recruited to drive a truck in order to raise money for medical expenses for his mother," Rohrabacher told FOXNews.com.

"Had the jury known that there were indications that he was a professional and he lied to his handlers even after they had granted him immunity for the first time, his testimony would have been worthless and it also suggests that he was more likely to have been carrying a weapon."

One of the border agents claimed they may have seen a weapon in Aldrete-Davila's hand during the incident. But the prosecutor said there was no evidence that he had a gun.

Aldrete-Davila was given immunity by the U.S. government and also received a border crossing card to come to and from Mexico to get free medical care in the United States for a bullet lodged in his body. Rohrabacher's office said it's unsure how many times Aldrete-Davila crossed the border during this time.

But the congressman says evidence has emerged that Sutton's office was notified by the DEA of Aldrete-Davila's direct involvement in the second offense but that it was ignored.

"The second offense goes just to the heart of the credibility of the Justice Department's primary witness against Compean and Ramos," Rohrabacher told FOXNews.com.

The documents Rohrabacher has is the report of investigation completed by the DEA.

DOJ_NMG_0138355

"Our purpose here is not to endanger any agents" or reveal any information that may hurt the government's case, the congressman's spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, told FOXNews.com on Wednesday. "But we do want people to understand we are in possession of documents that support the reports about Davila's involvement in a second drug-smuggling incident."

The DEA directed calls regarding what's known as the 'October load' investigation to Sutton, who represents the Western District of Texas. A prosecutor under Sutton handled the Compean-Ramos case.

"We cannot comment about matters that are under seal or ongoing investigations. This office will pursue criminal charges where there is prosecutable criminal activity and competent evidence to prove it," Sutton said in a statement.

"We have clearly stated that the immunity necessarily afforded to Aldrete-Davila in the investigation and trial of Ramos and Compean for the Feb. 17 incident would not extend to any subsequent or future criminal activity that may be alleged. It is truly unfortunate that some members of Congress have inaccurately implied that such immunity would be extended beyond the scope of this trial."

Some lawmakers in Congress, as well as Border Patrol activist groups, claim Sutton failed to prosecute the "real" criminal in the matter — the drug runner — and instead went after two Border Patrol agents just doing their jobs. Sutton, for his part, has argued that the law clearly states the mandatory sentences for such a shooting, and that there is no exemption for law enforcement. He has acknowledged to FOXNews.com, however, that 11 and 12 years in prison for such a crime may be extreme.

Champions of Ramos and Compean have asked President Bush to pardon the two agents, but to no avail.

A Justice Department lawyer on Wednesday told FOXNews.com that so far, the agency had not received any petition for clemency for either of the agents.

But in order to be eligible for a pardon approved by the Justice Department — which makes pardon recommendations to the president — five years must have elapsed from the day an individual was released from prison. Commutation is a shortening of one's sentence, but in order to be eligible for that, the person serving the sentence cannot be legally challenging his case.

However, the president can also make either decision on his own, regardless of the Justice recommendation.

Friends of the Border Patrol on Wednesday called for the firing of Sutton, along with other assistant U.S. attorneys who helped prosecute Compean and Ramos for what it calls "the malicious prosecution" of the two ex-agents and for "hiding key evidence from and lying to the American people, as well as harboring, aiding and providing comfort to a known drug smuggler, Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, who illegally entered the U.S. from Mexico, assaulted Agent Compean, brandished a firearm towards two federal agents, resisted arrest and transported narcotics across international boundaries on multiple occasions."

The prosecution in the case says Aldrete-Davila did not have a gun, even though at least one of the agents thought he saw what could have been a weapon in his hand at the time of the shooting.

Friends of the Border Patrol also called for the resignation of Judge Kathleen Cardone, who it says "did everything possible to aid the prosecution in this witch-hunt, including sealing evidence and testimony that clearly would have damaged the credibility of the government's case and their alleged 'victim.'"

Fresh Start On Immigration Overhaul (LAT)

By Adam Schreck

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush is committed to working with Congress on an overhaul of immigration laws, two Cabinet officials told a Senate panel Wednesday, but they hedged on the contentious issue of whether people who come to the U.S. illegally should have a path to citizenship.

The administration's priority is to secure the nation's borders and convince the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to "come out of the shadows," Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez told the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"I'm not sure that everyone wants to be a U.S. citizen. Many just want to be able to work, and if they can work legally, one day they would like to go back home," he said. "So I don't think that citizenship is what will make them come out of the shadows."

In the first hearing on immigration policy since the Democrats took over Congress, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff emphasized that any changes in the law should not amount to amnesty.

"We cannot give those who are here illegally because they've broken the law a leg up and an advantage over those who have played by the rules," he said.

Many Republicans, particularly in the House, broke with Bush last year over his support for what the White House has called "comprehensive immigration reform."

"I don't believe that House Republicans would support a bill that creates a path to citizenship for people who came to the country illegally," said Amos Snead, a spokesman for House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.).

In his testimony, Chertoff emphasized the need for tighter border security and tougher workplace enforcement measures. Praising a workplace crackdown last week in California and 16 other states, he said harsher penalties were needed to prevent workers from entering the country illegally.

But under questioning by committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), Chertoff and Gutierrez conceded that, for the most part, illegal workers were not taking jobs away from Americans. Asked about the likelihood of rounding up everyone here illegally, Chertoff acknowledged that "it would be a gargantuan task to try to locate, detain and deport 12 million people."

The hearing follows a renewed behind-the-scenes push by the White House to get a comprehensive overhaul passed before 2008 presidential and congressional campaigning swings into high gear. At least in broad terms, Bush agrees with congressional Democrats that the immigration laws — last revised on a large scale in 1986 — need significant retooling.

Last year, the Senate, then under GOP control, approved legislation that hewed closely to Bush's proposals. The bill, passed by a vote of 62 to 36, would have given many illegal immigrants a chance to pursue citizenship, created a guest worker program, tightened sanctions on companies employing illegal workers and authorized hundreds of miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

But the House refused to consider anything beyond a tight focus on border security and enforcement, dooming the wider approach.

Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.), who drafted last year's bill, plan to introduce a new version soon. Reps. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Luis V. Gutierrez (D-Ill.) are working on similar legislation on the House side. Flake said in a written statement that the issue offered a rare chance for the president and Congress "to come together and enact meaningful, substantive legislation."

"Republicans as a whole aren't that much different than Democrats as a whole — they want some type of comprehensive reform," he said in a telephone interview.

Not everyone is on the same page, however. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) suggested during Wednesday's hearing that senators "may have reached too far in the comprehensive bill" last year and would be better off tackling the issue piece by piece.

Leahy warned that whatever the approach, the road ahead wouldn't be easy.

"This is going to be a long process," he said. "The most important point in this whole thing is where the president is going to be, and where he's going to be publicly on this."

White House Renews Effort To Overhaul Laws (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush waded gingerly back into the debate over immigration Wednesday, as two of his top lieutenants urged Congress to grant "legal status" to an estimated 12 million people now living in the country illegally.

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff stopped short, however, of endorsing a plan to give illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship. "I believe what people want first and foremost is to have legal status," Gutierrez said. "I don't think everyone wants to be a citizen."

RELATED: Fee increase could curb citizenship applications

The two men's appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee marks the beginning of an effort to revive a sweeping overhaul of the nation's immigration laws — a debate that last year set off a wave of demonstrations across the country. Legislation bogged down late in the last Congress when House Republican leaders refused to take up a Senate-passed bill that won Bush's public stamp of approval.

DOJ_NMG_0138357

The Senate bill provided for improved border security, tougher penalties for employers who hire illegal aliens, a tamper-proof Social Security card, an expanded "guest worker" program to allow foreigners to work in the USA and a chance at citizenship for those living and working in the country illegally. But some Republican critics, such as Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., said the bill was too lenient, equating the citizenship provision to amnesty.

Last year's election improved the bill's chances for passage by putting Democrats in charge of both the House and Senate and ousting several leading Republican critics of the Senate immigration bill, such as J.D. Hayworth of Arizona and John Hostettler of Indiana. Voters were "clearly rejecting … the hard-line, tough-guy posture," said Cecilia Muñoz of the National Council of La Raza, a Hispanic advocacy group that backed the legislation. Muñoz said this year — a non-election year — is "the best window we're going to have" for passage of legislation that "could be a, if not the, major piece of the president's domestic legacy."

Bush seems to agree. At a press conference last month, the president said he sees "an interesting opportunity" to work with Democrats to enact legislation he has sought since his first term.

Once again, the chief sticking point appears likely to be fate of the nation's illegal population. "We can't kick them out of our country," Bush said at his press conference in February. At the Senate hearing, Chertoff said deporting all of them would be "a gargantuan task."

Democrats argue that offering an eventual chance at citizenship is the only way to guarantee the elimination of an exploitable underclass of workers. "We need to establish a path to citizenship that is fair and predictable," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., was to have said in remarks scheduled for delivery Wednesday night to the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund. "It may be a path of many steps, but the endpoint must be clear and attainable."

Under last year's Senate bill, illegal immigrants could seek citizenship if they hold a job, pay taxes, take English classes, pay a fine for their illegal entry and have not committed any felonies. "This is not amnesty," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., who was one of the leading opponents of the Senate bill and who is now the third-ranking member of the Senate Republican leadership, said in an interview outside the hearing that the two Cabinet secretaries refusal to commit to the citizenship approach was deliberate.

"Everybody's being cautious about being very specific there because clearly that's where the final compromises have to come if there's going to be legislation," Kyl said. The senator said that Republican opponents of last year's Senate bill might be willing to go along with a deal that offers some, but not all, illegal immigrants a chance to gain legal status "if there are other factors put into the mix." He put the chances of enacting a bill this year at "better than 50-50."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., warned that enacting a bill "is not going to be an easy process." That cheers Ira Mehlman of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which opposed last year's Senate-passed bill. He predicted that lawmakers will remain split over the immigration bills most controversial provisions. "There aren't very many Republicans left who are prepared to go marching off a cliff with George Bush anymore," Mehlman said.

On the other end of the spectrum, Sonia Ramirez of the AFL-CIO said labor won't back an immigration bill unless it contains safeguards that protect foreign workers from abuse and domestic workers from job loss. She also said the unions favor "a path to citizenship" for those who have been living and working in the country illegally.

Bush Aides Pledge Work For Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — Two senior Bush administration officials vowed on Wednesday to work with Congress to ensure passage of immigration legislation this year but publicly distanced themselves from proposals that would place most illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship.

Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff suggested that offering temporary legal status, instead of citizenship, to illegal immigrants would be enough to persuade them to emerge from the shadows and register with the government, which has been a key national security goal.

The officials were testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee as lawmakers worked out the final details of a broad immigration bill that could be introduced in the Senate as early as next week. Last year, the Senate passed bipartisan immigration legislation that would have provided citizenship to most illegal immigrants who paid fines and back taxes and learned English.

That legislation stalled in the face of fierce opposition from House Republicans, but this year's bill is expected to include a similar proposal. Democrats and Republicans believe that prospects for passage are far better in this Democratic-controlled Congress, but the contentious debate over citizenship underscores the difficulties ahead.

The citizenship measure has been derided by conservatives as amnesty and hailed by some Democrats, Republicans and immigrant advocates as a provision that will encourage millions of illegal immigrants to come forward. In August, President Bush suggested that he supported such proposals, saying they sounded like "a reasonable way to treat people with respect."

But on Wednesday, Mr. Gutierrez and Mr. Chertoff declined to endorse the measure. Mr. Gutierrez said many illegal immigrants might prefer working here for several years and returning home.

"That is something we need to discuss, we need to think through," Mr. Gutierrez said. "There is a path today to citizenship, so it is not as if we need to create a new path to citizenship."

"What people want first and foremost is legal status," he said. "I'm not sure everybody wants to be a U.S. citizen. Many just want to be able to work. And if they can work legally, one day they would like to go back home."

Mr. Chertoff noted that only about a third of the illegal immigrants granted legal status as a result of legislation passed in 1986 actually ended up applying for citizenship. "A significant majority did not become citizens," he said.

It was unclear whether the officials were simply trying to ease conservative concerns about the citizenship question or whether Mr. Bush had actually shifted his position. Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, said Mr. Bush still supported a path to citizenship that would include payments of fines back taxes and a requirement to learn English, among other things. But it seemed unlikely that the two cabinet secretaries would make such remarks without first consulting the White House.

But advocates for immigrants warned that legislation without a path to citizenship would be unacceptable to many Democrats and some Republicans. They also objected to another proposal suggested by Mr. Chertoff, which would limit judicial review of decisions made by immigration officials determining eligibility for the legalization program.

"Without the inclusion of a path to citizenship in a legalization program, you are essentially creating a permanent underclass in our country," said Bishop Gerald Barnes of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops Committee on Migration.

Lawmakers also highlighted other concerns. Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who was a key architect of last year's bill, complained that he and other Republicans were being shut out of negotiations over the new legislation.

Meanwhile, Senator Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat who supported the bill last year, said she now believed it was overly broad and susceptible to fraud.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said Mr. Bush would have to ensure that lawmakers came together. "It's not going to be an easy process," Mr. Leahy said.

Immigration Minefield For '08 Hopefuls (HILL)

By Elana Schor And Ian Swanson

The Hill, March 1, 2007

The imminent release of a new Senate immigration bill exposes a minefield of political hazards for the six senators chasing their parties' presidential nominations.

Senate leaders on both sides of the aisle have expressed readiness to restart the debate over combining border enforcement with a path to earned citizenship for illegal immigrants in the country. Yet Democrats now face high expectations on immigration after campaigning on last year's failure to reach a conference on comprehensive reform, and the Senate GOP's two 2008 candidates face their own backlash over backing the bill last year.

The White House contender most openly staking his electoral fortunes on immigration is Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who is putting the finishing touches on this year's edition of the reform bill he offered last year with Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.).

DOJ_NMG_0138359

Their measure could emerge as quickly as next week, with McCain helping corral Republican conference members who are wary of sitting down with newly empowered Democrats.

At a Judiciary Committee hearing yesterday that kick-started the immigration debate, ranking Republican Arlen Specter (Pa.) reflected the concerns of some members and aides that McCain and Kennedy were not bringing their colleagues to the table early on.

"I have been concerned about reading what is happening behind the scenes in the newspapers," Specter said, adding that he had told Kennedy twice of the lack of staff-level communication.

Kennedy spokeswoman Laura Capps disputed the notion that members were on the sidelines, citing informal talks that have occurred off the floor. One key Republican not present at those talks, however, was Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), now among McCain's presidential primary foes.

Brownback is as conscious as McCain of the conservative base's discontent with last year's Senate immigration bill, and any changes seen as left-leaning — such as the elimination of the three-tiered path to citizenship in last year's legislation — could sway the Kansan to vote no this time around.

One Senate GOP aide noted that Republicans were more willing to swallow unsavory elements of the dense immigration bill because they knew their leadership was ultimately in control: "Even if they somehow come up with a bill that's where it was last year, the conferees are going to be Democrats, not Republicans."

Another Republican staffer agreed that McCain has much to lose in this year's run at immigration reform.

"[For conservatives], the fight is going to be multiplied this year because of concerns that [Speaker Nancy] Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Ted Kennedy and McCain will be in charge," the aide said. "This is definitely a strange timing for this in [McCain's] courtship of conservatives."

Meanwhile, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) voiced grievances of her own that could haunt presidentially inclined Democrats. Feinstein said earlier this week that she had seen no details of the Kennedy-McCain draft, adding plainly that she has "no investment" in that bill.

Feinstein, whose state boasts the highest number of electoral votes in the nation, said yesterday that she favored pursuing two narrower immigration plans instead of comprehensive reform: AgJobs, which would provide temporary worker visas to agricultural workers; and the DREAM Act, which calls for children of illegal immigrants to achieve legal status while seeking college degrees.

Four 2008 candidates already have cosponsored Feinstein's AgJobs bill this year: Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and McCain. Potential candidate Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) has also signed on. All five have been sponsors since 2005, and Democratic candidate John Edwards was also a sponsor during his time in the Senate.

Democrats like Clinton and Obama are caught between groups representing Hispanics, the fastest-growing voting bloc in the U.S., and traditional allies in organized labor who want to ensure an immigration bill does not hurt U.S. workers.

Labor organizations took different positions on last year's bill. Unite Here! which represents textile workers, and the Service Employees International Union supported the Kennedy-McCain bill, but the nation's broadest union, the AFL-CIO, opposed it, as did the Teamsters.

AFL-CIO legislative representative Sonya Ramirez described this as "more of a fracture than a split" and said it would be a mischaracterization to think labor was not fully engaged in last year's debate.

"I think that's a convenient notion," she said. "Because we refused to actively oppose bills in the last cycle, people think we had disagreements and kept them to ourselves."

She said the AFL-CIO's engagement on the issue resulted in amendments added to the Kennedy-McCain bill by Obama, which Ramirez said are likely to be included in the bill Kennedy and McCain are preparing.

Amendments introduced by the Illinois senator last year were approved by voice vote and required that temporary workers be paid a "prevailing wage." Obama also would have restricted the use of a new visa for low-skilled workers in areas with unemployment rates above 9 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0138360

This year, however, Ramirez said there is no guarantee that the group won't actively oppose immigration-reform legislation. For example, the AFL-CIO did not support any of the major immigration bills considered in the upper chamber last year, and has clear policies stating that temporary-worker programs would be disastrous to U.S. labor standards, Ramirez said.

Angela Kelley, deputy director of the National Immigration Forum, acknowledged that Democratic presidential candidates will want to show they are not soft on immigration. Still, she added, it will be difficult for presidential candidates not to support immigration reform because of the burgeoning engagement of Latino voters.

The Democrats' dilemma was illustrated earlier this year, when Hispanic-American radio host and blogger Mario Solis-Marich seized upon an interview with former national party chairman and Clinton ally Terry McAuliffe. Solis-Marich launched McAuliffe's comment that "you've got to shut the borders down" around the blogosphere, reminding Clinton that "Latinos have a choice in '08." The Clinton campaign promptly noted that McAuliffe did not speak for the senator.

Secrecy Could Kill Immigration Reform (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's secret work on an immigration bill threatens the chance of passing any guest-worker program this year, warned Sen. Arlen Specter, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee.

"If you want to be in at the landing, you have to be in at the takeoff," Mr. Specter of Pennsylvania yesterday cautioned Mr. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, saying Mr. Kennedy has broken a promise to consult with other senators' staffs on a new bill. That bill, details of which were first reported by The Washington Times, would grant citizenship rights to most illegal aliens already in the U.S.

President Bush dispatched two Cabinet secretaries to testify to the Judiciary Committee yesterday as the Senate restarted the immigration debate, which stalled last year because of a deep split among Republicans on the issue.

But Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez undercut Mr. Bush's own rationale for supporting citizenship rights for illegal aliens. Mr. Gutierrez said a temporary-worker program alone would be enough to encourage illegal aliens to come forward, even without the prospect of citizenship.

"I don't think that citizenship is what will make them come out of the shadows, it's just the opportunity to have legal status so they don't have to be in the shadows," Mr. Gutierrez said.

Mr. Specter's warning and Mr. Gutierrez's comments underscore how even with a Democratic majority, which is in line with Mr. Bush on immigration, Congress will struggle to pass a bill this year.

The Senate last year passed a bill that created a path to citizenship for illegal aliens for those who have lived here the longest, while denying it to recent arrivals. It also boosted homeland security and created a new foreign worker program that included a path to citizenship for future workers.

That had the support of Mr. Bush, who called it "a good immigration bill."

But House Republicans said it amounted to an amnesty for most illegal aliens, and they refused to bring it up, instead forcing the Senate to pass an enforcement bill that includes building hundreds of miles of double-tier fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick V. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, called the barrier a "Potemkin fence" and said the money would be "wasted" in building it.

Yesterday, he and other senators bristled at the "amnesty" label. Some of them pleaded with the secretaries to help them come up with a way to avoid the label.

"This amnesty question will dominate this debate," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, who supports citizenship rights for most illegal aliens.

Even as Mr. Kennedy and Mr. McCain work in private, they appear to have lost one key Democratic supporter. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, said that bill was too broad, that the guest-worker program for future workers was too big and that splitting illegal aliens based on their time here was too open to fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0138361

"I am now of the opinion that we may have reached too far in the comprehensive bill and that we ought to take a look at doing this" in stages, she said.

Three years after Mr. Bush proposed his own guest-worker plan -- at the time it included a temporary guest-worker program but not a path to citizenship for illegal aliens -- the administration still does not have specifics on cost or even how long it would take to get a program up and running.

Under questioning by Mr. Kennedy, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff could not say how much time it would take to create and issue tamperproof identity cards or create the infrastructure for businesses to check on workers' identities. But Mr. Chertoff said the administration has made big strides on immigration law enforcement.

"I want to emphasize we're not done, but we're moving in the right direction," he said. "I think it's beginning to earn some credibility with the public."

Also at yesterday's hearing, Mr. Chertoff said the federal government will insist that states adopt secure driver's licenses that can weed out illegal aliens and identity fraud, turning back moves by several states to opt out of the requirements of the Real ID Act.

"Secure driver's licenses was maybe the top recommendation made by the 9/11 commission. It's not only critical for national security and homeland security; it also happens to be a very big step forward in protecting privacy," he said.

Mr. Chertoff also said he expects today to announce the rules to implement the 2005 law.

Fee Increase Could Curb Citizenship Applications (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, March 1, 2007

Construction worker Martin Delgado paid $845 to the U.S. government to have the chance for his wife and children join him as citizens in Arizona.

Under a proposed set of fee increases, Delgado would have had to pay nearly three times as much, or $2,595. The Tucson resident said citizenship for his family is worth the higher price.

"I'm willing to sacrifice to give my family the opportunity to live here legally," says Delgado, 41, a native of Mexico who has worked in the USA since 2000.

RELATED: White House renews effort to overhaul laws

The Citizenship and Immigration Service says the fee hikes will allow it to hire more staff and upgrade its creaky system so applications can be approved faster. Among its proposals is to raise the application fee for citizenship from $330 to $595 and the fee for legal permanent residency from $325 to $905.

Advocates for immigrants say the cost may price out the poor from becoming citizens.

Patricia Mejia, a Tucson immigration attorney, calls the increases "frightening."

"I've never seen an increase like that. It's outrageous," she says.

Emilio Gonzalez, director of the Citizenship and Immigration Service, says he knows some people may have to save more to become U.S. citizens. But Gonzalez says most people seeking residency here are, like the Delgados, able to afford the higher fees and consider their families worth the price.

According to agency records, the vast majority of people who apply for the required first step of permanent legal residency (commonly referred to as having a "green card") have jobs in the USA or are joining their spouses or parents as citizens.

In 2005, 1.1 million people received legal permanent resident status. Of those:

•649,000 are applications to unify with family members

•220,000 were people working and seeking entry based on their professions, job skills, or because they had jobs considered a priority by the U.S. government.

Of those, 134,861 had jobs in management or similar positions.

•160,000 people had sales, service, farming or similar jobs.

"This is a user fee, and the people benefiting from the service should be the ones to foot the bill," says Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform in Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0138362

Mehlman's group, which seeks to improve border security and reduce immigration levels to about 300,000 people a year, says the proposed new fees are still a bargain for U.S. residency. "When you compare value to cost, it is fairly insignificant," he says.

Covering agency costs

The fee for the most commonly filed application, permanent residency or "green card," will increase $580 under Gonzalez's proposal. Other fees will be reduced and some will rise even more.

The fee for an investor (someone who qualifies as having the means to create jobs) seeking a green card would go from $475 to $2,850. About 45 applications a year fall in that category, says Rendell Jones, chief financial officer of the agency.

Gonzalez says the impact of the proposed increase for a green card is not as steep as it sounds.

He says under the current system, many people periodically pay $180 for work permits while waiting for permanent residency. Under the proposed fee structure, those work permit fees will disappear, Gonzalez said.

The law makes provision for fees to be waived in some cases, and 6% of green cards are granted without fee, according to the agency. Most waivers are for refugees and those seeking political asylum.

All of the fee increases proposed are undergoing a 60-day period of public comment. That ends April 2. And if all goes as planned, Gonzalez says he hopes the agency can implement the fees in June. "Any time you raise fees, it's going to affect people. That's a given," he says. Even so, higher fees are "something we feel is not onerous," especially given what the money will do.

The Citizenship and Immigration Service gets its entire budget from its fees. The increases will add an estimated $1 billion a year to its annual budget of close to $2 billion, says Michael Aytes, associate director for operations.

Aytes says higher fees will allow the agency to digitize applications and hopefully reduce waiting times for applicants by 20% by 2009.

"It's far more important that we charge a fee to cover the necessary cost of processing cases in the right way, in the right amount of time, than to lowball fees" and have poorer services, Aytes says.

Long waits, system glitches

Wait times for processing average six months. The agency says applicants sometimes complain that they become lost in the system. That happened to the Delgados, whose original applications were lost by the agency and had to be refiled, says Mejia, their lawyer.

Some in Congress such as Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., chairwoman of a House Judiciary subcommittee on immigration, questions whether the fee increases will prevent impoverished people from trying to become Americans.

The agency says it grants waivers to those who can show they can't afford to pay fees. But to get a green card, immigrants must make enough income to support themselves or have a financial sponsor. Pleading poverty to get a fee waiver could make one ineligible.

Gonzalez admitted "there is an inconsistency" in the policy. Mejia said people who can't pay the higher costs may choose to do something both sides of the debate dislike: remain in the country illegally.

Delgado, who brought carpentry skills with him from Mexico, makes about $32,000 a year and considers himself fortunate to have a job that allows him to bring his family here. As good a life is not possible where he is from, he says. He, his wife Ana Maria, and their sons Daniel, 11, and Luis, 13, are all here from Mexico under temporary permits.

For him, almost no price seems too high to pay.

"It's something I'm willing to do because it will give my family more stability, more opportunities here in the United States," Delgado says.

Colorado To Use Inmates To Fill Migrant Shortage (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

DENVER — Ever since passing what its Legislature promoted as the nation's toughest laws against illegal immigration last summer, Colorado has struggled with a labor shortage as migrants fled the state. This week, officials announced a novel solution: Use convicts as farmworkers.

DOJ_NMG_0138363

The Department of Corrections hopes to launch a pilot program this month — thought to be the first of its kind — that would contract with more than a dozen farms to provide inmates who will pick melons, onions and peppers.

Crops were left to spoil in the fields after the passage of legislation that required state identification to get government services and allowed police to check suspects' immigration status.

"The reason this [program] started is to make sure the agricultural industry wouldn't go out of business," state Rep. Dorothy Butcher said. Her district includes Pueblo, near the farmland where the inmates will work.

Prisoners who are a low security risk may choose to work in the fields, earning 60 cents a day. They also are eligible for small bonuses.

The inmates will be watched by prison guards, who will be paid by the farms. The cost is subject to negotiation, but farmers say they expect to pay more for the inmate labor and its associated costs than for their traditional workers.

Advocates on both sides of the immigration debate said they were stunned by the proposal.

"If they can't get slaves from Mexico, they want them from the jails," said Mark Krikorian of the Center for Immigration Studies in Washington, which favors restrictions on immigration.

Ricardo Martinez of the Denver immigrant rights group Padres Unidos asked: "Are we going to pull in inmates to work in the service industry too? You won't have enough inmates — unless you start importing them from Texas."

Farmers said they weren't happy with the solution, but their livelihoods are on the verge of collapse.

"This prison labor is not a cure for the immigration problem; it's just a Band-Aid," farmer Joe Pisciotta said.

He said he needed to be sure he would have enough workers for the harvest this fall before he planted watermelons, onions and pumpkins on his 700-acre farm in Avondale. But he's not thrilled with the idea of criminals working his fields.

"I've got young kids," he said. "It's something I've got to think about."

Pisciotta said he hoped the program highlighted what he viewed as the absurdity of Colorado's position — dependent on immigrant labor but trying to chase migrants away. He said the people leaving were not just those who entered the country illegally.

"Some of them have said, 'We think our paperwork is in order, but how about if it's not and we get caught on a glitch,' " he said.

Ever since the Democratic-controlled Legislature took a tough turn on immigration, the new requirements have worried those in the country legally and illegally.

Immigrant advocates allege that some sheriffs have authorized deputies to pull over Latino drivers on supposed speeding violations and ask them whether they are in the country legally.

And more stringent requirements put into effect last year made it harder to get a driver's license. Numerous U.S. citizens, including the daughter of a state legislator, were refused licenses because they lacked proper proof of citizenship. A judge has since ruled that the requirements must be revised.

Social service agencies say they have discovered few illegal immigrants on public assistance since the laws were passed.

Immigrant and business groups agree that the heated rhetoric has led to an exodus of Latinos — though no one is sure how many. Businesses including carwashes and construction firms have complained of a worker shortage.

"It's like, 'Don't go visit that house, there's a guy with a shotgun at the door,' " said state Rep. Rafael Gallegos, who represents a heavily Latino agricultural district in south-central Colorado. He voted against most of the legislation.

Farmers on Monday met with state officials at the Capitol here to discuss using inmate labor. The Department of Corrections expects to begin sending about 100 prisoners to work on farms near Pueblo this month.

Some of the state's 22,000 prisoners have agricultural experience. Convicts can participate in programs on prison grounds to break wild horses and grow crops. About 700 inmates work in other jobs outside prison, such as on fire crews.

Ari Zavaras, the executive director of the Department of Corrections, said he knew of no other prison system in the nation using convicts to fill agricultural labor shortages.

In California, where growers also have complained about a lack of workers, inmates have not labored in private fields since the 1940s. Prisoners then were used as farmhands while laborers were fighting in World War II, said Terry Thornton, a spokeswoman for the California Department of Corrections.

DOJ_NMG_0138364

"The idea [of using prisoners on farms] has been floated before, but these are not unskilled jobs. They're jobs that require a lot of training and supervision," said David Kranz, a spokesman for the California Farm Bureau Federation. "It doesn't seem like a very practical alternative."

Krikorian, of the Center for Immigration Studies, said the Colorado prison experiment was "a sign that there are solutions other than importing foreign labor."

He said "ultimately they're going to have to improve the wages and working conditions" to attract legal workers, as well as to mechanize parts of their farming operations.

Colorado's experience shows that hard-line measures have an effect on illegal immigrants, Krikorian added, noting that arrests had dropped along the U.S.-Mexico border since security was increased last year.

"We're seeing enforcement work, not just in Colorado," he said, "but all over the country."

TAX:

I.R.S. Finds Tax Errors In Reports Of Nonprofits (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

Some 600 charities and foundations have had to file amended tax forms after an Internal Revenue Service study found flaws in the way they reported payments to executives and other employees.

The I.R.S. has also asked 40 individuals to pay a total of $20 million in excise taxes, which is the penalty it imposes when it determines a nonprofit executive has been paid excessively.

“We found some problems,” said Steven T. Miller, the commissioner in charge of the I.R.S. division overseeing tax-exempt and government entities. “Whether they were due to confusion, poor design of the tax forms used by these organizations or something more nefarious, I can’t tell you.”

He said the results of the inquiry, which found flaws in the tax forms of a third of the 1,800 charities and foundations examined, convinced the agency that it needed to do more in the area of compensation at nonprofits.

The names of the affected organizations and executives were not released.

Organizations that had to file amended returns either failed to report, or reported incorrectly, perquisites like an executive’s personal use of an organization’s vehicles, travel payments for spouses of executives or other payments and reimbursements, I.R.S. officials said.

Those whose executives have been asked to pay penalties may have failed to use comparable figures from similar organizations in setting compensation or otherwise failed to justify executive pay levels.

“That shouldn’t be read to mean that high compensation wasn’t paid in the other cases,” Mr. Miller cautioned. “What it means is that in some cases where we found high compensation — and we did find it — the organization has done a good job of using comparables and establishing a procedure to determine it.”

The results of the study highlight problems with what many regard as primary tools for assessing nonprofits, the forms they file with the I.R.S. and many state governments, which become public record.

“For better or for worse, the tax form is the nonprofit disclosure instrument,” said Peter Swords, an expert on nonprofit tax reporting and the former head of the New York Nonprofit Coordinating Committee. “It is to nonprofits what the whole S.E.C. regime is to regulated companies, and it is something that ought to be taken very seriously.”

Last week, Dan Prives, a blogger and former finance director at World Relief, questioned the way Yale University completes parts of its tax forms.

Mr. Prives noted on his blog, www.wheremostneeded.org, that the university, which has one of the largest endowments in the nation, does not fully report on its securities transactions, nor does it describe what portion of specific expenses were spent on its programs, administration and fund-raising. In contrast, Harvard provides that information in its tax forms.

DOJ_NMG_0138365

"It surprised me because usually A-list nonprofits like Yale are pretty accurate in their reporting," Mr. Prives said in a telephone interview. "It threw a whole monkey wrench into my thinking about what's being achieved by publishing these forms. You can have errors in plain sight and nobody's picking it up."

Tom Conroy, a Yale spokesman, said the university did not break down specific expenses but did report totals spent on administration and fund-raising. "We believe we follow an option that's provided for in the instructions that accompany the form," Mr. Conroy said.

Mr. Swords said reporting about compensation, in particular, is fraught with problems.

"For obvious, human reasons, people are reluctant to have salaries disclosed," he said. "It's one of the biggest topics of gossip, so there's been a tendency to underreport it or not to report it at all."

Many charities simply do not adequately understand the reporting requirement, experts say. For example, the Buckley School, a private boys school in New York City, stopped listing compensation for its headmaster and other top officials several years ago. Its tax forms stated that "compensation information can be obtained at the school."

"That's not adequate, flatly not adequate," Mr. Swords said.

Ogden N. Lewis, a Buckley board member, said the school had just filed an amended 2005 tax form spelling out the compensation of its five highest-paid employees.

Mr. Lewis said a parent had brought the problem to his attention in a letter. "I checked on the rules when I received that information and learned that we needed to report compensation differently," he said. "Once I was aware of it, it seemed clear, very clear."

The I.R.S. study, the largest ever undertaken by the exempt organizations division, began in 2004 amid heightened interest in the issue of nonprofit compensation in the news media and Congress. It involved two new units, one devoted to monitoring tax law compliance among nonprofit groups and the other focused on data analysis.

Among its aims were to identify and stop excessive compensation to nonprofit executives and other insiders through audits and questionnaires and to help nonprofits better understand laws governing reporting and payments to senior employees.

Mr. Miller said the exercise had spawned further ideas for I.R.S. inquiries. The agency has already begun a deeper inquiry into loans made to insiders at charities and foundations, contacting 200 organizations by letter and starting audits at 50 others, he said.

The potential for recovering additional revenue challenges what current and former I.R.S. officials describe as a long-held belief at the agency that policing nonprofits produces little reward, unlike scrutiny of individuals and for-profit companies. Mr. Miller said that with 70 audits still open, he expects the I.R.S. to recoup more than $20 million in excise taxes.

"There are penalties, too, for incomplete returns, and one of the things we need to look at is are we assessing those penalties in the right circumstances," he said.

Don't Get Pulled In By Tax Scams (WP)

By Michelle Singletary

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Every year the Internal Revenue Service announces the top 12 tax scams. This tax season, topping the latest Dirty Dozen are fraudulent schemes connected with the one-time telephone excise tax refund available to most taxpayers.

The excise tax refund is available only on your 2006 federal income tax return and is intended to refund the tax collected on long distance telephone service. It's available for anyone who paid such taxes on a land line, fax, computer or cellphone for the period following Feb. 28, 2003, and before Aug. 1, 2006.

To make it easier for taxpayers, the IRS set a standard refund amount ranging from $30 to $60, based on the number of exemptions claimed on your return.

You don't need to present proof to take the standard refund amount. However, you can figure the refund using the actual amount of tax paid, based on your phone bills and other records.

Because taxpayers can request a refund for the exact amount of the taxes collected, unscrupulous tax preparers have persuaded people to claim a higher refund than they are entitled to. In some cases people are asking for thousands of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0138366

Others are requesting what looks to be the entire amount of their phone bills for the period in question. In the most egregious cases, some individuals have asked for a refund of $30,000, which means they would have had a long-distance bill of $1 million from the end of February 2003 until the beginning of August last year. That 41-month period covers the time the 3 percent excise tax was collected.

To stop the abusive use of the telephone excise tax refund, the IRS is conducting site visits with tax preparers across the country to stop inflated requests. The visits started with 22 tax preparers who have handled more than 1,500 returns.

"We are taking this unusual step to confront blatant abuse of this important refund program," said IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson. "We want tax preparers to prepare accurate tax returns. If they don't, we will move swiftly to impose civil penalties and, where warranted, seek criminal sanctions."

Everson said individuals requesting what appear to be inflated refunds will have those refunds frozen and they may be subject to an audit.

This year's Dirty Dozen list features five new scams. You can get the full list by going to IRS.gov. Here are a few that caught my attention:

Â· Zero Wages. In this scam, the intent is to dispute income reported on a W-2 form. A person will file a Form 4852 (Substitute Form W-2) or a "corrected" Form 1099 showing zero or little income. The IRS says the individual may include some reference that his employer refused to issue a corrected W-2 for fear of retaliation from the IRS.

Â· American Indian Employment Credit. This scam reminds me of a scheme in which African Americans were persuaded they were entitled to a slavery tax credit. Thousands of African Americans were duped into filing for refunds for a nonexistent "slave reparations" tax credit. Now the schemers are moving on to Native Americans, who are encouraged to submit returns claiming their taxable income should be reduced because of an American Indian employment or treaty credit. It's a lie. It might sound believable because there is an "Indian Employment Credit." The intent of this credit is to give businesses an incentive to hire certain individuals who live on or near an Indian reservation. This credit is available for businesses that employ Native Americans or their spouses. In a somewhat similar scam, unscrupulous promoters have informed Native Americans that they are not subject to federal income taxation.

Â· Trust Misuse. This is a tried-and-true tax scam in which promoters get taxpayers to transfer assets into trusts. They promise reduction of income subject to tax, deductions for personal expenses and reduced estate or gift taxes. However, some trusts do not deliver the promised tax benefits. There are more than 150 abusive trust investigations underway, and 49 injunctions have been obtained against promoters since 2001, according to the IRS. The IRS has been aggressive in cracking down on these types of illegal trusts.

In all these cases, don't try to play innocent when it comes to a fraudulent tax return. "If you sign your return, you are liable," says Edward Smith, a tax partner in the Boston accounting firm BDO Seidman.

"You should carefully go through and make sure every item that relates to your tax return is true," Smith said.

You would think this advice is obvious. But looking at the Dirty Dozen, it is clear that many people don't mind cheating.

Congressman In Probe Wants Papers Back (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 1, 2007

Attorneys for Democratic Rep. William Jefferson asked a federal appeals court Wednesday to force the Bush administration to return all documents that were seized during an FBI raid last year on the congressman's office.

In their 52-page request, lawyers for Jefferson, D-La., argued that the Justice Department violated Congress' right to withhold certain information from the executive branch when it conducted the unprecedented 18-hour search last May 20-21.

DOJ_NMG_0138367

The raid was part of a 16-month international bribery investigation of Jefferson, who allegedly accepted $100,000 from a telecommunications businessman — $90,000 of which was later recovered in a freezer in the congressman's Louisiana home.

Jefferson's attorneys said nearly 19,000 pages of documents and electronic files seized by prosecutors and the FBI are covered by Congress' separation of powers privilege to shield certain legislative material from executive review.

But the FBI "inspected every document in the office suite and copied every computer hard drive or other electronic storage device they could find," the attorneys wrote in their request filed Wednesday with the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia. "Once that occurs, the privilege is breached."

"Because this case involves the first time in United States history that a search warrant has been executed on a congressional office, it is vital that the remedy imposed be sufficiently stringent to deter future searches that exceed constitutional boundaries," Jefferson's team concluded. "The only remedy that will vindicate and protect the fundamental principles of separations of powers and legislative independence ... is return of all of the seized materials."

The Justice Department had no immediate comment.

Last summer, the appeals court agreed to delay the Justice Department's review — and therefore, the bulk of its investigation — of more than a dozen computer hard drives, several floppy discs and two boxes of documents that were seized as he challenges the legality of the raid.

Jefferson was re-elected to Congress last year.

House GOP Pushes Floor Vote For Rep. Jefferson Appointment (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

House Republicans plan to force a floor vote on the appointment of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), who is the subject of a federal bribery investigation, to a seat on the Homeland Security Committee.

The decision to put Jefferson on the panel was made by Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), and House Democrats endorsed the move at a private meeting Tuesday night, but his appointment must be confirmed by a vote on the House floor. Such an action would normally be a formality, but Republicans said yesterday that they would pursue a rarely used maneuver to force a recorded vote on the matter.

"This is a terrible mistake by the Democratic leadership, to take someone with serious ethical allegations against him and put him on one of the most sensitive and important committees in Congress," said Rep. Peter T. King (N.Y.), the ranking Republican on the committee.

Pelosi ousted Jefferson from his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee in June after federal investigators raided his Capitol Hill office. In an earlier search of his home, $90,000 was found in a freezer. The money allegedly was accepted in a bribery sting involving an African technology company. Jefferson, who has not been charged, has maintained his innocence and was elected to a ninth term in December after a runoff election.

"You gotta wonder where Jefferson's gonna store all those homeland security secrets," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (N.C.), a deputy Republican whip. Other Republicans said Pelosi's decision contradicted her promise to create "the most ethical Congress in history." Said King: "It shows hypocrisy. Before the election, they made a big point of pulling him from Ways and Means and after the election, they put him on Homeland Security."

A spokesman for Pelosi said she opted to place Jefferson on Homeland Security because the panel oversees the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Jefferson had been a vocal critic of FEMA's performance during Hurricane Katrina, which affected thousands of his constituents.

But his appointment must be formally approved by the House, and Republicans said they would take the rare step of challenging the vote and requiring members to record their votes so Democrats will be forced to go on the record in their support of Jefferson.

Such appointments usually are ratified on the House floor by unanimous consent.

"I have a hard time seeing how the Democrats will vote in the open to put a person with serious ethical charges against him on Homeland Security," King said. "If he was too unethical to be writing tax law, he certainly shouldn't be on Homeland Security where he has access to intelligence materials and ongoing operations. Even with FEMA, we're going to be looking into allegations of corruption related to contracting around Hurricane Katrina."

Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Pelosi, said that if Republicans follow through on their threat, they would set a "dangerous precedent. A number of their own members are under investigation," he said, referring to Republicans allegedly under scrutiny by the Justice Department.

Jefferson called the Republican criticism "politics as usual."

"Speaker Pelosi did the right thing by placing the congressional member who represents hurricane-ravaged New Orleans on this committee," he said. "My district desperately needs a voice on this panel."

Jefferson Seat Sparks Battle (RC)

By Susan Davis And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, March 1, 2007

Breaking with longstanding but unwritten rules of comity in the House, Republican leaders plan to object to a Democratic resolution to seat embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) on the Homeland Security Committee, arguing that Jefferson is ethically unsuited for the assignment.

Rarely, if ever, do the parties attempt to intervene on each other's committee assignments or internal party business. Yet Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) told reporters Wednesday following the weekly Republican Conference meeting that they would object to the unanimous consent request usually granted to approve mundane House business such as committee assignments. Republicans argue that because Jefferson is under federal investigation, he should not be given access to national security information.

Democrats could offer the resolution on the floor as early as today to formally assign Jefferson to the panel, but since it is a privileged resolution Democrats can bring it to the floor at any time without notice and may opt to hold off until next week. The Democratic Steering Committee and the full Democratic Caucus already have approved the assignment without opposition. Homeland Security Chairman Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) said Wednesday he had no objection to the decision.

"Not as far as I'm concerned ... I have not heard any," Thompson said, adding that no one has brought up the matter to him and that Jefferson "is a Member of Congress, who, like every other American, is innocent until proven guilty."

Jefferson already has taken part in committee business and attended a Wednesday hearing on reforming the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which played a widely criticized role in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina that devastated Jefferson's New Orleans-based district.

At the hearing, Rep. Henry Cuellar (D-Texas) made a unanimous consent request to allow Jefferson and three other Members who do not sit on the subcommittee to join the panel and question the witnesses. No one objected.

Jefferson was the only one of the four to show up and he took part in the questioning of FEMA Director David Paulison and other Homeland Security Department officials regarding reforms the DHS is making in response to last year's FEMA overhaul legislation.

Furthermore, Jefferson is scheduled to travel with President Bush on Air Force One today to tour the Gulf Coast along with other lawmakers from the Katrina-affected area.

The GOP's objection will force a roll call vote on Jefferson's assignment designed to put Democrats on record supporting Jefferson, but that effort is not expected to change the outcome as it is likely to fall on party lines.

Blunt could not recall a time in his career when one party objected to the other's committee assignments, but he said there was no doubt Republicans were going to draw attention to Jefferson. "I don't think we ever seriously discussed not having a vote," Blunt said.

In a statement, House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said the decision to seat Jefferson on Homeland Security conflicted with Democrats' earlier decision to remove him from Ways and Means.

"The Democrats previously determined Congressman Jefferson is unfit to serve on the Ways and Means Committee, which oversees the nation's finances and trade, so it is difficult to comprehend how they can approve of Congressman Jefferson's fitness for a seat on the Homeland Security Committee, with access to America's most sensitive and closely guarded intelligence information," Boehner said. "House Democrats and their leaders should immediately reconsider this baffling and troubling decision."

In his own statement Wednesday evening, Jefferson said the GOP's tactics were simply "politics as usual" and that his district "desperately needs a voice" on the Homeland panel.

The Louisiana lawmaker had served on the exclusive Ways and Means committee until June, when the House removed him from that post after the Democratic Caucus voted 99-58 to strip him of his assignment in light of the ongoing investigation.

Although he has not been indicted, at the time of the Caucus' decision in June, the FBI asserted it had videotaped Jefferson allegedly accepting $100,000 in marked bills from an informant last year. A subsequent search of the lawmaker's home reportedly turned up $90,000 of the marked cash in Jefferson's freezer.

Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing, but indictments have been handed down in the case that have implicated him in a business scheme to benefit a Kentucky-based technology company that also involved officials in African nations.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Wednesday morning that he was unaware of Blunt's comments, but suggested that GOP leaders should consider applying the suggestion equally to those members of their delegation who currently are under investigation by the Justice Department.

"Is [Blunt] going to ask them to step aside?" Hoyer asked.

Democrats point to what they see as Republican hypocrisy on the issue because while they are taking the partisan step to oppose Jefferson's assignment, they have chosen to seat Members such as Appropriations Committee ranking member Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), who also is under investigation by the FBI and has paid nearly $1 million in legal bills in the past year.

A spokesman for Boehner declined to comment on Lewis, deferring to Boehner's statement. However, a GOP leadership aide said the situations were not comparable. "There's a big difference," the aide said. "There have been no indictments or convictions surrounding the allegations against Congressman Lewis. This is not the case with Mr. Jefferson. He was caught on FBI video surveillance accepting a $100,000 bribe, found with $90,000 of it in his freezer, and the authorities have made several convictions that directly implicate him in a crime."

House Democrats approved Jefferson's new committee assignment by voice vote at their weekly Caucus meeting Tuesday, during which no objections were raised, Hoyer said.

Jefferson, who also serves on the Small Business Committee, won his re-election bid in December, defeating state Rep. Karen Carter (D) by a resounding 57 percent to 43 percent in a runoff election in the 2nd district.

Hoyer acknowledged that the victory played a significant role in handing Jefferson an additional committee assignment: "He needs to be able to serve on their behalf," Hoyer said.

"Mr. Jefferson was taken off Ways and Means ... in recognition of the issues he is confronting," Hoyer added, noting that Jefferson's seat could be returned to him pending the outcome of the corruption probe.

Ways and Means has jurisdiction over international trade issues, and one of the allegations against Jefferson is that he may have taken bribes to help win a Nigerian telecommunications contract for an American company.

House Democratic leaders had announced in December that Jefferson would remain on "suspension" from the Ways and Means panel in the 110th Congress.

Rep. Alcee Hastings (D-Fla.) criticized the suggestion that the House would be asked to confirm Jefferson's new assignment, stating: "I consider it ridiculous."

Hastings, a member of the Intelligence Committee, also decried suggestions that Jefferson would receive greater access to classified information as a member of the Homeland Security panel, calling such statements untrue.

Veto Threat Looms Over House Labor Bill (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, March 1, 2007

President Bush would veto legislation championed by Democrats and labor groups that would make it easier to organize unions by eliminating employer rights to demand secret-ballot elections, the White House said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0138370

The House is to vote on the legislation Thursday and, with help from pro-labor Republicans from the Northeast, it is almost certain to pass. But the margin of support is expected to fall well short of the two-thirds needed to overturn a presidential veto.

The Employee Free Choice Act, also known as the card check bill, is the top legislative goal of labor groups eager to reassert themselves with the emergence of the Democratic majority.

The current system is broken because employers can coerce and intimidate workers into rejecting unionization, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said in a phone interview this week. The House bill, he said, is "the most important improvement in labor law in many decades."

But the White House, in a statement, said the measure "would strip workers of the fundamental democratic right to a supervised private ballot election." Substituting a card check mechanism under which unions would get bargaining rights as soon as a majority of workers at a plant sign approval cards, "would turn back the clock 60 years and return us to a failed system."

Rep. George Miller, D-Cal., chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, urged the president to reconsider the threatened veto. "The administration's statement ignores the fact that it is employers, not unions, who routinely harass, intimidate, fire and reassign workers who try to form a union," he said.

Under the bill a company would no longer have the right to demand a secret-ballot election, overseen by the National Labor Relations Board, before a union can be certified.

The legislation also imposes tougher penalties on companies that violate the rights of workers trying to organize and sets up a binding arbitration process to prevent companies from thwarting a new union by bargaining in bad faith on an initial contract.

Unions see obstacles to organizing as a major reason union membership has dropped from 20 percent of waged and salary workers in 1983 to 12 percent in 2006. Discounting civil servants, that percentage is 7.4 percent, the Labor Department says.

Both business groups opposed to the bill and organized labor have launched major ad and lobbying campaigns. The Coalition for a Democratic Workplace, an anti-bill business coalition, said it would run radio ads in three formerly Republican districts captured by Democratic freshmen Tim Mahoney of Florida, Nancy Boyda of Kansas and Heath Shuler of North Carolina.

"We want to put members of the House and Senate on notice that we are watching how they vote on this issue," said coalition spokesman Todd Harris.

Democrats shrugged off GOP charges that the bill was payback for union financial support that helped put them in the majority.

For the past 12 years when Republicans controlled the House, Rep. Robert Andrews, D-N.J., told workers at a news conference Wednesday, oil companies, pharmaceutical companies and defense contractors profiting in Iraq had their day. "Tomorrow is your day," he said.

Unions and their Democratic allies say employers use the time before elections to pressure workers. The labor rights group American Rights at Work said 80 percent of employers hire union-busting consultants and 90 percent force employees to attend one-on-one anti-union meetings with their supervisors.

John Schmitt, senior economist for the Center for Economic and Policy Research, says that about one out of five union activists can expect to be fired as part of organizing activities.

But opponents argue that eliminating elections would allow the hard-sell tactics of organizers to go unchecked. People trying to get workers to sign cards "are not going to tell workers about the downsides of organizing. They are not going to talk about how expensive the dues are," said James Sherk, policy analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

Bush has issued only one veto so far in his presidency, to kill a bill expanding federal backing for stem cell research. It's unclear if this bill will ever reach his desk: Democrats in the Senate would need 60 votes to overcome a likely GOP-led filibuster.

Keep Union Ballots Secret (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138371

THE HOUSE of Representatives is expected today to approve a bill, favored by organized labor, whose stated purpose is glaringly at odds with its key provision. The Employee Free Choice Act is portrayed by its supporters as a way to allow workers to choose whether to join a union.

Unfortunately, the legislation would do away with a secret ballot in so-called organizing elections, making it easier for union leaders to pressure co-workers in what should be a free choice. Instead of having the option of insisting on a secret ballot election, employers would have to accept a union formed on the basis of authorization cards signed by workers — not by a secret process.

Unions and their supporters in the Democratic-controlled Congress say the so-called card-check system is the only way to overcome aggressive (and sometimes illegal) anti-union tactics by employers. In announcing support for the bill, Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez) complained that employers often fire workers who seek to organize. Such reprisals are illegal, and part of the Employee Free Choice Act increases the sanctions for employer violations.

Unfair labor practices deserve tougher penalties. But improper influence can work both ways. As a rule, union membership improves worker prosperity and safety. Even so, the bedrock of federal labor law is not unionism under any conditions, but the right of workers to choose whether they want to affiliate with a union.

Obviously, employers shouldn't punish workers for wanting to join a union, float falsehoods in trying to influence an organization election or bar union representatives from the workplace. Just as obviously, the penalties they face for doing so are laughable and need to be strengthened. By the same token, however, supporters of unionization shouldn't be able to pressure unwilling or hesitant employees to join a union. And you don't have to be a critic of unions to recognize that the card-check system invites such abuses.

Unions once supported the secret ballot for organization elections. They were right then and are wrong now. Unions have every right to a fair hearing, and the National Labor Relations Board should be more vigilant about attempts by employers to game the system. In the end, however, whether to unionize is up to the workers. A secret ballot ensures that their choice will be a free one.

Walter Reuther's Ghost (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The House of Representatives has scheduled a vote as early as today on a bill that strips 140 million U.S. workers of the right to decide in private whether to unionize. Naturally, it's called the Employee Free Choice Act.

Big Labor has been agitating to ease union-formation requirements for more than a decade. And prior to last year's election, the AFL-CIO, AFSCME and their allies made it clear to Democrats that this vote would be the most important return they expected on their investment in a Nancy Pelosi Speakership. This is payback day.

The union claim is that employers are engaging in rampant unfair labor practices to prevent employees from exercising their right to organize. But data from the National Labor Relations Board, which oversees union elections, show no rise in such activities. The reality is that union membership has been in decline for decades, and labor leaders are desperate to rig the rules in order to reverse the trend. In the 1950s, 35% of private-sector workers were unionized. By the early 1980s the number had fallen to 20%, and today it stands at just 7.4%.

The reason for this decline isn't illegal management meddling in organizing efforts. The problem is that unions haven't been able to persuade the workers themselves. Our own, longstanding position is that when a company is organized it is almost always the company's fault. But workers of all classes and skills can also read the news and understand that unions no longer provide job security, if they ever did. The most heavily unionized industries -- such as airlines and Detroit carmakers -- are typically those that are financially beleaguered and shedding jobs. Workers know that unions often provide short-term wage gains at the cost of longer-term job insecurity.

All of which explains the drive to rewrite the rules and do away with secret-ballot elections administered by the NLRB, a procedure in place since the 1935 Wagner Act. Under current rules, once 30% of employees at a workplace express interest in unionizing by signing an authorization card, organizers can go to management and demand voluntary "card-check" recognition. The employer then has the option of recognizing the union or demanding an election.

It shouldn't be surprising that many workers who sign these cards later have second thoughts after getting the employer's side of the story. Workers sign cards for all kinds of reasons, including peer pressure and intimidation. It's not uncommon for an organizer to approach an employer with cards that show 90% of the workforce wants to unionize, only to have the percentage plummet once employees hear about the downside of a union shop and have a chance to vote by secret ballot. So Big Labor wants to dispense with these petty elections and make union recognition mandatory as soon as a simple majority of workers sign a card.

Notably, nearly every American business group is united in opposing this affront to worker freedom. They understand this will make organizing that much easier, thus making their own businesses that much less competitive. One business response would surely be to hire fewer workers -- the opposite of what the unions claim to want.

The bill nonetheless has 234 co-sponsors, including seven Republicans, mostly from blue Northeast states such as New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. Because the Senate is expected to filibuster the bill and the White House is threatening a veto, these Republicans may figure they can have it both ways: Score points with the unions by supporting a measure that isn't going anywhere. But Members who go on record opposing secret-ballot elections will also have some explaining to do the next time they ask for business support.

So far this Congress, Democrats have been trying to present themselves as "moderates" who won't return to their bad special-interest selves pre-1994. But this union-enabling bill strips away that mask and exposes an anti-business animus out of the 1970s, if not the 1930s. Even if it fails this Congress, this week's vote is a warning about what could become law if Democrats and their union backers hold all the levers of power after 2008.

Big Labor's Payback (WT)

By Tom Price

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Not even two months into the new Congress, the bipartisan facade of the highly poll-tested, heavily orchestrated first 100 hours is a distant memory. The real agenda of the new Democratic majority is coming to light, and many of the special interests that helped rally support for Democratic candidates during the last election cycle are lining up to cash in.

At the front of the line: Big Labor.

According to the Center for Responsive Politics, organized labor gave nearly $60 million in hard-dollar PAC contributions to Democratic candidates in the last election cycle — with tens of millions more for "get out the vote" efforts piled on top. So what are they getting for their efforts? Nothing less than an unabashed attempt to destroy one of democracy's most sacred rights.

The fact is, organized labor has seen its best days. It's hemorrhaging members at a steady pace — losing 325,000 members last year, down to 12 percent nationwide. That's quite a fall from 20 percent a quarter-century ago and a 35 percent high-water mark in the 1950s. But even last year's dismal number is inflated by the sole bright spot for unions — government employees, 36 percent of whom are unionized. In the private sector alone, where Big Labor's bread was buttered for decades, union membership has dropped to a meager 7.4 percent.

Faced with this reality, union bosses have reverted to full panic mode. And after they helped usher into Congress a new Democratic majority, they see a small window of opportunity; one final, desperate attempt to stop the bleeding.

That window has taken the form of the cleverly worded Employee Free Choice Act, which strips workers of their right to a secret ballot in union recognition elections. Instead, it would force workers to submit to a "card check" — a process that places them at risk of intimidation, coercion and threats from labor bosses, all to get them to sign a card to demonstrate their "support" for unionization.

The card-check legislation is the No. 1 priority of unions — and considering the bill's quick committee action and hastily scheduled appearance on the House floor this week, Big Labor has succeeded in making it a top priority for Democrats as well. After all, Big Labor shouldn't have to wait too long for a return on their staggering investment in last year's campaign, should it?

What's truly amazing about the Big Labor and congressional Democratic push for the card check bill is the absolute hypocrisy of it all. The labor bosses behind the effort to strip workers of their rights to a private ballot in union organization elections are the very same people who have argued passionately for such rights in union decertification elections. In fact, using quite stirring language, Big Labor once told the National Labor Relations Board that the secret ballot election is a "solemn" occasion, imperative to preserving "privacy and independence."

But Big Labor doesn't have a monopoly on hypocrisy in this debate. Congressional Democrats are giving them a run for their money. Consider this: Writing to Mexican — yes, Mexican — officials in August 2001 in advance of an election between two competing labor unions in that country, 16 House Democrats — 11 of whom remain in the House and sponsor the card-check bill, including the bill's lead sponsor himself, Rep. George Miller of California — plainly stated: "We understand that the secret ballot is allowed for, but not required by Mexican labor law. We feel that the secret ballot is absolutely necessary in order to ensure workers are not intimidated into voting for a union they may otherwise not choose." Not only do Democratic card-check proponents seem to support rights for Mexican workers that they aren't even willing to protect for their own constituents, but they also have admitted that the process is deeply flawed and prone to intimidation.

Usually, what's good for the goose is good for the gander, but not when Big Labor and their allies in Congress are involved. The fact is, whether in Mexico or the United States, in decertification or recognition elections, the card check takes free choice away from workers and leaves them completely exposed to coercion.

But, faced with plummeting membership and an ever-loosening stranglehold on American workers, organized labor isn't about to let bad policy — or blatant hypocrisy — get in their way. They're ready for their payback. And congressional Democrats stand ready to deliver. Indeed, it appears that democratic principles and the sanctity of the secret ballot are not the concerns of the new majority party.

Rep. Tom Price, Georgia Republican, is a member of the House Education and Labor Committee.

Bush And Democrats Talk Trade (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration and congressional Democrats are attempting to negotiate a grand compromise on trade that would allow several deals to move forward by elevating the importance of labor rights in those agreements.

After Democrats won control of Congress in November, in part by attacking free-trade agreements, President Bush's globalization agenda seemed all but dead for the rest of his term. Among priorities were bilateral deals with Peru, Panama and Colombia; the Doha round of multilateral talks; as well as renewal of a broad presidential authority to negotiate agreements and push them through Congress, which expires in June.

But the White House and lawmakers have decided to try to find common ground, as Mr. Bush has signaled flexibility on labor standards after years of resisting. The talks are being led by U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel of New York and Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the ranking Republican on the committee. Much of the negotiations have been at the staff level, but the three principals have played a role, conferring in face-to-face meetings on Capitol Hill or over the phone.

It isn't clear a deal will be reached soon, if at all, given the bitter history surrounding the issue. The Democrats' main demand is to incorporate into trade agreements a requirement that other countries embrace the basic principles for workplace rights outlined by the Geneva-based International Labor Organization. These ban forced labor and child labor, limit workplace discrimination and reserve for workers the right to organize and bargain with employers.

Negotiators are struggling to find a way to translate those general goals into specific language that works for the U.S. and would-be partners in free-trade agreements, especially for developing countries where labor rights vary widely. They are also discussing ways to craft wording that would prevent the agreements from being used to challenge the U.S.'s own labor standards.

A successful agreement could clear passage of the Latin America deals and help jump-start the stalled Doha round. It could also presage bipartisan cooperation on other fronts, such as climate change, middle-class taxes and immigration.

"If you're serious about addressing problems, you've got to be serious about working with the other party," said Mr. McCrery of Ways and Means, which has jurisdiction over health and tax policy as well as trade.

DOJ_NMG_0138374

Democratic critics of Mr. Bush, pushed by organized labor, want to elevate the importance of labor rights, according them the same status as business priorities such as patent protections that U.S. negotiators pursue on behalf of drug makers. Mr. Bush so far has preferred to deal with labor rights outside any actual pact. Critics say that strategy has made it difficult to enforce labor commitments, since they aren't subject to the same sanctions that back up business priorities.

A few weeks after the November elections, Ms. Schwab signaled in a U.S. Chamber of Commerce appearance that she wanted to deal with those concerns.

For Democrats, Mr. Rangel said, the goal is "not to do damage to trade" but to find a compromise that shows "this great country is at least concerned" with minimum labor-rights standards.

The issue of labor rights began to take on broader significance in the mid-1990s, when nations moved to lower trade barriers and integrate their economies. Critics worried that workers would suffer and pushed for enhanced protections. These efforts culminated in a U.S. trade pact with Jordan at the end of the Clinton presidency that affirmed the ILO standards. Critics say securing similar protections under Mr. Bush has been difficult.

In the current talks, one challenge vexing negotiators is how in concrete terms to carry out any agreement. The Panama pact, which was concluded recently, was left open to accommodate any labor commitments the administration might agree to with Congress. But the details of the Peru and Colombia deals have been settled since last year, and it remains uncertain whether they would be reopened or whether Democrats would agree to address their concerns in side commitments.

A problem that especially worries Republicans and the administration is how to ensure new labor commitments don't unintentionally rebound at home, where American businesses already have high workplace standards under U.S. law. Some officials fret about the limits imposed by U.S. law on the ability of government workers to organize and worry that putting ILO principles in a bilateral trade deal might lead to legal actions over whether the U.S. itself fully complies with the basic international rights.

"What we're trying to do is make sure everyone else lifts their game up, but not do it in a way that would affect U.S. law," said Schwab spokesman Sean Spicer.

Of course, other hurdles, from environmental concerns to port security, could arise. And a labor-rights deal between Democrats and the White House wouldn't likely be supported by the AFL-CIO, given its concerns with globalization.

But the Bush team is betting that a deal backed by Mr. Rangel and Michigan Democratic Rep. Sander Levin, a senior Ways and Means member, would strengthen support for trade among House Democrats and perhaps begin to rebuild the bipartisan coalition for free trade that existed for much of the 1990s.

For Democrats, the issue is fraught. After years of being frozen out of trade policy, Messrs. Rangel and Levin want to show they are players. But their ability to compromise may be limited, since trade was an election-turning factor last fall.

"If Rangel and Levin can't achieve a large amount of change, they can't move," said Lori Wallach, head of Public Citizen's Trade Watch, a labor-backed advocacy group. She said Democrats need to demonstrate for voters that they have made real changes to Mr. Bush's trade agenda. "If they do more of the same, they will not be in the majority after 2008."

OFF THE JOB Federal Aid Does Little For Free Trade's Losers (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

GALAX, Va. -- For more than 80 years, the people of Webb Furniture crafted wooden dressers and other furniture here at the foot of the Blue Ridge Mountains. In January, under pressure from Chinese imports, Webb shuttered its Galax plant and fired all 309 employees.

Tonya Graber lost more than her job painting furniture. The single mother also lost health insurance for herself and her 12-year-old son. Under a government program aimed at helping workers harmed by trade, Ms. Graber was eligible for federally subsidized health insurance, but she couldn't afford it.

She isn't alone. The Health Coverage Tax Credit, tucked into a 2002 trade bill to win support in Congress, is supposed to cushion the blow to factory workers hurt by imports by paying 65% of the cost of health insurance. (The subsidy is also available to workers whose companies have dumped their pension plans on the government's pension insurer.) More than four years after the program began, just 11% of those potentially eligible for the subsidy are taking it -- or about 28,000 of the roughly 250,000 people the government estimates may qualify in a given year.

"It's just not realistic to say that a laid-off worker who's uninsured is going to come up with 35% of the premium," says Stan Dorn, who has studied the program at the Urban Institute think tank. Even those who can find the money say they're struggling to figure out the rules and deal with as many as five state and federal agencies.

The troubles illustrate the shortcomings of a program pivotal to the debate over free trade and the globalization of business. A common political compromise in Washington involves keeping trade barriers low in exchange for programs compensating those hurt by imports. Free-trade advocates are generally happy to make such a compromise. They figure the winners from trade -- principally consumers who save money on imported goods -- can afford, through the government, to help compensate the losers. (See related article.3)

The problem is that compensation programs often add bureaucracy without helping many people. Even if the health-insurance assistance program were working well, it would aid only a fraction of those who lose their jobs. The Labor Department must certify that workers have lost their jobs to imports from certain countries or to a shift in production there. Most workers in call centers or other service industries whose jobs are sent overseas don't qualify.

Another struggling program is wage insurance, designed for workers over 50 who lose their jobs because of trade and then take a lower-paying job. The government makes up half the difference in wages, up to $10,000 a year, but it requires that workers prove they don't have "easily transferable skills." Some can't do that.

The issue: Should Washington give up on such programs, or should it expand them and try to make them work better? For the moment, people on both sides on Capitol Hill say President Bush will need to beef up programs for those hurt by imports if he wants congressional backing for new trade legislation.

Mr. Bush wants Congress to extend his authority to negotiate trade deals and put them to an up-or-down vote in Congress. The administration also is trying to restart the Doha Round of global trade talks.

The White House has promised to offer legislation to "extend and improve" the Trade Adjustment Assistance program, which includes both the health-insurance assistance and wage insurance. However, it didn't include many specifics in its budget for the year beginning in October. Several Democrats and Republicans in Congress are proposing to expand TAA to cover more workers, including those in service industries.

"There has to be more cushioning for people caught in the maws of free trade," says Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat who has criticized China's trade policy. "The fact that TAA has not done the job gives those who want to build walls around the U.S. greater currency."

Town's Lost Jobs

The issue is on vivid display in Galax, population 6,800. More than 2,000 jobs in this western Virginia town have been eliminated over the past two years as several furniture manufacturers and textile plants either closed or reduced their work forces in the face of cheaper imports, mostly from China.

Almost all of the displaced workers were eligible for the federal health-insurance subsidy, yet only about 100 have signed up, says Linda Nuckolls, who works in Galax for the Virginia Employment Commission. "These people have worked in a furniture factory for $7 or $9 an hour and they just don't have the money," she says.

Results were similar in a January 2006 survey by the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress. The GAO looked at five trade-related plant closures and found that no more than 12% of workers at any site were taking the credit. Among those who knew of the program but didn't use it, the most common complaint was that they couldn't afford to pay their part of the premium, the GAO said.

Laid-off employees usually can buy insurance through their old employers, who are required by federal law to offer it temporarily but not to pay for it. Another option in many states is to buy insurance through a health plan arranged by the state. On average, according to the Internal Revenue Service, the insurance costs $720 a month, with the federal government picking up $468, or 65%, of the cost and the former employee paying the $252 remainder. Although the program is officially called a tax credit and is run by the IRS, in practice it works like a federal subsidy.

Law's Constraints

David Williams, who oversees the program at the IRS, says the agency is working hard to make eligible people aware of it. He notes that the law Congress passed includes constraints that mean some of the 250,000 or so people reported each year as potentially eligible actually aren't. "Some may be ineligible if they may be entitled to Medicare, may not meet the age requirements, may be using a spouse's insurance or may be in a plan that doesn't qualify," he says.

The administration acknowledges problems. The White House Office of Management and Budget has called the program "not performing," and cited as a reason "the affordability of coverage to potential recipients." Mr. Bush's budget for fiscal 2008 proposes several changes to the program, though none to make it cheaper.

Ms. Graber, 32 years old, followed her family into the furniture mills. Factory jobs, like the hardwood used in furniture, were long plentiful here. Ms. Graber says it was hot and dirty work, but the $7.66-an-hour job came with health benefits, which were a big draw since her son has asthma and needs medication. "The reason I held on to that job was because of the health insurance," she says.

At Webb, Ms. Graber paid about $200 a month for insurance, which included dental and vision care. She looked into the tax credit and discovered that coverage for herself and her son would run about $400 a month, not including dental or vision. After the government picked up 65% of the tab, her portion would have been $140 a month -- plus a $500 annual deductible and $20 co-payments for doctor's office visits and medication.

"It was way too much with what I was drawing in unemployment," she says. She gets an unemployment check of $404 every two weeks, meaning her monthly income is under $900.

She enrolled her son in a children's health program that falls under Medicaid, the state-federal program for low-income families. She didn't qualify for Medicaid herself -- she says she was told her income is too high -- so she goes without health insurance. "I just pray to God and try not to get sick," says Ms. Graber, who is training at Wytheville Community College near Galax to become a respiratory therapist. Her tuition is paid through the TAA program.

Larry Kenny of Galax was making $45,000 a year as a maintenance mechanic at National Textiles LLC when he was laid off in May 2006. Mr. Kenny, 61, took the tax credit, in large part because his wife has lupus. His portion of the insurance bill takes $240 of the $1,200 a month he draws in unemployment benefits.

"I told my wife the only way we could afford it is if we don't owe anything to anyone," Mr. Kenny says. He cashed out $43,000 in his 401(k) retirement plan, sold his truck for $6,000 and used the money to pay off his mortgage and his car loan. "It's kind of scary because I was always used to having $20,000 in my savings account and now when I look there's just $200, if that much," he says.

Some in Congress argue it's unreasonable to expect someone who lost a job to pay 35% of his health-insurance bill. Those who get health coverage on the job typically pay closer to 15% to 25% of the total cost of their insurance. The Senate Finance Committee chairman, Max Baucus of Montana, says he plans to introduce legislation this year "to make this benefit work better."

Workers who seek the health-care tax credit must bear upfront costs. The federal subsidy often doesn't begin until 60 days after they lose their jobs because of a government-imposed waiting period before they are eligible to apply for benefits, so any insurance they hold in the interim is their responsibility.

Also, IRS paperwork often holds up final approval until well after the 60-day period. While waiting for the official sign-off, people must continue to pay the full cost of insurance. Some states have received grants from the Labor Department to help people with the upfront costs.

If laid-off workers decide to let the dust settle for a few months before doing anything about their health care, they may lose out. Forty-three states offer group plans that may have better terms than the insurance available from the former employer, but workers must apply for the state plans quickly. Under the Bush administration's interpretation of the law, workers applying for the new insurance must have three months of continuous health coverage prior to enrolling in the tax credit, with no more than a 63-day gap. Otherwise they can be rejected for pre-existing health conditions.

Applicants 'Overwhelmed'

The health-care tax credit "is a program you can be overwhelmed by," says Ms. Nuckolls of the Virginia Employment Commission. "The people we deal with don't have the education level to understand it."

Last April, Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine established the Galax Strike Force to help displaced workers navigate the bureaucracy. On a recent Monday morning, dozens of people crammed into the Strike Force's office in a strip mall with questions about the tax credit.

John and Barbara Farmer, who both lost jobs at National Textile, said they got a letter informing them their premiums would be increasing in 2007 and asking them to fill out a form they didn't understand. Ralph Ellis, who lost his job at Webb Furniture in January 2006, said the Strike Force helped him each of the three times his tax credit was canceled and when he was denied coverage because of earlier heart surgery.

However, privacy rules prevent state officials from talking directly to the IRS about individual clients. Ms. Nuckolls says she'll often dial the IRS from her desk and then put the client on the phone to relay information.

"On more than one occasion I've wanted to pull my hair out because the IRS would say, 'We can't tell you that,' " says Anna Rice-Wright, who oversaw administration of the health coverage tax credit in Virginia. "I would ask something as simple as, 'Can you tell me when their packages are going to be mailed out?' and they'd say, 'No.' " The IRS says it needs strict rules to ensure the confidentiality of financial information.

Other states offer less assistance. John Lewia, 62, was laid off in August 2004 from his job at the Eastern Paper Mill in Brewer, Maine. His wife, Sheila, says she got plenty of information from state and federal agencies but could make little sense of it, and had nowhere to get help. Her husband, who worked in the mill for 23 years, isn't able to read, she says.

The couple is going without health insurance for now, although Ms. Lewia suffers from diabetes and recently battled breast cancer. They try to avoid going to the doctor, and pay out of pocket when they do. "I think we paid $300 or something like that the last time we went," she says.

Hospital Officials Knew Of Neglect (WP)

By Anne Hull And Dana Priest

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Top officials at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, including the Army's surgeon general, have heard complaints about outpatient neglect from family members, veterans groups and members of Congress for more than three years.

A procession of Pentagon and Walter Reed officials expressed surprise last week about the living conditions and bureaucratic nightmares faced by wounded soldiers staying at the D.C. medical facility. But as far back as 2003, the commander of Walter Reed, Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who is now the Army's top medical officer, was told that soldiers who were wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan were languishing and lost on the grounds, according to interviews.

Steve Robinson, director of veterans affairs at Veterans for America, said he ran into Kiley in the foyer of the command headquarters at Walter Reed shortly after the Iraq war began and told him that "there are people in the barracks who are drinking themselves to death and people who are sharing drugs and people not getting the care they need."

"I met guys who weren't going to appointments because the hospital didn't even know they were there," Robinson said. Kiley told him to speak to a sergeant major, a top enlisted officer.

A recent Washington Post series detailed conditions at Walter Reed, including those at Building 18, a dingy former hotel on Georgia Avenue where the wounded were housed among mice, mold, rot and cockroaches.

Kiley lives across the street from Building 18. From his quarters, he can see the scrappy building and busy traffic the soldiers must cross to get to the 113-acre post. At a news conference last week, Kiley, who declined several requests for interviews for this article, said that the problems of Building 18 "weren't serious and there weren't a lot of them." He also said they were not "emblematic of a process of Walter Reed that has abandoned soldiers and their families."
